Mr. Joseph Ashton (Bassetlaw): Is the Minister aware that he has offered nothing to the coal-mining industry today? Will not the subsidy simply come out of the VAT that is to be levied on electricity in a year's time? Will that subsidy simply go to encourage the privatisation people, who will come into the industry to try to lower wages and make miners work longer hours and then, if the miners refuse, close the pits because they are not interested in digging coal, but rather in getting cheap land, railway sidings, the property, everything else that is attached to a pit——

Mr. Eric Clarke (Midlothian): Yes, and miners' pension rights.

Mr. Ashton: And pension rights, as my hon. Friend says. They will use his subsidy to make massive profits without producing one extra tonne of coal.

Why has the right hon. Gentleman said nothing about assisted area status? He quotes 1979, when my area was given assisted area status by the Labour Government, but his Government took it away, with no promise at all of ever putting it back.

Mr. Heseltine: I assure the hon. Member that there will be no threat to any pension rights of any miners in whatever circumstances develop. [Interruption.] The longer Labour Members tell their constituents the sort of things that we are hearing in the House, the longer the threat to British Coal will exist. If we had faced the need to modernise the coal industry throughout the early decades of this past half-century, we would have seen the coal industry of this country enjoying a far larger market than it currently does. It is because the Labour party told them that there was some other way that we have delayed making many of these difficult decisions.

Mr. John Butterfill (Bournemouth, West): Does my right hon. Friend accept that the Select Committee will wish to study in some detail the White Paper that he has presented to the House today? We are all very grateful that he has accepted our principal recommendation, that British Coal be given a subsidy to enable it to become world-competitive over the next few years. As my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, North-West (Dr. Hampson) said, that will require considerable productivity gains. While we accept that he has done a great deal to try to influence the French, will he also accept that, whatever the legal technicalities may be, it is not really acceptable in terms of Community spirit that the traffic across the interconnector should be all one way?

Mr. Heseltine: My hon. Friend is right. I can assure him that, of all the subjects we have had to look at in the context of this review, it would be fair to say that the interconnector has taken a disproportionately large amount of time. It merited a great deal of time, and I was the first to recognise that, but I had no choice but to publish for the House the summary of the legal opinions —because I did not rely on one alone—that I was presented with. I could find no way through and I have published it for the House. So one must adopt the only alternative route, which is to discuss the thing with our French opposite numbers. This my hon. Friend the Minister of State has done, and I believe that we will have an improved position as a result.

Mr. Adam Ingram (East Kilbride): Is it not the case that the President of the Board of Trade inadvertently misled the House this afternoon when he said that he had considered every recommendation of the Select Committee report? Having read through it very quickly, I do not think that that is the case, and the record will prove different. Is he aware that Scottish Power and its Scottish consumers take a disproportionate share of the sulphur dioxide emission reductions? What guarantee can he give Scottish consumers that their electricity prices will not go up and that they will not be further disadvantaged by his statement today?

Mr. Heseltine: I hope that the hon. Gentleman is wrong; certainly, he is describing something entirely different from my intention. I have assured the Select Committee, and instructed my Department, that I want the White Paper to respond thoroughly and comprehensively to the report that I have praised in the House. I believe that the White Paper covers each of the Select Committee's substantive recommendations. Of course, we shall debate these matters further; if the Select Committee wishes to pursue them with me in its own way, it is fully entitled to do so and I shall co-operate.

The hon. Gentleman asked me for assurances about future prices. That is not a realistic question to put to a Minister, who cannot be expected to give hard and fast views on prices in a complex marketplace without any time constraints.

Mr. Michael Spicer (Worcestershire, South): Opencast coal is cheap and sulphur-free; there are large stocks of it and, when blended with deep-mined coal, it greatly improves the marketability of such coal. Will my right hon. Friend tell us a little more about why he believes that production of opencast coal will fall from 16 million tonnes a year to 12 million?

Mr. Heseltine: I have consulted British Coal about that. As I said in my statement, in evidence to the Select Committee, British Coal anticipated that the present output of 16 million tonnes would fall to 12 million; it now believes that it will fall further.

I appreciate the considerable advantages of opencast mining, particularly in derelict land reclamation. I also understand the arguments for fuel mix, which render opencast coal especially important in terms of both price and technical qualities. There is another side to the matter, however. My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment will this afternoon publish his planning guidance, which suggests that the environment and its protection must also be weighed in the balance. It is on that basis that judgments can be made in the future.

Mr. Eric Illsley (Barnsley, Central): Is it not the case that 12 pits will close now, six will be mothballed—which means that they will never open again—and one, Maltby, will gain development status? Nineteen pits will be closed, while 12 will not be subsidised for two years, until the union members accept the redundancy terms that they will be encouraged to accept during that period.

The right hon. Gentleman talks of the market and the loss of the market. Has not the market been rigged against coal ever since privatisation? Gas-fired stations can bid into the pool at a negative price: in other words, they bid their electricity into the pool at nothing, knowing full well that they will then be brought on to the grid. They must compete with orimulsion—which can be piped in for next to nothing because it comes from Venezuela—and with opencast coal. Such coal is not from derelict sites; 93 per cent. of it comes from green field sites that are left as green field sites afterwards. It is a rigged market, and the right hon. Gentleman knows it.

Mr. Heseltine: I know that the Select Committee raised some aspects of the hon. Gentleman's point, but, although the Committee asked me to examine the question of bidding into the pool, I felt that it was not convinced that a simple solution existed. Having considered the issues, I concluded that the Committee was right to have its doubts.

I wholly reject the suggestion that the market is rigged. As I said in my statement, even if British Coal secures no further contracts, it will still be a substantial company in world coal terms. That in itself is an opportunity. I also wholly reject Labour's defeatist view that when I accept the Select Committee's recommendations, I enable British Coal to negotiate for additional markets. The thrust of Labour's view is that there is no additional market, but I do not accept that.

Mr. Rod Richards (Clwyd, North-West): Is my right hon. Friend aware that his statement will be widely welcomed in north Wales, especially by those who work in Point of Ayr colliery? Is he further aware that the section 36 consent that he has given to the Connah's Quay power station heralds a new economic era for north-east Wales, generating thousands of jobs and many hundreds of millions of pounds in investment?

Mr. Heseltine: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. The Connah's Quay announcement is a good one. Along with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales, my hon. Friend will know better than most that we went through a similar difficult readjustment in the context of Shotton. Without doubt, the Shotton area has experienced a transformation as a result of investment and diversification. We must always look at how we can help declining industries to reach a position where new jobs, investment and companies and a better future are on offer.

My hon. Friend is absolutely right to point to Connah's Quay. Not only will it help jobs in north Wales, which is extremely welcome; it will be a signal to one of Britain's most successful industries.

Mr. Geoffrey Hoon (Ashfield): The right hon. Gentleman seems to be keen on quotations. May I draw his attention to page 68 of the White Paper, which states:

"The United Kingdom undoubtedly has the lowest cost coal in the Community."

How will the Secretary of State explain to the miners of Silverhill—whom he appears today to have finally condemned to lose their jobs—that the German, French and Spanish industries will continue to produce 100 million tonnes of coal? Why are those countries' Governments so successful at subsidising their industries, while our Government sell our miners so short?

Mr. Heseltine: I am afraid that the hon. Gentleman is misinformed about what is happening to the coal industry in Europe. I, too, have looked at the figures and perhaps on Monday we shall have a chance to debate these matters. By and large, the coal industry is in decline across Europe and in Community countries such as ours.

Mr. James Pawsey (Rugby and Kenilworth): Can my right hon. Friend elaborate on the part of his statement that referred to privatisation? Can he say what interest the private sector has displayed in acquiring the pits that it is proposed to mothball? How many pits will be involved and how many jobs?

Mr. Heseltine: It is encouraging that we have received a number of inquiries, but it is fair to add that, at the stage that we have reached, such inquiries are bound to be tentative. My hon. Friend the Minister of State, in partnership with British Coal, hopes tomorrow to see a number of people who have approached us in the context of privatisation.

I very much hope that, as the position has now been clarified, we shall be able to see how far the interest that has been expressed can be extended. As I told the House, I have announced £1 million of Government support for those who want to prepare management buy-outs. As I have said before, I do not wish miners to buy into pits that have no significant future, as an emotional reaction to admittedly traumatic circumstances. I shall do my best to warn them of the difficulties; I think that that is only fair.

Mr. Michael Clapham (Barnsley, West and Penistone): Today's statement shows that the President of the Board of Trade has not been listening and has not been reading. He talks of the subsidy. The Select Committee suggested that the subsidy paid to British Coal as price support should be paid within the context of the franchise market, but there has been no mention of the franchise market. Has the right hon. Gentleman explored the possibility of extending that market? Has he examined the other recommendations to which my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Central (Mr. Caborn) referred? Has he looked at the conclusion of the Select Committee report, which states that there is a substantial market in excess of that which the Select Committee recommended for price support?

The Committee's recommendations add up to a market of 62 million tonnes, enough to keep all 50 collieries working. It should be borne in mind that seven of those collieries will be exhausted in the next five years. Will the right hon. Gentleman confirm that his recommendations, and today's statement, have more to do with preparing the industry for privatisation than with developing an energy policy?

Mr. Heseltine: Preparing the industry for privatisation is a very important part of an energy policy. I believe that, with hindsight, that will prove to have been the case with coal, as it has proved in so many other privatised industries that have been able to develop potential in the private sector that they were denied in the public sector.

I have considered the protection of the franchise, but I decided that it would not increase the size of the available market. I have said that the subsidy that we are prepared to make available is not dependent on extending the market. It is an offer that British Coal and the private sector—if it can find additional markets—are now able to exploit.

Mr. Barry Porter (Wirral, South): I am the one member of the Select Committee who did not vote for its report, on the basis that I thought that the extension of the market was on the optimistic side. I am grateful, however, to my right hon. Friend for dealing in detail with the Committee's recommendations. His response has been extremely realistic and sensible. I wish to thank him especially for the decision that has been made in respect of Connah's Quay and gas.

We must accept that there will be severe social difficulties in the mining communities. Will my right hon. Friend examine again, in the context of the entirety of the White Paper, what redundancy payments can be made to miners? Bearing in mind that it must be accepted that jobs will go, let us make the terms of redundancy as sensible and remunerative as possible, as we did for the dockers in days gone by.

Mr. Heseltine: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I hear what he says about not having voted for the central recommendation contained in the Select Committee's report. As I have done my best to praise that recommendation, I hope that he will not hold that against me when it comes to any decisions that the House might have to make.

The redundancy scheme that I announced last year is a generous one. It is almost without parallel anywhere else in the public or private sectors. It would be to let down the members of the coal industry who have accepted it over the past few months if I were now to increase the payments. The Government have no plans to increase the level of the already extremely generous redundancy scheme.

Mr. Mark Fisher (Stoke-on-Trent, Central): As the President of the Board of Trade has not mentioned the 10 pits that are to be closed, will he undertake to return to the House to make a further statement, or are they condemned to closure in silence? Does not he understand that the deep anger that people expressed following his closure statement in October 1992 will be refired and redoubled by his statement today? Last October, the British people expected the right hon. Gentleman to work for a proper, unrigged market for coal and an energy policy that made use of all our assets. What they have instead is a political stitch-up that will destroy industry and create only unemployment. Does the right hon. Gentleman realise that the British people will not forget the smirk that played over his face when he answered questions following a statement which condemned hundreds of thousands to unemployment in the years ahead? He smirks and they will suffer.

Mr. Heseltine: When the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues can get elected to speak for the people of Britain, I shall listen to what they say on behalf of the people of Britain. I reject the sneering and contemptible way in which he has dismissed one of the best offers that I have been able to make to the coal industry.

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): Is my right hon. Friend aware that what he has said this afternoon will substantially reassure the many hundreds of people who contacted me in my constituency last year? Does he agree that there is a conclusion that they could draw from his statement and the evidence to which he has referred? That conclusion is that the economic analysis that my right hon. Friend made last year was right then and is right now. He has enabled those within the industry to face the consequences of that analysis.

Mr. Heseltine: Certainly, my hon. Friend is right. The decision that I announced in October 1992 was an extremely harsh one, and I felt anguish at having to make it, but economically the arguments were clear. Public opinion took the view that it did. As a member of a democratic political forum, I would be the first to recognise the strength of public opinion in such circumstances. We have come forward, therefore, with a set of proposals that have the virtue of maintaining a realistic background but giving a new opportunity, at least in part, to significant parts of the industry. It is possible to do that only at a cost of hundreds of millions of pounds to the taxpayer. That means that other people in other industries will have to pay the bills that are necessary to make my announcement possible today.

Mr. George Stevenson (Stoke-on-Trent, South): Does the right hon. Gentleman understand that as a result of today's announcement, which must be described as one of the greatest examples of industrial butchery that the country has ever seen, he will qualify his nickname of Tarzan to become the political equivalent of Hannibal Lecter? He never mentioned the unemployment that will be created when the measures contained in the statement are implemented. Similarly, he did not refer to the fact that he has been presented with effective arguments on behalf of the 10 collieries that are earmarked for immediate closure. Those omissions will be seen as nothing short of a national disgrace and a betrayal of his commitment to intervene in the market.

Mr. Heseltine: The hon. Gentleman has heard me say many times that I cannot comment on the 10 pits that are subject to the consultative processes. British Coal must undertake those processes and reach conclusions on the basis of them. I cannot interfere in that.

Mr. Jacques Arnold (Gravesham): May I welcome the emphasis that my right hon. Friend put on measures to help large electricity users? Is it not the position that excessive electricity costs in heavy industry, such as the Blue Circle cement works, Scotts and other plants in my constituency, put thousands of jobs at risk? We have heard nothing from Opposition Members about jobs outside the coal mining industry.

Mr. Heseltine: My hon. Friend, as I would expect, seeks to preserve the proper balance. A huge number of customers and a great deal of British competitiveness are at stake as a result of the issues that we are discussing. There is an important opportunity to enter into discussions—I cannot predict the outcome of them—with the large users.

Mr. Derek Enright (Hemsworth): Did not the President of the Board of Trade have the opportunity to put in place a long-term strategy for energy? Instead, he has produced a mish-mash of contradictory tactics. I ask him a specific question concerning the 10 pits that are destined for closure. Bearing in mind the fact that the right hon. Gentleman has had much to say about the consultation process, will he condemn British Coal for announcing in its press release, on the day that it announced that it would undertake consultation procedures, that it would close all 10 pits? Will he defend the 10 pits from closure, or will he hand them over to his right hon. Friend Herr Himmler, the Secretary of State for Social Security?

Madam Speaker: Order. I am sure that the hon. Member will do the honourable thing and withdraw.

Mr. Enright: I shall certainly withdraw, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Heseltine: The hon. Gentleman may feel that his observations are not in keeping with the reality. He must be fully aware that I cannot and will not become involved in the slagging match that he requests over the management of British Coal.

Mr. Spencer Batiste (Elmet): In his welcome and balanced statement my right hon. Friend spoke of the continuing negotiations between the generators and the coal industry and of the privatisation process. In that context, will he be encouraging those who will be seeking to put pits and coal-fired power stations together so that coal can have more direct access to the energy market?

Mr. Heseltine: My hon. Friend understands one of the potentials. It is not easy to see precisely how to bring about what he says, but it is something that is on the table for discussion. Many complex arguments are involved and I have had discussions which have focused on them. There are no announcements that I can make today.

Mr. John Cummings (Easington): Is the President of the Board of Trade aware that the consequences of the closure of the Vane Tempest colliery and the mothballing of Easington are not confined to the many tens of millions of tonnes of coal lying under the North sea, which will never be extracted by means of an opencast operation? In Easington, with a population of 20,000, 1,693 unemployed people are chasing 12 vacancies. It is clear that unemployment will rise to over 20 per cent. Does not he believe that there are markets around the Thames and in Europe and that we can provide the necessary resources —for the benefit of the people of Easington and of Europe?

Has the right hon. Gentleman applied himself to the question of the pumping arrangements that are absolutely necessary in the county of Durham to prevent an ecological time bomb from going off? Will he join me in applauding the magnificent efforts of the miners since October last year? They have broken all productivity records—a fact that the right hon. Gentleman failed to mention.

Mr. Heseltine: The hon. Gentleman will know that more than 51 per cent. of the miners in Vane Tempest have already gone. I believe that some of them have already secured alternative employment.

The hon. Gentleman has raised an important subject which I happen to regard as one of the most tragic aspects of this whole affair. In February, the shortest month, British Coal mined at an annual rate of 60 million tonnes, with 10 pits not coaling and with 9,000 fewer workers. Had that escalation of productivity been going on earlier, British Coal would have been incomparably more competitive. The longer the Labour party denies this, the longer they deny the spirit and determination of the miners, who have to go and negotiate the supplementary contracts that I am talking about.

Mr. Stephen Milligan (Eastleigh): May I add my congratulations on my right hon. Friend's statement? I notice that it received a near-unanimous welcome among Conservative Members. It struck a balance between the interests of preserving coal miners' jobs at a time of high unemployment and developing a real market which is in the interests of other industries. Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is hypocritical of the Opposition to accuse the Government of rigging the market when it is their policy to keep every pit open, regardless of the economics and even if the coal has been exhausted?

What would be the likely cost in terms of jobs in other industries and the likely bill to the taxpayer if we adopted the foolish policies of the Opposition?

Mr. Heseltine: My hon. Friend is right. The Labour party is talking the language of opposition. It never talked that way when in government, when it closed pit after pit —and Opposition Members know it.

Mr. Eric Clarke: May I put the record straight? I have fought the pit closures imposed by all Governments, including the Labour Government. I am here today to say the same as I told the Labour Government in the past.

I am disappointed. This has been a wasted opportunity to maintain a viable coal industry and the freedom to have cheap indigenous fuel. I must tell the right hon. Gentleman that many bitter people back home will not even be disappointed, because they are cynical enough to realise that he is going to sell them out. How can the Secretary of State claim to have negotiated? The Government own 100 per cent. of the coal industry and 40 per cent. of the electricity industry, yet they cannot do a deal. The right hon. Gentleman must be some Minister.

Mr. Heseltine: The hon. Gentleman illustrates the dilemma. I do not dispute his sincerity in fighting for pit after pit. The real test, however, is whether his colleagues, if they were sitting on the Treasury Bench and had to confront the decisions that I face, would have acted any differently. They did not—and the hon. Gentleman's remarks clearly show that, although he fought, he always lost.

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson (Aberdeen, South): Is my right hon. Friend aware that he has today allayed the deep fears of tens of thousands of workers in the North sea oil and gas industries who know all too well that, had the Labour party had its way, the miners' subsidy would be their redundancy notice? Does he accept that I care just as passionately about the jobs in my constituency as Opposition Members care about the jobs in theirs? Just as it is unacceptable for them to tell their constituents to prepare for redundancy, it is unacceptable for me to go to mine and say the same?

Mr. Heseltine: There is no more eloquent case than the one that my hon. Friend has paraded. That is the dilemma. My hon. Friend represents a constituency at the heart of one of Britain's great industries. Am I to subsidise and keep going the pits, the effect of which will be to keep jobs in the pits which will be denied to the North sea oil industry? That is the choice; there is no escape from it. I therefore agree with my hon. Friend.

Ms Joan Walley (Stoke-on-Trent, North): The right hon. Gentleman is the President of the Board of Trade. He has had 14 years to produce a coherent energy strategy, but none has been forthcoming.

Why has not the right hon. Gentleman mentioned what is to happen to the 10 pits earmarked for closure? How can he pretend that the contracting procedure is nothing to do with him? He is the President. We need a proper energy policy. We do not want coal imports coming into our ports. We want a coherent opencast policy. What am I to tell constituents when they hear the results of this statement?

Mr. Heseltine: I think that I can help the House, because I have with me the "Plan for Coal" published in 1974—[Interruption.] This was the heyday of national planning; it was all about prediction—[Interruption.] I know that the Labour party does not want to listen, even though Opposition Members keep harking back to how they would have done things differently—forgetting what they actually did. So I shall tell them what they did. They published the "Plan for Coal". This is what it said—[Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr. Heseltine: On second thoughts, I will forbear. There is a debate on Monday.

Mrs. Jacqui Lait (Hastings and Rye): My right hon. Friend referred to special measures to help the large energy users. Has he any estimate of the number of jobs that would be lost in steel and chemicals if they were not recipients of energy at internationally competitive prices?

My right hon. Friend referred to the nuclear review. Can he give us an estimate of whether we can expect it this year?

As there is 14 per cent. unemployment in my constituency, can my right hon. Friend assure me that we will have a statement on the assisted areas map before we rise for the Easter recess——

Madam Speaker: Order. That last question is totally out of order. It should be addressed to the Leader of the House—if ever we get to business questions.

Mr. Heseltine: I can assure you, Madam Speaker, that I share your ambition to get to business questions.

My hon. Friend raises an important point about the large industrial users. They are a tough lot. They will tell me what they think potential job losses are. I have to stand back a little before accepting their forecasts hook, line and sinker, but I accept that there is a case. I intend to examine it in the way that I have described. My hon. Friend was right to bring it to my attention.

Mr. Harry Barnes (Derbyshire, North-East): Today we have witnessed a performance by the Secretary of State and he has promised us another on Monday. It was silly, knockabout, political stuff when what we needed was an act of statesmanship. That is what my constituents, many of whom are miners, want for their future.

The Opposition, the Liberal Democrats, the Nationalists and the Unionists should unite in opposition to the White Paper measures, and we hope that those in the Conservative party who say that they are rebels will join us.

Madam Speaker: Order. Ask a question, please.

Mr. Barnes: If we unite against the proposals successfully, will the Secretary of State resign?

Mr. Heseltine: My job is always at the disposal of the Prime Minister.

Mr. Keith Mans (Wyre): Will my right hon. Friend look again at the £95 million levy paid to EdF each year, with a view to stopping this money being paid to the French until they make it clear that it is being used to pay for the decommissioning of their nuclear power stations, not to subsidise their operating costs?

Mr. Heseltine: Complex discussions about all these matters are being held with EdF, so I ask my hon. Friend not to draw me too far on that one. The discussions have moved in a positive way and I will continue to hold such discussions—I hope, with the new French Government.

Mr. Chris Mullin (Sunderland, South): Is the President of the Board of Trade aware that I have constituents working in four of the pits on his original hit list and that they will not be under any illusions as a result of the statement? We have heard the nonsense about care and maintenance before when the right hon. Gentleman's Department came for our shipyards. There is now a large, deserted hole in the ground where the shipyards used to be. Everyone knows that, to understand why we are in the current situation, we need go back no further in history than to the moment of electricity privatisation. Would it be in order for the right hon. Gentleman to say a small "Sorry" for that folly for which we are all now paying the price?

Mr. Heseltine: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would wish me to convey his message to the 5,000 new job holders that I announced this afternoon.

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): During the past week, the Government have tried to justify VAT on fuel in terms of energy efficiency. In that context, what sense does it make to be burning large quantities of our gas resources in power stations with 40 per cent. efficiency, when that gas could be used in our homes and factories with 80 per cent. to 90 per cent. efficiency? Is not today's statement a frittering away of our gas resources? Does not it sound the death knell of the coal industry which we will desperately need in the longer term?

Mr. Heseltine: That argument was carefully explored by the Select Committee and the hon. Gentleman will find that it did not accept his analysis. However, I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will recall that the Labour party and the whole House are committed to achieving our environmental targets. We cannot achieve those targets without taking decisions about constraints on energy use.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): Will the right hon. Gentleman give me a little assistance? I represent a constituency which had two coal mines, at Bold and Sutton Manor, which have both now closed. The employees of those mines went to Parkside in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for St. Helens, North (Mr. Evans) which is now about to close. In other words, the mining fraternity has nowhere to go in St. Helens. Can the right hon. Gentleman tell me, so that I can tell them, what he is going to do for areas like St. Helens which have lost a whole industry?

Mr. Heseltine: What we did for Shotton, for Corby and for the whole of the south Wales mining industry. We will provide an opportunity for new investment, new jobs and diversity of hope and the opportunity to spread employment in a range of new industries that will cope with the market of tomorrow.

Mr. Boyce: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the people in the mining industry, in engineering and in all the other industries that will lose workers as a result of the plan are not the slightest bit interested in what happened 15, 20 or 40 years ago? They are interested in what will happen in the next six months. Is the right hon. Gentleman further aware that his squalid attempt to link the report of the Department of Trade and Industry with the report of the Select Committee, to which, after all, the Government referred the matter, fools no one? If he is serious about the Select Committee recommendations, why will not he follow the recommendation to return the 10 pits to coaling and go immediately into the review procedure? Or does the right hon. Gentleman not have the guts to do that?

Mr. Heseltine: I realise that it may be necessary for the hon. Gentleman to say those things. Of course the people who face the uncertainties and who may lose their jobs are not interested in what happened five weeks ago, let alone five or 15 years ago. That is not the real issue for the House. The issue is whether we should tell those people the truth and the truth was as clear and as truthful for the Labour party when it was in government as it is for me. I can no more save the industry artificially than the Labour party could when it was in Government. However, now that Labour is in opposition, it tries to pretend that that is not the case. If there has been a time when Labour refused to close pits because it had some magic way of saving them, I would listen to Labour Members. The Labour party has forgotten what it did.

Mr. Terry Lewis (Worsley): The right hon. Gentleman will accept from me that it would be grotesque in the extreme if Parkside pit, in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for St. Helens, North (Mr. Evans), was closed while, at the same time, British Coal was allowed to opencast what is essentially a huge area of green belt in my constituency and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Leigh (Mr. Cunliffe) in the not too distant future.

The right hon. Gentleman's contribution on opencast was a little disingenuous. He talked about 17,000 people being employed in the industry. In most opencast sites that I am aware of, there is also a downside. Many industrialists and businesses go out of business as a result of the intrusion of opencast in their areas. In addition, areas with hugh opencast sites discourage inward investment. There are two sides to the story and I urge the right hon. Gentleman to take that into account.

The figures to which the right hon. Gentleman referred do not bear any relationship, in terms of tonnage, to the information given by British Coal to the Select Committee.

Mr. Heseltine: The information that I gave to the House was the information that I received from British Coal. Naturally, British Coal will read what the hon. Gentleman has said. However, with regard to opencast, I hope that the hon. Gentleman heard my words because, frankly, they were almost indistinguishable from the comments that he made.

Mr. Mike O'Brien (Warwickshire, North): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that up to 20,000 people in north Warwickshire face the threat of opencast and that 587 miners at Daw Mill pit face redundancy? If he really wanted to save miners' jobs, should he not have accepted the Select Committee's plan virtually to halve the production of opencast by giving local people a veto—the right to say no to opencast?

Mr. Heseltine: The hon. Gentleman knows that we cannot just say that local people have the right to say no. There is no way of measuring how to judge the right of an individual to make such a decision, over a particular period or in which representative forum. We therefore have a planning regime. Hon Members will want to consider the new planning regime that my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment published this afternoon.

Sir Peter Emery (Honiton): Having sat through all the questions this afternoon, may I ask my right hon. Friend whether he will accept the point made by the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn), as I was the respective Minister before him? When the cable under the channel was first considered, it was to be introduced to bring electricity into this country for peak shaving purposes. Will my right hon. Friend also emphasise the fact that every Minister since Alf Robens has tried to present at the Dispatch Box a way in which the coal industry could save itself? That dates back decades. In my judgment, no Minister has tried, from the Dispatch Box, to put together a better package to assist the coal industry than my right hon. Friend has today.

Mr. Heseltine: Since I have been a Member of this place, I have been aware of my right hon. Friend's deep interest in and knowledge of the industry. I deeply appreciate what he said. We have done our best to respond to the work, which I have praised, of the Select Committee. We have tried to recognise that, in the end, it is about competitiveness and marketplaces, as the Select Committee indicated. We have given British Coal the best chance that we prudently think that we can, within the constraints of public expenditure, to go out and win a place in that marketplace. I cannot do more than urge hon. Members to encourage their constituents to recognise that there is a huge opportunity here, which is not to be disparaged or undermined by the language that Opposition Members have used to describe it.

Mr. Martin O'Neill (Clackmannan): May I remind the right hon. Gentleman that, on 21 October, he said that he would examine the ways and means to increase the use of coal? However, paragraph 31 of the report states that the increase in stocks, which I realise are not the right hon. Gentleman's responsibility as the good winter has been a major contributory factor, has resulted in the need for a reduction in coal output. He said that he cannot guarantee supplementary sales. Does he accept that the Minister for Energy, sitting next to him, has already indicated that there will be a 2 per cent. drop in coal output this year as a consequence of the imposition of VAT?

In all these matters, the statement today is a testament of failure. The right hon. Gentleman said that the coal industry, and anyone else who can do so, will have the opportunity to find new markets. No Opposition Member is impressed by the failure, after five and a half months of hand-wringing, to provide any new or substantial markets for coal.

Will the right hon. Gentleman tell us how many people will be made redundant as a consequence of the announcement? We know that six collieries will be placed on care and maintenance and that Maltby will go into development. Development work is not carried out by British Coal employees but by contractors. Will he say what will be the net effect on jobs at those seven collieries of the development work which is to be carried out?

A number of people are not prepared to be impressed by the failure that the right hon. Gentleman has announced or by his soft-soaping and avoidance of giving us the serious figures of the unemployment which will follow as a consequence of today's statement.

Mr. Heseltine: There has been an immensely depressing response from the Opposition. If the House were considering today a review by the Government, it would at least be understandable if it were criticised by Her Majesty's Opposition, but when an all-party Select Committe has crawled over every conceivable opportunity —and I have accepted the bulk of its recommendations —it is lamentable that the Opposition are now trying to wriggle away from what was an agreed all-party report. It undermines the credibility of the Select Committee procedures of the House.

I hope that the Opposition will not mislead their constituents into thinking that there is nothing in the opportunities of the sort that I have provided.

Mrs. Margaret Beckett (Derby, South): Does the Leader of the House recall that the Opposition have repeatedly asked for a statement on the coal industry, which the House has been promised from the early part of this year? We consider that it is an outrage that the statement should be left so late that the House has only between now and Monday to consider the White Paper and the options that the Government have put before the House. Will the right hon. Gentleman confirm that amendments to the Government's motion must be tabled tomorrow to be in order? When do the Government expect to have the motion ready so that we can scrutinise and amend it?

As it is inevitable that there will be less than 24 hours for hon. Members to consider what amendments they may wish to table, may I suggest to the right hon. Gentleman, with all the force at my command, that it is the duty of the Leader of the House and his colleagues to table a business motion—which it is only within their power to table—to allow Madam Speaker to consider selecting more than one amendment for debate and Division? That is the only way that we can be certain that hon. Members will have the chance, in the brief period open to them, to draft their amendments and to acquaint themselves with the range of options that might be considered by the House. As the President of the Board of Trade made such a feature of his approval of the Select Committee's report, I am sure that the Lord President will find it easy to accept such a request as, in effect, this is the only way in which we can be sure of a Division on that report.

Secondly, in view of what has been said in the House about stock-taking on the developments in Scotland—the way in which Scottish business will in future be handled—I ask the right hon. Gentleman to find Government time for a debate in which we can follow up the statement and consider its implications.

Will the Leader of the House give serious consideration to early-day motion 1596?

[That this House notes that the Standing Committee on Regional Affairs has not met since 26th July 1978; finds it inconsistent that there is a forum for English regions within the European Community but not one within Parliament; and calls upon the Lord President of the Council to refer appropriate matters to the Standing Committee on Regional Affairs, as provided by S.O. No. 100.]

It draws attention to the potential existence of a Committee of the English regions. There is considerable support from the Opposition side—and I suspect from the Government side—for the reinstatement of the Standing Committee on Regional Affairs, which has not sat since 1978. I ask the right hon. Gentleman to consider that.

Will the Leader of the House tell us when it is likely that we will have another Opposition day, and when he will be in a position to tell us the business of the House for the week after the Easter recess?

Mr. Newton: Taking first the right hon. Lady's remarks about the coal statement and intended debate, I hope that she will acknowledge that the statement on which my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade has just completed answering questions reflected a huge amount of work in a very complex area, and it understandably took more time than I suspect even he would have wished. The work needed to be done thoroughly, and it was right that he should make a statement in the House before the Easter recess. If that has meant a little less time than the right hon. Lady would have liked between the White Paper and the debate—I am sure that the House would have wished to have had that debate before the recess—I think that that is preferable to not being able to proceed before the Easter recess. We are now proposing, in the light of today's statement, to have the debate on Monday.

I hope that the motion will be tabled tonight in order to ease the problem to which the right hon. Lady referred. I will undertake to reflect on the other points she made, but that is very much without commitment and there will be discussions through the usual channels.

As to the Select Committee report, it is clear that the interrelationship between my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade's statement, the White Paper and the Select Committee report, and what my right hon. Friend said about it—subject to your judgment, Madam Speaker, at the time—means that reference to the content of the Select Committee's report would be bound to be in order in the course of the debate.

As to the right hon. Lady's request about Supply days and Scottish stock-taking, it is manifest that I cannot undertake to find time for either before Easter, but I will consider what possibilities there may be afterwards, particularly in respect of her understandable request for some Supply day time.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): I ask my right hon. Friend, for the second time, to find time next week to debate early-day motion 1222, which has been signed by hon. Members on both sides of the House.

[That this House deplores the growing number of vicious and mutilating attacks upon horses; notes the appalling suffering this causes to the dumb animals in question; and calls upon all who have a responsibility for or care about the welfare of horses and other animals to spare no effort to stamp out this sick and evil practice forthwith.]

Attacks on horses are increasing and are now happening from Yorkshire to Land's End. Horses are being killed, maimed, and brutally assaulted, including an attack yesterday on a racehorse that had its tongue cut out. These attacks are causing much concern all over the country and great distress to animal lovers and others.

Mr. Newton: Again, I am conscious of the persistent and proper interest that my hon. Friend has taken in the matter. I noticed another report of an horrific incident in the newspaper either this morning or yesterday—after last night, I am having a little difficulty in distinguishing between the two. I note my hon. Friend's request, but I cannot add to what I said in response to him last week.

Ms Liz Lynne (Rochdale): When can we expect an announcement about assisted area status? It is particularly important for the people of Rochdale who already have assisted area status, the loss of which would make it difficult to attract new businesses. Will the Leader of the House make time for a debate on that subject next week as a matter of urgency?

Mr. Newton: Again, that is a subject about which I have been asked several times in recent weeks when I have referred to the review to which the hon. Lady herself referred. Clearly, the Government are in no way anxious to delay the outcome on those important matters, but they, too, demand careful consideration. I regret that at present I cannot give the hon. Lady a clear indication about timing, let alone about the timing of a debate.

Sir Roger Moate (Faversham): Will my right hon. Friend find some way whereby the House can consider early-day motion 1489, on worldwide unitary taxation?

[That this House deeply regrets the continuing delay in resolving the use, by the State of California, of worldwide unitary tax; and calls upon Her Majesty's Government to implement the retaliatory provisions in section 812 of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988, if the issue has not been satisfactorily resolved by 31st December 1993.]

The matter is of such importance that it was initiated by leading Members of most parties in the House and has been signed by no fewer than 210 Members from all parts of the House. There is a general understanding that, if anything goes wrong, there could be grave consequences for British companies in the United States, for American corporations trading in the United Kingdom and for international tax treaties. Can we get the message through to the United States Administration that we must have President Clinton's support if things go seriously wrong in this important respect?

Mr. Newton: I am aware of the importance of the matter and my hon. Friend is right to say that the continued imposition of worldwide unitary taxation on United Kingdom-owned companies in California has been of great concern to hon. Members on both sides of the House for many years. My hon. Friend will well know that my right hon. Friends the Prime Minister, the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Foreign Secretary have all, within the recent past, impressed on their opposite numbers and others in the United States Administration the importance of an early solution to the problem.

I cannot at this moment promise a specific debate, but it occurs to me that the House is likely to spend some time in the not too distant future discussing the Finance Bill, and my hon. Friend's ingenuity will probably permit him to work out a way of raising the matter in the course of those proceedings.

Mr. Peter Kilfoyle (Liverpool, Walton): Will the Leader of the House answer the question put by my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) about early-day motion 1596 on the Standing Committee for the Regions?

Mr. Newton: I was conscious, even as I sat down, that there was something that the right hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) had said of which I had failed to make a note and had therefore missed in responding to her. I promise the hon. Gentleman and the right hon. Lady that that was not a deliberate attempt at evasion. However, I am afraid that they may find rather less than satisfactory my reply, which is that I am not persuaded at the moment that there is a sufficiently strong case for bringing back into use this procedure which, as the right hon. Lady said, it has not been found necessary to use since 1978. I do not rule it out, but at the moment I am not persuaded.

Mr. Patrick Thompson (Norwich, North): Bearing in mind that it is just over a year since the report of the Select Committee on Sittings of the House was ordered to be printed, and that that Committee, under the chairmanship of my right hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Jopling), made excellent suggestions on the timetabling of Government legislation and other matters, some of us are disappointed that we cannot make progress or have a debate on the matter. Can my right hon. Friend assure me that we will be able to make some progress at the earliest possible time?

Mr. Newton: I can certainly assure my hon. Friend that I have in no way forgotten or ceased to be concerned to make progress in the direction suggested by the report. He will know also that there is, as I have said several times in recent weeks, continuing interchange in the usual channels on the matter, but it has not yet been possible to make as much progress as I would like. In case it is the most recent events of parliamentary proceedings that are in my hon.

[Mr. Newton]

Friend's mind, I remind him that the proposals in the report did not relate to proceedings on Bills that are taken in Committee of the whole House.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): The Leader of the House and your good self, Madam Speaker, know that early this morning five of my constituents perished in a house fire in Auchendarroch street in Greenock. Four of those who died were brothers aged four, three and one, and their infant sister aged four months. I am sure that the House will extend its deep sympathy to the family, my constituents. The Strathclyde firemaster, Mr. John Jamieson, said that it was a tragedy and that they had all died for the sake of £5—the cost of a smoke detector.

The Secretary of State for Scotland has plans to lay regulations before the House concerning the installation of mains-operated smoke detectors in new houses. In the immediate aftermath of that terrible tragedy, may I ask the Leader of the House to impress upon his right hon. Friend the need to lay those regulations next week and to extend them, if he can, to existing houses in the public sector where most of these terrible tragedies take place?

Mr. Newton: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for courteously giving me notice that he wished to raise that matter if he had an opportunity to do so. I share entirely his sadness at this morning's tragic incident in Greenock when four young children and one adult died in a house fire, particularly as it comes so soon after a number of other fire fatalities in Fife in recent weeks. The Strathclyde fire brigade is investigating the full circumstances of the incident. In the meantime, I, on behalf of the Government, and I am sure on behalf of everyone in the House, endorse the expression of sympathy that the hon. Gentleman included in his remarks.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland has the issue under consideration and will bring forward regulations as soon as possible to make the fitting of wired-in smoke detectors compulsory in all new dwellings, but I am afraid that I cannot give the hon. Gentleman an immediate promise that that will happen next week.

Mr. Peter Luff (Worcester): Will my right hon. Friend join me in welcoming the excellent progress that we are now making on the European Communities (Amendment) Bill? What comfort can he give me about the prospect of time for debates on a wide range of other equally important issues which have been squeezed out by the disturbing delaying tactics used, I regret to say, by hon. Members on both sides of the House. I am thinking in particular of an early debate on law and order and a review of the Criminal Justice Act 1991, the shortcomings of which are becoming daily more apparent.

Mr. Newton: I share my hon. Friend's satisfaction at the further progress that we have been able to make in recent hours, or recent days, however one wishes to describe it, on the European Communities (Amendment) Bill. I would wish to have a little more evidence of continued progress before responding as openly as my hon. Friend would like, but I shall bear his request in mind. However, despite the pressures to which he has referred, I have found time—I accept that it was on a Friday—within the recent past for a full day's debate, effectively, on law and order matters.

Mr. David Trimble (Upper Bann): I remind the Leader of the House of a request for an early debate by my hon. Friend the Member for Belfast, South (Rev. Martin Smyth) and myself on the recent television revelations about the origins of the Provisional IRA, which confirm the widespread belief that successive Irish Governments assisted in the creation and support of that organisation and that successive British Governments knew about that and did not make an adequate response. Does the Leader of the House realise that his actions in building a wall of silence round this by refusing a debate and by blocking questions, confirmed by a letter that I received today, will only lead to the conclusion that the Government still have something to hide?

Mr. Newton: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will understand that I do not for a moment accept the implications that he chooses to read into what I have said on one or two occasions in recent weeks, what I think some of my right hon. Friends have said and what I have just written to him. I certainly shall not seek to add to that this afternoon.

Mr. Jacques Arnold (Gravesham): May we have a debate next week, before the Easter recess, on the rates of council tax set by individual local authorities for next year? During that debate we could highlight the fact that the average council tax set by Labour-controlled authorities is £100 higher than the rate set by Conservative-controlled authorities.

Mr. Newton: I need hardly say that nothing would please me more than to be able to respond to my hon. Friend's request, but I am afraid that I literally cannot find time for that specific debate. However, he is not doing badly himself in drawing attention to that important fact.

Mr. Roland Boyes (Houghton and Washington): Is the Leader of the House aware that there are groups of dreadful people who spend much of their time looking at and exchanging photographs of naked children in obscene poses? To get even more compromising poses, some sick people, who should be banned and locked up for ever, are using digital imaging techniques to create ever more terrible, obscene pictures. Will the Leader of the House co-operate with the Metropolitan police and with other police forces to get this practice stamped out and, more importantly, to get the perpetrators caught so that they can be locked up for life?

Madam Speaker: Order. That is barely a business question. The hon. Gentleman should be asking the Lord President whether there will be a debate on the matter.

Mr. Boyes: The Lord President has known me long enough by now.

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman is right to say that I have known him a long time. I not only bear him no ill will, but understand the spirit in which he has asked his question. He will understand that the proper response is for me to undertake to draw his remarks to the attention of my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary, which I shall do.

Mr. John Garrett (Norwich, South): The duty of the Leader of the House is to uphold the rights and privileges of the House. Does he think that he has carried out that duty with regard to the White Paper, "The Prospects for Coal: Conclusions of the Government's Coal Review"? Does he have any plan to improve the House's powers of scrutiny? If he has, will he make a statement?

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman makes his own point in his own way. I think that I have demonstrated in recent weeks a number of ways, some of which are better known in the usual channels than more openly, in which I have considered the interests of the House as a whole and of the Opposition parties in particular. I do not apologise for having contributed to the statement having been made before Easter and for having provided an early opportunity, on Monday next week, to debate it. I do not regard that as a failure of my responsibilities to the House; I regard it as the fulfilment of those reponsibilities.

Mr. George Howarth (Knowsley, North): Will the Leader of the House consider providing an opportunity as early as possible, preferably next week, for the House to discuss the role of receivers and liquidators in cases in which factories have closed and an alternative bid has been made? That would give me an opportunity to discuss the case of Pendleton's Ice Cream in my constituency. Following the closure of Clarke Foods, a viable business plan was put together by myself and others. The plan has been financed, and it has been supported by the Department of Trade and Industry and by the local authority, yet the receiver Robson Rhodes, headed by Mr. Ipe Jacob, has refused to reach a deal over a licence on the lease for the site. At this very moment, Nestlé is ripping out the machinery, plant and equipment, although there could have been a viable business on the site.

Mr. Newton: I cannot promise a debate on that matter next week. There are substantial opportunities for a wide range of matters to be raised within the business announced because we are due to have a number of Adjournment debates towards the end of the week. The hon. Gentleman may prefer not to or may be unable to raise the matter in that way. As he acknowledged by the direction of his gaze at one stage, my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Corporate Affairs has heard his remarks and will no doubt reflect on them.

Mr. Brian Donohue (Cunninghame, South): Will the Leader of the House make time next week for a debate on early-day motion 1669?

[That this House condemns the decision of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Home Secretary in intervening in the long standing successful pay formula adopted by the Fire Fighters National Organisation which has meant many years of trouble-free operation; and calls on the Government to support its continuation as failure to follow this advice may lead to a damaging unnecessary dispute.]

The motion has been signed by more than 170 Opposition Members. Given the long-term industrial peace among the fire brigades, does the Leader of the House agree that it is important that, at the very least, a statement on that important subject should be made by the Home Secretary?

Mr. Newton: My right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary, as I recall because the subject was raised at business questions last week, made a number of points in the wake of his meeting with a number of members of the firemen's union in the middle of last week. He made it clear then, and I make it clear now, that my right hon. Friends have made no decision to do away with the fire service pay formula, to which the Government are not a party. As the hon. Gentleman well knows, the Government's policy is that, in the current pay round, the pay rises of all public sector workers should not exceed 1·5 per cent. The Government do not consider that fire fighters should be an exception to that policy.

Mr. Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock): In contemplating future business of the House, will the Leader of the House have regard to the fact that this week alone the Government have made two major announcements which affect millions of people in south-east England—the statement in the House on the channel tunnel rail route, and yesterday, without coming to the House, the announcement of the east Thames corridor proposal? Does he agree that both those announcements justify a separate debate in Government time? If he feels unable to agree to that, will he contemplate a debate in Government time on south-east England, which was the battleground at the 1992 general election and will be at the next? A debate would give hon. Members on both sides of the House an opportunity to refer to the high levels of unemployment and of business failure in south-east England, and to discuss the proposals, parts of which are quite absurd and not in the best interests of the 10·5 million people living in south-east England outside Greater London.

Mr. Newton: I do not accept, despite the county we have in common, the thrust of the last part of the hon. Gentleman's remarks. The major infrastructure improvements about which we are talking are an advantage to many parts of south-east England and not simply to Essex and to Kent, although they happen to pass through those two counties and through parts of London. Leaving aside whether or not I agree with the hon. Gentleman, I cannot undertake to find time as he requested, but I shall bear his request in mind. I suspect that his request may interrelate with some of the suggestions made earlier about the Standing Order concerning a regional committee, or whatever one wants to call it.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): When will the Leader of the House be able to implement the recommendation of the Procedure Committee that we should have two weeks' business in one announcement? That would bring a little less chaos into our lives. Next Tuesday we are to have what is described as progress on the European Communities (Amendment) Bill—the 19th day. Last night, I saw Ministers with folding beds in their rooms in the House. Who pays for those beds? Are they available to Opposition Members? We may need them in future.

Mr. Newton: I regard it as progress, whether the hon. Gentleman does or not. I managed to snatch an hour or two's sleep in a chair and not on a bed, folding or otherwise. I slightly envy those to whom he refers.

Mr. Foulkes: Two weeks' business?

Mr. Newton: It is probably the relatively modest amount of sleep I had in a chair that is leading me to miss some of the questions. I do not seek to evade the hon.

[Mr. Newton]

Gentleman. I made some comment on that matter when we debated the Jopling report last July. It was not a report by the Procedure Committee in the technical sense. There are real difficulties about going as far as the Committee suggested in terms of the way in which we deal with Government business and the planning of the House's programme. I hope that it has been clear in the period since July, although I accept that this may be masked a bit at the moment by the European Communities (Amendment) Bill, that I have been making every endeavour to move in the direction that the Jopling report recommended in a number of matters, including having announced the Easter recess so far in advance that some people did not realise that I had announced it.

Easter Adjournment

5.58 pm

Madam Speaker: I have a short statement to make about arrangements for the debate on the motion for the Adjournment, which will take place on Thursday 1 April rather than immediately following the passing of the Consolidated Fund (No. 3) Bill. Hon. Members should submit their subjects to my Office not later than 10 pm on Tuesday 30 March. A list showing the subjects and times will be published the following day.

Normally the time allotted would not exceed one and a half hours, but I propose to exercise a discretion to allow one or two debates to continue for rather longer, up to a maximum of three hours. Where identical or similar subjects have been entered by different hon. Members whose names are drawn in the ballot, only the first name will be shown on the list. As some debates may not last the full time allotted to them, it is the responsibility of hon. Members to keep in touch with developments if they are not to miss their turn.

May I take the opportunity to remind hon. Members that on the motion for the Adjournment of the House on Friday 2 April up to eight hon. Members may raise with Ministers subjects of their own choice. Applications should reach my Office by 10 pm on Monday next. A ballot will be held on Tuesday morning and the result made known as soon as possible thereafter.

Mr. Stephen Byers (Wallsend): On a point of order, Mr. Morris. You will remember that, when the Committee met on 4 March, in response to a point of order by my hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton (Mr. Hamilton) about whether you would be in a position to permit a further debate on the protocol on social policy, you said that the nearer we get to a Division the better your position would be to judge whether to accede to requests for a further debate. As we have had the opportunity of spending 20 of the past 26 hours in Committee on the Bill, I assume that we are now substantially nearer to a Division. Do you intend to allow a further debate on social policy and, in that context, are you minded to rule new clause 74 in order?

The Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Michael Morris): I shall comment only on the substantive point that the hon. Gentleman raised. I am well aware of the Committee's concern about this matter, but I stand by my undertaking to make an announcement in good time.

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Stephen Dorrell): At our last sitting, we made good progress on the treaty's implications for Britain of economic and monetary union. Under the first group of amendments, we considered the implications for monetary policy of stage 3, if we choose to go that far.

Under the second group, we considered the implications for fiscal policy at stage 3. This group concentrated on the obligations and implications for our national law of the interim stage—stage 2 of the process of economic and monetary union. For Britain, stage 2 is different from stage 3 because, as the right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) rightly said at the beginning of the debate, we have a treaty obligation to move to stage 2 at the beginning of stage 2, which is envisaged in the treaty to be 1 January 1994. In addressing the question of obligations in stage 2, therefore, we are indeed addressing the obligations that will rest on Britain from the beginning of stage 2.

The right hon. Member for Llanelli said, I think, that he saw no clear divide between stage 2 and stage 3 within the treaty. I do not think that he meant to suggest that there was not a clear divide between the legal obligations that arise under stages 2 and 3, because it is clear from any reading of the treaty that there are fundamental and radical differences in the legal obligations. In stage 2, in so far as there is a Community monetary institution, it is the European Monetary Institute, not the European system of central banks. It is clear from the treaty that stage 2 envisages that monetary policy will remain a national Government responsibility.

In stage 2, as we discussed in an earlier group of amendments, the treaty's provisions on deficits do not have the teeth that are envisaged in stage 3. If one looks at the treaty's text on stage 3, one finds that, by that time, the EMI will have dissolved itself and become the European system of central banks. It is clear that, for at least 10 of the 12 member states, stage 3 involves a single currency and does not therefore involve national responsibility for monetary policy. It also involves clear enforceable powers in the deficit provisions that we discussed earlier.

It does not seem to be a sustainable argument that there is not a clear divide in terms of legal obligation between stage 2 and stage 3. I think that the right hon. Member for Llanelli was seeking to develop the argument that the web of obligations that is envisaged under the treaty is "seamless", and that the obligations that arise in stage 2, which are identifiably different from the obligations under stage 3, elide into each other in a way that does not allow for an effective break-point. He sought to argue, therefore, that it would be impossible for us to opt out of stage 3 because of the indivisibility of the obligations that arise between stages 2 and 3.

It must be accepted in all parts of the House that there is a clear and fundamental difference between the obligations as defined in stage 2 and those as defined in stage 3. The question is whether the United Kingdom protocol effectively allows us a break-point so that we can choose whether we move from the stage 2 obligations, which we have accepted, to the stage 3 obligations, which in the Government's contention we have not yet accepted.

Mr. Ted Rowlands (Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney): The hon. Gentleman has a fair case: the protocol makes it clear at what stage the break-point is reached. I am puzzled by the first paragraph of article 109j, which proposes that the Commission and the EMI will report on the progress of all member countries in moving towards EMU. That is not excluded from the process under the protocol, but it is under paragraph 2, because the United Kingdom will have to notify the Council before the Council makes an assessment under article 109j. Paragraph 1 of article 109j, which proposes a pretty formidable process, is not broken by the protocol.

Mr. Dorrell: I understand that the provisions of paragraph 1 of article 109j apply to all 12 member states, but the obligation under that paragraph is for the Commission and the EMI to report to the Council. I shall deal later with the nature of the convergence obligations that rest on individual member states. That is indeed a substantial issue, and I should like to go through that for the Committee so that it can be fully understood.

Sir Trevor Skeet (Bedfordshire, North): My hon. Friend has been dealing with the obligations that arise under stage 2, but there are a few others, such as responsibility for maintaining some connection with the EMS—he has already said that he proposes to rejoin at the first opportunity—and his obligation to exchange rates.

Mr. Dorrell: My hon. Friend is right that I have not sought to give an exhaustive list of the obligations that arise in stage 2. I sought to draw out three of the obligations that are clearly different between stages 2 and 3 to substantiate my proposition that are that there are clear and identifiable differences of obligation between the two stages. The question is whether we can make an effective choice not to move, if we choose not to do so, from stage 2, for which we have a treaty obligation, to stage 3, for which, the Government contend, we have no obligation.

Mr. Christopher Gill (Ludlow): Will my hon. Friend give the Committee a categorical assurance that the British opt-in will not be overturned by the European Court?

Mr. Dorrell: My hon. Friend can be assured that the protocol, which has been accepted by all 12 member states, would not be overturned by the European Court—for two reasons. First, no party would wish to take us to the European Court over that issue; secondly, the protocol is robust in law and makes clear the implications that are supposed to flow from it.

Mr. Tim Renton (Mid-Sussex): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Dorrell: Let me just finish dealing with the last intervention.

The terms of the protocol are clear. The first sentence reads:

"The United Kingdom shall notify the Council whether it intends to move to the third stage"

Mr. Renton: I am following with interest what my hon. Friend is saying, and I listened to much of the speech made by the right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) in the early hours of the morning. While there was much that he said with which I did not agree, at one point I thought that he was on, at least, interesting ground—the starting of the process leading towards the independence of the central bank.

I understood my hon. Friend to say clearly this morning that there was no intention of starting towards that process. I agree with moving towards an independent central bank, because I think that it would be better if monetary policy were run by a central bank that was more or less independent of us politicians. That is by the way. In this, at least, there is an elision between stages 2 and 3, to use the elegant word that my hon. Friend has just used. It is hard to envisage a process whereby we do nothing in this respect while we are holding our horses and deciding whether to move on to stage 3.

Mr. Dorrell: I hope that my right hon. Friend will forgive me if I do not answer that question now. I intend to address it later, as I agree that it was one of the substantial points that came up in the debate.

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): Will my hon. Friend comment on the information that the Treasury Select Committee received in Spain, France and Germany, where we visited the Finance Ministers and central bankers? They were all of the view that, if the pound continued to float and, as they put it, obtain an unfair competitive advantage, that would be contrary to their idea of the single market, and that they would use all political and legal pressures available to them to get us back into the ERM as quickly as possible. It is possible that, if we do not go back into the ERM after 1 January of next year, we shall come under severe pressure from our European allies.

Mr. Dorrell: I propose to make a little further progress in my speech before replying to my hon. Friend's point, so I shall have to give him the answer that I gave my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Renton). That is, that I intend to cover precisely that ground because I know that it is of concern to hon. Members. However, I shall do so at the point in my speech when I intended to deal with it because that is the best way to develop the argument.

The question is whether there is a break-point that allows use effectively to exercise the choice contained in our protocol. For 10 of the 12 member states, it is clear that there is no break-point. Stage 2 is envisaged, as I think it was put by the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) in a letter to me, as a bridge to stage 3. Ten of the 12 member states of the Community are under an obligation to cross that bridge, because they have a treaty obligation to join stage 3.

That is not the same as saying that there is no clear divide between the two stages. As I have said, radically different legal consequences flow from whether one is in stage 2 or stage 3. However, they are clearly obliged to move from stage 2 to stage 3, according to the terms of the treaty. For the United Kingdom and Denmark, however, the position is different. I hope that the Committee will forgive me if I do not enlarge at great length on the position of Denmark. I imagine that we are more interested in the position of the United Kingdom.

Not only are there radically different legal consequences for the United Kingdom, as for all other member states, between stage 2 and stage 3, but we have, as a result of the protocol and the provisions of our domestic law, a clear right to choose—subject to the provisions of the Bill, which require that the House of Commons passes an Act of Parliament before the Government can communicate the decision to join—whether we move from stage 2 to stage 3. That is the difference between us and the other 10 member states.

I shall deal now with the legal obligations that arise during stage 2. The key question during stage 2 is monetary policy. Some, like the right hon. Member for Llanelli, have argued that the effect of the terms of the treaty is to pass significant, if not all, amounts of monetary authority, even at stage 2, to the European Monetary Institute. I shall go through the treaty next so as to show that I do not believe that that is true.

Mr. Denzil Davies (Llanelli) rose——

6.15 pm

Mr. Dorrell: If I have misrepresented the right hon. Gentleman, I shall be happy to give way.

Mr. Davies: I did not say that. I said that the monetary institute was obviously going to prepare the way for monetary union, and had a considerable part to play. I accept that, until one gets to stage 3, the member states have the main jurisdiction.

Mr. Dorrell: In that case, I shall not dwell on the point at any length. I thought that the right hon. Gentleman was arguing that, at stage 2, there was a significant qualification of the monetary responsibility of major states. If the Committee accepts that, until we get to stage 3, the monetary authority in each member state is that member state's national monetary authority, I need not develop that argument at length.

I simply refer any hon. Member who is interested in that subject to article 3 of the EMI statute, the general principles article, which clearly states that anything in it is without prejudice. On page 104, article 3 states:

[Mr. Dorrell]

"The EMI shall carry out the tasks and functions conferred upon it by this Treaty and this Statute without prejudice to the responsibility of the competent authorities for the conduct of the monetary policy within the respective Member States."

Earlier, we debated the effect of article 8, page 107, of the EMI statute, headed "Independence", which covers the independence of the members of the council of the EMI. I conceded in interventions in the speech of the right hon. Member for Llanelli that that article was not a model of clear drafting. However, its effect is to safeguard the existing responsibility, within national law, of the members of the council of the EMI, in exactly the same way as is currently provided for in the Committee of Central Bank Governors. It is only the council as an institution that undertakes not to take instructions from community institutions or governments of member states.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): Will the Minister clear up a concern that I have about the review of monetary and financial situations of the member states? Am I right in thinking that, during stage 2, the monetary committee, as set out in article 109(2) on page 24, will have the right and the power to review the monetary and financial situations of all 12 states, whereas, when we reach stage 3, the monetary committee is to be dissolved and, in its place, we have an economic and financial committee? Is that committee responsible only for the reviewing of the monetary and financial situation of the 10 countries that have signed up to stage 3? Will it have the right to examine the financial circumstances of Denmark and the United Kingdom?

Mr. Dorrell: Both the monetary committee and the economic and financial committee have the right to examine the conditions in all 12 member states, because the monetary committee, re-formed under article 109c, is exactly the same body as currently exists, is regularly reported on television, and has its roots in the treaty of Rome. The functions of the monetary committee in the indents to which the hon. Gentleman was referring are not changed from the present arrangement; it is only the later indents that add new tasks to the activities of the monetary committee—that is, the last two indents of paragraph 1 of article 109c.

Mr. Michael Spicer (Worcestershire, South): Before my hon. Friend leaves the question of monetary restraints in the second stage, could he say something about article 109m, the question of the common interest as it affects the exchange rate, and the effect that that would have as a constraint on monetary policy, where the exchange rate is apparently being put first, and the monetary policy is subservient?

Mr. Dorrell: I hope that my hon. Friend will forgive me if I return to article 109m when I am addressing the question of the ERM. I am now concerned with the responsibility of the EMI and the extent to which it is a monetary authority.

I have sought to argue that the EMI is not in any meaningful sense of the term a monetary authority. If the Committee looks at article 109f(2), it will see clearly set out the tasks of the EMI in stage 2, and the two leading ones are to strengthen co-operation between national central banks and the co-ordination of the monetary policies of member states with the aim of ensuring price stability. We do not need at the moment to go into the question whether price stability is desirable. It is a co-operation and co-ordination role; it is not a policy-making role.

Mr. Peter Hain (Neath): I am grateful that the Minister is just as generous about giving way in normal debating hours as he was in the middle of the night.

On the specific points about the powers of the EMI and the argument that he is advancing, which puts up a Berlin wall between stages 2 and 3, which I dispute, I draw his attention to article 109j, on page 28, and in particular to the point that is made in the opening sentence:

"The Commission and the EMI shall report to the Council on the progress made in the fulfilment by the Member States of their obligations regarding the achievement of economic and monetary union."

We are still in stage 2, but the EMI is reporting on the progress that is being made in fulfilling obligations regarding stage 3. There seems to be a clear contradiction in the Minister's argument there, which shows that the argument that some of us have been seeking to advance —that stage 2 is a precursor to stage 3 and is almost umbilically linked to it—is correct.

Mr. Dorrell: I have not sought to argue that there is not an umbilical link. I have accepted the proposition that, to use a different metaphor, it is a bridge across which we have to pass to get to stage 3. The question is whether this country is under the same obligation as the other member states of the Community to pass over that bridge. The only obligation which arises under article 109j is an obligation to produce a report. The convergence criteria which are set out in that article and are refined in the protocol are criteria against which the report will be judged. That article, in itself, does not impose an obligation on any member state to satisfy those criteria.

I will come back to the question of convergence criteria, how they have developed and how they apply to individual member states later in my speech.

Ms Diane Abbott (Hackney, North and Stoke Newington): The Minister insists on using the analogy of a bridge; he says that stage 2 is a bridge over which member states have to pass. Would not a better analogy be a moving train, and is not the real question whether this is a moving train that we can leave at intersections between stages 2 and 3?

Mr. Dorrell: I am rather wary of analogies about trains and platforms on the whole subject of the European Community. So, if the hon. Lady will forgive me, I will stick to the bridge.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): Like my hon. Friend, I am not too happy about trains, but I want to ask him about bridges. Surely the question is how long the bridge is and at what point we expect to be on the bridge, and where on the bridge, at any given time. Any careful reading of article 109j shows very clearly, in my view, that, if this were to go to the European Court, it would determine clearly what point on the bridge we were supposed to be at.

Mr. Dorrell: I will, if I may, make a little more progress in my speech, because I suspect that members of the Committee are beginning to think that I am playing into the long grass with no intention of finding the ball again. That, I can assure them, is not true.

Mr. Barry Legg (Milton Keynes, South-West): One point that needs clarification is the fact that the first sentence of article 109j clearly states that member states have obligations. So I hope that we all accept that member states have obligations within stage 2.

Mr. Dorrell: Member states certainly have obligations within stage 2. Indeed, as I shall come on to discuss when we look at the question of convergence criteria, all member states have some obligations in this regard. The point that I shall seek to argue in a minute is that the obligations with regard to convergence criteria that rest on the two member states that have an opt-out from stage 3 are different from the convergence obligations that rest on the other 10 member states.

I come now to the point raised with me by my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Renton), the former Chief Whip, whom I always treat with great respect. He asked me to address the question of the independence of national central banks and whether it was true that we would be able to pursue the policy that I described as our policy—to maintain our existing arrangements for the Bank of England unless and until we decided to make the choice to move to stage 3. I will take the Committee through the relevant texts which the Government believe safeguard our right to leave the Bank of England in its present condition indefinitely, unless and until we choose to move to stage 3.

The first text that the Committee needs to examine is article 108, which says:

"Each Member State shall ensure, at the latest at the date of the establishment of the ESCB, that its national legislation including the statutes of its national central bank is compatible with this Treaty"— in other words, provides for independence.

Article 109e provides:

"each Member State shall, as appropriate,"— those were the two words that were regularly missed out by those asking me about these provisions earlier in the debate—

"start the process leading to the independence of its central bank, in accordance with Article 108"—

the article that we have just examined. The Committee could be forgiven for concluding that the significance of the words "as appropriate" is a little obscure, but those two words were written in to accommodate the fact that the United Kingdom, under its protocol, has no obligation to move to stage 3, and therefore no need to provide for the independence of its central bank within the terms of the treaty.

The key phrase is "as appropriate". It is the inclusion of those words which exempts the United Kingdom from what would otherwise be a treaty obligation to initiate a process to provide for the independence of the central bank.

6.30 pm

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): I cannot understand the compatibility between that and the other provisions of the treaty. The protocol on certain provisions relating to the United Kingdom says:

"1. The United Kingdom shall notify the Council whether it intends to move to the third stage before the Council makes its assessment under article 109j(2)."

We turn to article 109j which says:

"The Commission and the EMI shall report to the Council on progress made in the fulfilment by Member States of their obligations regarding the achievement of economic and monetary union."

That is in stage 2, and we will not be going into stage 2 until we give notice that we are not going into stage 3. This is before we have given that notice, and it says that the obligations

"shall include an examination of the compatibility between each Member State's national legislation, including the statutes of its national central bank and Articles 107 and 108 of this Treaty."

Mr. Dorrell: The hon. Gentleman correctly observed that the United Kingdom is under an obligation to give notice before the examination, which takes place, not under article 109j, paragraph 1 which we have been examining, but under article 109j, paragraph 2. That obligation arises from paragraph 1 of the protocol. Paragraph 10 of the protocol provides that, if the United Kingdom does not move to the third stage, it may change its notification at any time after the beginning of that stage.

In other words, the position is that we have to give notice before the examination under article 109j, paragraph 2, takes place. If we decide in that notice to join stage 3, clearly that is a commitment and we sign up to the obligation. If we decide not to join, that is without prejudice to our right to change our minds at a later date.

Mr. Mitchell: But the obligation and the examination of our national legislation including the statutes of the central bank, arise under article 109j(1), which we accept before article 109j(2) comes into force. It is under 109j(2) that we shall be giving notice.

Mr. Dorrell: Article 109j(1) does not of itself give rise to obligations. It provides that the Commission and the EMI report on the performance of member states against obligations which arise from outside that article. The argument that I am advancing is that, because of the inclusion in article 109e(5) of the phrase "as appropriate", the United Kingdom does not have an obligation to provide for the independence of its central bank.

Mr. Legg: We are getting to the heart of this point about the United Kingdom's obligations under stage 2. I think that references to the protocol and the United Kingdom option at this stage are probably not appropriate. The United Kingdom, to coin a phrase, is on a level playing field with other member states during stage 2. It may never exercise that opt-out. It is only when the United Kingdom exercises the opt-out that the United Kingdom becomes in a different position from the other 11 member states. That is what is at the heart of stage 2. If my hon. Friend is telling us that the United Kingdom Government intend to exercise their opt-out, as they could do, on 1 January 1994, I should be most interested to hear that.

Mr. Dorrell: No. I have said many times in the course of our debates that the United Kingdom Government do not intend to reach a decision about the desirability of joining a single currency or not doing so until we are far better informed about the nature of the circumstances in which that decision had to be made.

Mr. Budgen: On the construction of the words "as appropriate" in article 109e, paragraph 5, those are words to which my hon. Friend attaches considerable importance, but the important question there is surely who decides "as appropriate". Is it a subjective decision which is taken by the British Government, perhaps even assisted by the British Parliament; or is it a test of appropriateness which may be imposed upon us by some form of majority will, by the remainder of the countries of the EEC? It is by no means clear that it is a decision which is exclusively within our national power. Knowing, as we all do, the resentment felt against the United Kingdom because of the advantages gained by having a floating pound, it seems to me to be highly likely that "as appropriate" will be "as appropriate" as judged by the other countries.

Mr. Dorrell: All I am seeking is to explain the interpretation that was placed on the words that were written into the treaty by the people who signed it. The writing of the words "as appropriate" in that section of the transitional provisions chapter was intended to accommodate the fact that the United Kingdom protocol gave us a clear opportunity to make a decision later whether we were going to join the single currency or not.

Mr. Gill: May I remind my hon. Friend of the answer that he gave me when I intervened previously, when he said that he could not think that there would be any other nation that would wish to take this nation to court over the justiciability of our opt-out? Is the Minister saying that he cannot envisage circumstances under which other nations of the Community recognise that we have a competitive advantage as a result of the floating exchange rate referred to by my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen), and that they would not therefore wish to take us to court to invalidate the opt-out?

Mr. Dorrell: The point I was seeking to make was that our Community partners unanimously signed up to a United Kingdom protocol which says, in terms, that the United Kingdom is not obliged to join stage 3. The more important of the two points I made in reply to my hon. Friend's earlier intervention is that we are absolutely confident that the protocol is enforceable at law, that its terms are clear, and that there cannot be any reasonable doubt of what the people signing the treaty meant the words to mean.

I want to move on now to deal with convergence, because it is another of the issues which have been raised and about which there is concern in some parts of the Committee. My first point is to stress that the concept of convergence is not new in Community law. It was not invented at Maastricht, or even in the years before Maastricht. When I asked for a trace of the development of the concept of convergence, I was taken back to article 2 of the treaty of Rome, which was signed 36 years ago today.

Article 2 of the treaty of Rome says:

"The Community shall have as its task, by establishing a common market and progressively approximating the economic policies of member states" to promote the Community, and so forth. Progressive approximation of economic policy of member states was there in article 2 of the treaty of Rome. It was developed by a Council decision dated the 18 February 1974, which provided in loving detail that the Council was going to hold three meetings yearly

"to examine the economic situation in the Community, to adopt guidelines for the economic policy of the Community which each member state" had to follow in order to achieve harmonious economic development and so forth. I will not read the whole decision to the Committee, but in that decision of February 1974, there is not the slightest doubt that there was a clear political will to establish a machinery by consent to take the concept of convergence significantly further.

That decision was replaced on 12 March 1990 by a further Council decision headed "Decision on the Attainment of Progressive Convergence of Economic Policies and Performance during stage 1 of Economic and Monetary Union". Once again, I shall not burden the Committee with the precise commitments and provisions of that decision. It was clearly intended to promote the concept of convergence. In fact, it is the Council decision that first introduced the concept of multilateral surveillance, which finds further expression in the treaty. The principle of convergence criteria—the principle that, as a member state of the Community, we have accepted obligations going right back to the treaty of Rome to approximate our economic policies alongside those of other member states—is not new, and it should not come as a surprise to the Committee.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): It may or may not come as a surprise to the Committee, but I am sure that my hon. Friend knows that, in the past, this has always been a pious statement of intent. In terms of achieving anything, there is much more divergence than convergence, and it looks as if that will continue to be the case for a year or two. What is new is that the Commission has the right to initiate beastly reports, which can be put to the Council. By a majority vote, we can have our wrists slapped—a totally undignified state for a sovereign nation like the United Kingdom to find itself in. This is not the slightest bit necessary unless we decide to go for stage 3. Why is it happening so early?

Mr. Dorrell: It is not true to say that there is something new about the idea that the Commission may launch inquiries into the activities of member states. Article 3 of the decision of March 1990 says:

"Multilateral surveillance shall focus on the macro-economic and micro-economic and structural policies. This surveillance will be conducted by the Council on the basis of reports and analyses submitted by the Commission. These shall include:—indicators of economic performance, including monetary and budgetary policies such as supply and demand trends, price and cost developments, employment, regional development, financial markets, public finance, monetary aggregates, interest rates, exchange rates and external imbalances."

That is a pretty impressive list, which is already the basis of reports submitted regularly by the Commission to the Council and considered regularly, before ratification of Maastricht, at meetings of ECOFIN.

Mr. Ron Leighton (Newham, North-East): Is not the difference that dates are now being set and that Governments are expected to do something? Especially now that we are in recession, attempts by Governments to satisfy convergence criteria will be very deflationary and extremely damaging.

Mr. Dorrell: It is not part of my argument that there is no difference. For the moment, I am seeking to establish that we had already travelled a substantial way down the road of convergence before getting to Maastricht. What is the nature of the new obligations assumed at Maastricht? Here, I want to develop a point that I made a moment ago. The convergence obligations that rest on the 12 member states as a consequence of Maastricht are divided. The convergence obligations of the 10 member states that are committed to moving to stage 3 are different from those of the other two member states—the United Kingdom and Denmark—which do not have an obligation to move to stage 3.

Mr. Budgen: The recommendations and findings of this committee, if published, might have a very considerable and adverse effect upon the Government's capacity to borrow large sums of money. The £50 billion that the Government propose to borrow next year is massively outside the convergence provisions. I know that my hon. Friend, in his loyal way, would have made a great deal of the then Labour Government's borrowing requirement —much smaller than the current figure—and of their humiliation at the hands of the IMF. Does not my hon. Friend agree that we shall suffer humiliation at the hands of our European partners, and will not this make it even more difficult to raise such an enormous amount of money?

Mr. Dorrell: I should like to make a minor point of detail. My hon. Friend is not quite right to say that the Budget deficit of the period 1974-79 was lower than the one that we are running now. In fact, at that time it peaked at more than 9 per cent.—[Interruption.] It is projected to be just over 8 per cent., which is less than 9 per cent. This is a nit-picking point.

Mr. Budgen: The important point is the market point.

Mr. Dorrell: My hon. Friend is on to a good point when he says that there is clearly a difference between a report being prepared and considered in private in ECOFIN and a report being made available, with opinions expressed to the wider world. That arises mainly as a policing mechanism under the budget deficit provisions, which we discussed in the debate on an earlier group of amendments.

As I said in that debate, the purpose of those budget deficit provisions is to recognise that, if we move to stage 3, each nation state in a single currency area will have an interest in reasonable official deficit performance on the part of the other nation states in the area. If official borrowing in a part of a single currency area were to go out of control it would lead to market distortions and possibly to market disturbance, which would damage the interests of member states other than the one that was running the excessive deficit.

Mr. Bill Walker: I should like to draw my hon. Friend's attention to article 109k(6), which says quite clearly:

"Articles 109h and 109i shall continue to apply to a Member State with a derogation."

Does that mean that at stage 2 we would have an IMF-type obligation, particularly with regard to our balance of payments?

Mr. Dorrell: Articles 109h and 109i deal with balance of payments assistance. They are already in the treaty. Of course, they will become otiose at stage 3, as it will not be necessary to give balance of payments assistance to one part of a single currency area.

Sir Trevor Skeet: I am following this argument very closely indeed. The Minister has been developing a point about the revision of the treaty of Rome under article 2. But the final revision, which appears in this treaty, says:

"The Community shall have as its task . . . a high degree of convergence of economic performance".

There is a convergence obligation, which will go right through state 2.

Mr. Dorrell: My hon. Friend confirms the point that I was seeking to make. There is indeed a Community convergence obligation. The word used in 1957 was "approximation", which I have interpreted as having substantially the same meaning as "convergence". There has been a commitment to convergence since the day the Community was established. As the Community has developed, more meat has been put on the concept of convergence, and we now have a clearer understanding of its meaning.

Dr. Lynne Jones (Birmingham, Selly Oak) rose——

Mr. Dorrell: I want to make a little more progress. I have already been speaking rather longer than was my intention. However, I promise that I shall give way to the hon. Lady before finishing.

I want to consider the nature of the convergence criteria that are the consequence of the Maastricht treaty. The 10 member states that are committed to stage 12 are committed to crossing the famous bridge. The conditions set out in article 109, which are elaborated in the protocol, take the form of conditions precedent for the establishment of a single currency.

The obligation that rests on the 10 member states which are obliged to join the single currency is an obligation to match those convergence criteria because they are under an obligation to join the single currency. They are therefore committed to the criteria, and there is a clear date and mechanism for their establishment. In the case of ourselves and Denmark, there is not a treaty commitment to join a single currency. So there is not a treaty base obligation to satisfy those specific convergence criteria. That is not to say that this country is not subject to a commitment to converge. I have already accepted that it is.

Nor would I argue that the Maastricht treaty makes no difference to our convergence criteria. I accept the proposition of my hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, South-West (Mr. Legg) in an earlier debate that the words will be interpreted in context. It is true that the convergence criteria set out in the treaty will influence an understanding of the nature of this country's convergence commitment. But it is significantly different from the convergence commitments of those 10 member states which have a treaty obligation to move to stage 3, because we have not committed ourselves to the enforcement mechanisms of the convergence criteria to which they have committed themselves.

Mr. Shore (Bethnal Green and Stepney): We have committed ourselves to an obligation to converge, and we have accepted coercive measures which will operate if we do not converge. One such coercive measure is the weapon of publicity and public condemnation. So we are being, as it were, forced to converge, even if it is not the same kind of coercion as the treaty obligation imposes on the other 10.

Mr. Dorrell: The right hon. Gentleman accepts that there is a fundamentally different convergence commitment resting on this country compared with the other 10 member states.

Mr. Andrew Smith (Oxford, East): I wish to follow up a point made earlier by my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Leighton). I accept that the nature of the obligation is different for the 10 than for the two, but there are obligations on the two in the sense that if the United Kingdom wished to move to the third stage, we would, by a certain date under the provisions of the protocol and the treaty, have had to have done certain things.

I put to the Minister the example of the protocol and convergence criteria which would require member states to have been in the narrow band of the ERM without severe tensions for two years. Is it not a fact that if we were to move at the earliest opportunity to stage 3—that is, by the first examination—we would have had by 31 December 1996 to have been for two years in the narrow band of the ERM, so that we would have had to have taken the decision to enter the ERM by 31 December 1994?

Mr. Dorrell: It depends on the date on which stage 3 comes into force, and there is not a fixed date in the treaty. To satisfy the convergence criteria, one must have achieved the objectives for a given time before the point is reached at which one joins stage 3. So the answer to the hon. Gentleman's question is that it depends on the date on which stage 3 comes into effect, and there is no fixed date in the protocol which commits us to reach a conclusion on our opportunity to change our mind.

Several hon. Members rose——

Mr. Dorrell: I will not give way again. I have permitted many interruptions, and I am anxious to conclude my remarks. [Interruption.] I recall promising to give way to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Dr. Jones).

Dr. Lynne Jones: I think the Minister accepts that we are obliged to try to meet the convergence criteria, whether or not we decide to go on to stage 3. That implies that we should be joining the ERM or at least pegging the pound to the ecu.

Mr. Dorrell: I do not accept that. I made it clear that I regard the protocol as giving this country a clear choice, on the terms set out in the protocol, whether to join the single currency at a date of our own choosing. The opportunity for this country is that, under the terms of the treaty, we have the opportunity to influence the nature of the single currency. That is the main chance negotiated by the Prime Minister at Maastricht which I am keen for this country to safeguard.

Mr. Cash: On a point of order, Mr. Lofthouse. The Minister makes certain allegations about the date on which the single currency comes into effect. Under the protocol which is adjacent to our opt-out, it is clear that it comes into effect on 1 January 1999. We cannot veto it, and it is irrevocable and irreversible, so——

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. That is in no sense a point of order for the Chair, and the hon. Member knows it.

Mr. Andrew Smith: It is over 25 hours since we began debating the economic groups of amendments. I have said before that it is appalling that, on issues of such importance, we are forced by a combination of the Government's preference and a deal done by the Government with the Liberal Democrats to discuss the issues in a condensed way when hon. Members are tired and we do not have a full opportunity to explore many important matters. Whatever view hon. Members take of the treaty or the Bill, this is a disgraceful way in which to handle such important matters.

I need not detain the Committee for long, not least because much of the territory of the debate overlaps the discussion of earlier groups of amendments. My right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) took us on a prolonged, perceptive and entertaining tour of the transitional provisions and the protocol of the European Monetary Institute. So entertaining was he that, despite the hour, we were disappointed when, in midstream, he leapt from article 8 to article 23 of the protocol.

My right hon. Friend made great play of the Financial Secretary's description of the Red Book as a set of multi-annual programmes. That was an apposite phrase, considering that this year we have had a multi-annual Budget containing multi-annual tax increases, providing for increases this year, next year and the year after that.

A consistent theme throughout my right hon. Friend's speech dealt with a question which the Government have refused to answer—whether they propose to take the steps necessary to move towards stage 3 of economic and monetary union. When, if at all, do they intend to take that decision? I had hoped that the Financial Secretary would give at least a hint of an answer.

Nor could the Financial Secretary give more clarification of the position of the poor old Governor of the Bank of England under article 8 of the protocol on the European Monetary Institute. He left us with the curious understanding that each of the governors could take instructions from their member states as individual members of the Council, but that none of them could take instructions in their collective capacity as members of the Council.

That was unconvincing and was typical of those whom my right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli called the Januses on the Government Benches. The measure means either that the governor can be instructed or he cannot. To imagine the capacity in which he can be instructed as a member of the Council is fanciful beyond credibility.

Mr. Leighton: I got the impression from the Minister's response that he is rather agnostic about what we are debating. Does my hon. Friend support the convergence criteria? Does he think that they make sense, considering that they are all monetary in form? They are not concerned with real convergence in terms of growth, output and employment.

Mr. Andrew Smith: I made it very clear in responding to the previous debates that, taking all these criteria together, considerable reinterpretation and reapplication of the criteria is necessary and I intend to develop this point further towards the end of my contribution.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: I am grateful to my hon. Friend because he is generous in giving way, but we are eager on these Benches to know how many basic Labour party principles are going to be chucked away in our enthusiasm for this monstrosity of Maastricht. Would we as a Labour Government, if we were in power, or do we as a Labour party in Opposition, want to invoke the protocol, or do we want to move straight away with the others, as opportunity allows, to stage 3 and to full monetary union?

Mr. Smith: I can best answer that by citing the policy approved by the Labour party conference, which is:

"Conference believes that the Maastricht treaty, while not perfect, is the best agreement that can currently be achieved."

That is the basis of our policy and of our approach. I have been through on a number of occasions, and I will return to it later in my speech, the particular importance that we attach to the provisions of article 2a and the goals of high employment and social protection.

Mr. Hain: My hon. Friend has laid great stress—and he has done so with considerable coherence—on the need for flexibility in interpreting the targets, convergence criteria and so forth. Does he apply the same flexibility to that Labour party motion?

Mr. Smith: I do not, because all of us are lectured on the Labour party manifesto and, as members of the party, it is incumbent on us to take very seriously the policy passed by our party, especially something, I might add, that was passed by such an overwhelming majority.

Ms Diane Abbott (Hackney, North and Stoke Newington): All of us sitting behind my hon. Friend are impressed with his reverence for party conference decisions——

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): And we will remind him of it.

Ms Abbott: —but does he agree that when conference passed that resolution the text of the treaty was not before it?

Mr. Smith: I think that hon. Members knew full well what they were voting for when they voted for that resolution. [Interruption.] It is not as though arguments within our party, as well as among the public at large, on many of these issues have not continued for some time. I have great confidence and trust in the good sense of ordinary Labour party members when they vote for resolutions at conference.

Mr. Ken Livingstone (Brent, East) rose——

Mr. Smith: I would like to make some progress with my contribution.

I agreed strongly with the points made in the excellent speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Attercliffe (Mr. Betts), a speech which was all the more impressive as its quality betrayed no hint that he had been here all night, waiting to make it. The core of his argument was that Britain will be better able to take effective action for sustainable growth, for jobs, for investment and for environmental protection if we do so within the framework of Maastricht than if we attempt to do so outside it. That is the crucial choice.

Of course there are many things in the Maastricht treaty that we do not like. Of course many of these criteria must be subjected to further interpretation. Of course the whole question of the pace of progress towards economic and monetary union must be carefully examined. But, when it comes down to it, the choice is whether we are better off and can better serve the people of this country in moving towards the goals to which we all aspire by being part of the Maastricht process or whether we should turn our faces against it. Like my hon. Friend the Member for Attercliffe, I believe that we would better serve the people by being part of Maastricht.

My hon. Friend the Member for Attercliffe also rightly pointed out that the Government were directly responsible for many of the weaknesses in the treaty which have been the subject of debate in this group, not least because the Government squandered a great deal of negotiating capital, for example, on securing the wholly damaging opt-out from the social chapter which we on the Opposition Benches are determined to continue to seek to reverse.

Let me turn to our Front-Bench amendments in this group, which have not been a focus of the debate so far. They are important and I want to stress them. Amendment No. 35 would ensure that in the event of the United Kingdom satisfying the necessary economic convergence conditions and other member states deciding to move to stage 3, Parliament would have an automatic opportunity to decide whether this country should proceed to stage 3 and full economic and monetary union. We regard that as a very important amendment and wish to press it to a vote.

As the treaty and the Bill stand, it will be up to the Government to decide whether to propose to move to stage 3. It is left open to them simply to choose not to do so if they so wish. In this way, Parliament could be excluded from a decision which would or could consign the United Kingdom to the second division in Europe. It is surely right, whether or not the Government wish to proceed to stage 3, that the House should have the opportunity to express its view on this decision. That is why we regard the amendment as so important.

Amendment No. 420 is also important in seeking to strengthen and clarify the role of the European Council of Finance Ministers, ECOFIN, in the formulation of economic policy. I do not intend to go over all the arguments and discussions that we had in the night on the importance of ECOFIN. This amendment seeks to ensure that the Government do everything possible to see that the economic objectives of article 2, for which ECOFIN has responsibility under articles 102a and 103, are fully realised.

Should the amendment be carried, the Government would have to inform Parliament of their contribution to ECOFIN in the co-ordination of economic policy and in the achievement of a high level of employment and social protection provided for in article 2, as well as reporting on the work of the European Monetary Institute in preparation for economic and monetary union.

These matters are important. We have argued all along that the overall responsibility for economic policy must remain with elected Ministers, accountable to the European Parliament and to their own national Governments and Parliaments. ECOFIN must become an effective political counterpart to the European central bank. I therefore strongly urge the Committee to support that amendment.

Mr. Marlow: The hon. Gentleman said a few minutes ago that some of the provisions of the treaty needed amending. He has now made a suggestion. He says that ECOFIN must have political control. How will he secure those amendments to the treaty? How will he ensure that ECOFIN gets economic control? These are very detailed provisions in the treaty. How confident is he that, once the treaty is ratified and becomes the bible of the Commission and the European system of central banks, he will be able to get any change out of it? And if he cannot get any change out of it, why does he take it on trust and vote for it now?

Mr. Smith: These amendments do not seek to amend the treaty. They seek to amend the Bill and therefore to determine how the Government—this Government or a future one—should behave in operating the provisions of the treaty, and that is very important indeed, just as, for example, in the previous group, the effect of new clause 56 would have conditioned the information that the United Kingdom supplied to the Commission for the purposes of the evaluation of our compliance or otherwise with the excess deficit procedure. These are not trivial matters: they are important matters both of substance and of signalling the way in which we on the Opposition Benches believe that the treaty might be implemented so as to serve the best 16interests of the British people as well as of the people of the rest of Europe.

Mr. Cash: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is going in the right direction in trying to improve political accountability; for heaven's sake, Conservative Members regard that as probably the most important central question. We do not want our monetary affairs to be taken over by unelected, unaccountable bankers, but that is what will happen, and that is what the Government are allowing.

Nevertheless, what the hon. Gentleman has just said does not solve the problem. He must bear in mind the fact that the treaty itself has been implemented in European law and that that basis will determine the manner in which it is implemented in the United Kingdom under section 2 of the European Communities Act 1972. I am afraid that the hon. Gentleman is putting the cart before the horse. He has fallen into a trap and his argument has collapsed. He is saying, "We would like to have a system in the United Kingdom that would enable us to implement what we wanted."

Unfortunately, when the matter gets to the House of Lords and, subsequently, to the European Court of Justice, the hon. Gentleman will find that he has been caught and will have to do what the European Community has already decided by treaty. That is the problem that the hon. Gentleman is up against—although I entirely agree with the direction in which he is moving.

Mr. Smith: If the hon. Gentleman agrees with the direction in which the amendments are going—even if he does not accept the reason for which they were tabled—I suggest that the best way of expressing that view is to vote for them. In his lengthy intervention, however, I detected signs of what we already know: that he is absolutely opposed to the way in which the European Economic Community, and subsequently the European Community, has developed. The hon. Gentleman makes no secret of the fact that he objects to the idea of a more closely integrated European Community.

Mr. Cash: The hon. Gentleman cannot get away with that. I have always wanted the European Community to work effectively: indeed, the Foreign Secretary invited me to write a paper on the future of Europe for the Conservative manifesto committee. In that paper, I said that I wanted the Community to work—and, moreover, I voted for the Single European Act. I will not allow the hon. Gentleman to get away with the suggestion that I do not want the European Community to work simply because I do not want this crazy treaty, which will make Europe dissolve and implode.

Mr. Smith: If the hon. Gentleman wrote the part of the Conservative party manifesto that dealt with this issue, he clearly made a bigger hash of it than those who drafted the original Maastricht treaty, given the consequent division and confusion in Conservative policy on such matters. [Interruption.]

The Second Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Dame Janet Fookes): Order. We cannot have seated interventions criss-crossing; it makes for confusion.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Dame Janet.

Let me return to the amendments and new clauses that we wish to press to a vote. New clause 56 aims to ensure that the Government are accountable to Parliament in their fulfulment of the criteria for economic and monetary union. It would require them to observe the need for proper programmes to achieve the objectives of article 2 as they pursue those criteria.

At the heart of the amendments and new clauses, and those in earlier groups, are the provisions of article 2, the bridge between stages 2 and 3 and the way in which those stages can be tied to article 2—which, after all, sets the European Community's task. Article 2 asks for "sustainable and non-inflationary growth . . . a high level of employment and of social protection, the raising of the standard of living and quality of life".

The Labour party believes that those aims are crucial to progress towards economic and monetary union. Through all the amendments and new clauses to which I have referred, we seek to tie the United Kingdom's interpretation of policy under the treaty more closely to the goals that I have quoted, so that there can be no doubt about the force for social and economic progress that we want our participation in the Community to realise.

Mr. Legg: We have heard some excellent speeches, particularly that of the right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies). He told us a good deal about stage 2, the obligations involved in it and the convergence criteria that we are required to follow. By covering so much of the ground, the right hon. Gentleman has made it much easier for me to make my speech.

Let me begin by addressing article 109j—which has been subject to some debate in the Committee—and article 109e. Article 109j sets out the stage 2 obligations for member states: they cover price stability, Government deficits and membership of the exchange rate mechanism. I commented during my intervention on the Financial Secretary's first speech that under stage 2 the United Kingdom has the same obligations as all other member states. Under the protocol, we have the possibility of exercising an opt-out during stage 3 so that we do not move to a single currency; but that will not happen until stage 3. We may or may not exercise the opt-out. I contend that, until we do so, we shall be on a level playing field with all the other member states.

Yet again my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary has shown a positive attitude, suggesting that Britain wants to be at the heart of Europe and to play a full role in stage 2. The wish to ensure that Britain can influence developments that are happening at that time confirms my view that we are at one with the other 11 states in regard to stage 2.

I know that Ministers such as my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary—and, indeed, the Economic Secretary—often say that the criteria involved are admirable in themselves. Price stability? All Conservative Members agree that we want low inflation. Low Government deficits? Again, Conservative Members generally approve of that. The Committee must, however, accept the overall scheme of the treaty. In fact, the convergence obligations are secondary; the primary obligation is economic and monetary union. We are going through the process of convergence so that we can take part in, and be a full member of, economic and monetary union. That is the rationale of the treaty.

Sir Trevor Skeet: The convergence obligation arises from article 2, but does not my hon. Friend agree that a number of subordinate obligations are involved—for instance, the obligation to return to the exchange rate mechanism at the earliest opportunity? Obviously, we cannot subscribe to the conditions in article 109j unless we are within that arrangement. Moreover, we must have an exchange rate obligation.

Mr. Legg: My hon. Friend has raised a number of interesting and vital points, with which I shall deal later.

Let me retun to our obligations in the treaty, including our obligation to achieve economic and monetary union. My hon. Friend the Financial Secretary claimed that the treaty made no major change in economic obligations; he even suggested that member states should have foreseen all this when the treaty of Rome was signed 36 years ago today. Surely my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary is overstretching his argument.

Mr. Denzil Davies: I ask a question which perhaps I should have put to the Financial Secretary, who was arguing, apparently, that the conditions did not apply to the United Kingdom because there were conditions precedent, as it were, for those who wanted to enter stage 3. Has the hon. Gentleman noticed that the four criteria are described as criteria, and that to enter stage 3 it is necessary to fulfil the necessary conditions? Can he find anything that links the conditions to the criteria?

Mr. Legg: No, I cannot. The right hon. Gentleman makes an extremely good point.

Mr. Budgen: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Legg: I shall make a little progress and then I shall be pleased to give way to my hon. Friend.

In the Maastricht treaty we are seeing something quite different from that which was in the treaty of Rome. Article 2 of the treaty of Rome dealt with progressively approximating the economic policies of member states. That was loose terminology. We are now changing the objectives under article 2 to include that of economic and monetary union. It must be emphasised once again that the United Kingdom opt-out does not relate to economic and monetary union. Instead, it is a potential opt-out from stage 3, the single currency.

Mr. Budgen: My hon. Friend takes up the point made by my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary about our obligation under the treaty of Rome. When we first went into the treaty of Rome in 1972 we entered the snake, albeit for a short time. I think that it was for about two months. That was a preliminary attempt to get the United Kingdom into a fixed exchange rate mechanism. As the Committee knows, we came out of the snake. The danger that we now face is that many more legal pressures can be exerted upon us to re-enter the exchange rate mechanism.

Mr. Legg: My hon. Friend has made a valuable intervention. I shall speak about our membership of the exchange rate mechanism later in my speech.

All 12 member states are working towards the objective of economic and monetary union. Article 5 of the treaty of Rome puts obligations on member states to fulfil the tasks that are set out in articles 2 and 3 of the Maastricht treaty. The United Kingdom has an obligation under article 5 to facilitate the achievement of the Community's tasks, one of which is now economic and monetary union. It would seem that the other member states, possibly with the exception of Denmark, are keen to get on with economic and monetary union and do not wish to see one or two other members seeking to undermine their attempts to achieve that goal within the context of the treaty.

Furthermore, under article 5, the United Kingdom has an obligation to abstain from any measure that could jeopardise the achievement of the objectives of the treaty. That means that the United Kingdom must have the objective to abstain from taking actions in its economic, monetary and foreign exchange policies that could jeopardise the attainment of economic and monetary union which is being pursued by the other members of the Community.

Mr. Marlow: I draw my hon. Friend's attention to the speech made last night by my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary. We are, of course, committed to economic and monetary union, but that does not necessarily mean a single currency. There are other ways of achieving economic and monetary union. Perhaps my hon. Friend will tell the House what those other ways might be and what chance we might have of achieving or implementing them.

Mr. Legg: I ask my hon. Friend to be patient. I hope to deal with his point and others in a way that will ensure that they have the necessary cogency.

The Treasury has said that article 109m changes only slightly what is in the treaty of Rome. My hon. Friend the Financial Secretary did not follow that route this evening, and that may be significant. He followed it, however, in Committee on 14 January. When the Treasury submitted a memorandum on the ratification of the Maastricht treaty to the Select Committee on Treasury and Civil Service Affairs, it, too, referred to article 109m, and tried to argue that there was no effective change from our obligations under the treaty of Rome.

I maintain that the common interest that is set out in article 109m is a stronger obligation than the common concern that existed under the treaty of Rome. Secondly, and even more importantly, when it comes to common interest, we must assess "common interest" and the meaning of it within the context and colouring of the Maastricht treaty. We find that common interest is clearly set out in the treaty, but what is it? It must be economic and monetary union. There is the obligation in article 109m that our exchange rate is treated as a matter of common interest to the other member states, with those states striving to achieve monetary union and wanting the United Kingdom to play its part in that process.

Mr. Cash: I much like my hon. Friend's style. He is taking us, with relentless but clear and cogent force, along the route of reality. I am sure that he will recall the protocol that is adjacent to the one that is supposed to be our opt-out. I am sure that he will agree with me that that makes irreversible and irrevocable that which is due to come into effect on 1 January 1999, come what may. Does he accept, like Chancellor Kohl, that there are those in the Community—most of them in the other member states—who say yes to economic and monetary union, but go on to say that that carries with it political union? That is where the rub comes. We are being taken in that direction.

Mr. Legg: My hon. Friend has made a significant point. It is one that has been made to me by members of the Bundesbank council. They say that there must be a political union alongside monetary union. Chancellor Kohl has made his position clear. Those who go to the Library and consult the Financial Times of 4 January will see set out the Chancellor's commitment to political union and his recognition that monetary union will work only with political union.

The United Kingdom's obligations in the context of the exchange rate mechanism are a source of concern to many of my hon. Friends. Article 109m is directly relevant in this respect. The other member states regard our exchange rate as a matter of common interest to them. I am sure that it will not have escaped the attention of Treasury Ministers that many of our Community partners have been somewhat startled and dismayed by Britain's exit from the ERM. A perusal of the press of the past six months since white Wednesday will elicit a range of comments by our European partners expressing this concern. The French Finance Minister, for instance, cannot understand why we are out and considers it necessary for us to return to the ERM. He cannot see how Britain can ratify the treaty and stay out of the mechanism.

7.30 pm

One does not have to be particularly sophisticated, reading between the lines, to understand the concerns of the Irish Finance Minister, Prime Minister, and Foreign Secretary, at the time of the Irish devaluation, about the financial problems that Ireland faced following Britain's exit from the ERM—especially in view of Ireland's close trading links with the United Kingdom.

Pedro Perez, Spain's Economic Minister, spoke even more forcefully on 23 October about Britain's exit from the ERM. He said that there could not be a single market without a single currency and that there could not be two systems in Europe—an exchange rate mechanism for some countries and a floating currency for others.

When Mr. Delors addressed the European Parliament, he made some trenchant remarks, without naming Britain, about countries that seek to devalue and thereby achieve a competitive advantage. We know, however, that many of our partners and members of the Commission are trying to play things fairly quietly at the moment, because ratification of the treaty is still in the balance.

Under the Maastricht treaty, member states that are unhappy with Britain's exchange rate policy will have the opportunity to do somethiong about that——

Mr. Cash: The Chancellor of the Exchequer has arrived.

Mr. Legg: I am sure that he does not want to intervene, however, even though he probably has first-hand experience of some of the unhappiness felt by our partners and by Finance Ministers on the continent.

Mr. Marlow: Will my hon. Friend give way to the Chancellor if he will confirm to the Committee that, if we were to re-enter the exchange rate mechanism when article 109m is in force, we would, at a later stage—if the economy demanded it—be able to leave again?

Mr. Legg: I thank my hon. Friend, but I must make some progress. It is certainly true that the treaty will provide the opportunity for our partners to press us, first informally and then more publicly, to return to the ERM. If Treasury Ministers resist that pressure, there are stronger powers in the treaty to compel Britain to return to the mechanism. The matter will not be solely in the hands of the Chancellor of the Exchequer during stage 2.

Mr. Iain Duncan-Smith (Chingford): Listening carefully to my hon. Friend it occurs to me that we are in the midst of a dispute about the Government's position in respect of stage 3—a dispute between us and Ministers. Bearing in mind the comments of other member Governments so far, when stage 2 has arrived and stage 3 is imminent, who will be forced to decide on the interpretation of our position? It will surely not be our Ministers; it will be the European Court of Justice that will be called to make the decision.

Mr. Legg: My hon. Friend makes one of his now customary interventions in which he puts his finger precisely on where we stand. The intervention will not be for Treasury Ministers or Members of Parliament. Ultimately, it will be for the European Court——

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (Colchester, North): A political body.

Mr. Legg: I think that we have already explored that aspect. Certainly, the court will have the power to decide, but I suspect that we will not be taken to the court to compel us to return to the mechanism. The mere suggestion will be enough to ensure that Britain does so.

I believe that many Ministers, perhaps even the Chancellor himself, feel as stongly about membership of the ERM as I and many of my hon. Friends do. The experience of the British economy, of British business and of the British people in the ERM was damaging—[HON. MEMBERS: "Disastrous."] Many right hon. and hon. Members share that view——

The Second Deputy Chairman: Order. I remind the hon. Gentleman that he should be addressing me and that he should bear in mind the practical consideration that his voice will be heard better if he faces the microphones insted of turning away from them—a thought that may not have occurred to him.

Mr. Legg: Thank you, Dame Janet, that is most helpful of you. I am afraid that I was distracted by some sedentary interventions.

Under stage 2, many provisions of the treaty will bring us closer to other countries of the Community in terms of economic policy making. As many hon. Members have said, we will find that we have common economic policies. The Treasury issued a rather strange statement to the Select Committee on Treasury and Civil Service in November 1992. It was about the operation of article 103.1, which concerns the Council of Ministers geting together to devise common economic policies for Europe. The Treasury line on that has been that, if some of the policies or guidelines drawn up under the article are of a sort that Britain would not like—setting out a timetable for a return to the ERM, say, or guidance about budget deficits—the United Kingdom can somehow block them in the Council of Ministers. It can block and spoil the overall economic policy devised by the Council of Ministers. That does not seem to be very much like being at the heart of Europe.

I take seriously the comments from the Government Front Bench about wanting to be at the heart of Europe and wanting to exercise influence. I do not believe that Britain will adopt the role of blocker or spoiler in Europe in stage 2 and in the coming years. I believe that Britain will sit down at the table with its partners and accept the reality of the treaty, the obligations in the treaty, and that it will operate accordingly. Regrettably, I believe that that will be extremely damaging to the British economy.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen) referred to previous experiments with fixed exchange rate regimes. To strengthen and legislate for this process, and to include in the supreme law of the European union the requirements to fix exchange rates must, in the current economic circumstances in Europe, be one of the most foolish and unwise economic decisions to be taken in Europe in the 20th century.

The statesmen of Europe, who do not recognise the economic changes in Germany, the costs of reunification, the implication of the borrowing requirement in the unified German state, and the effect that those factors have in transmitting their consequences to other member states through a fixed exchange rate, are playing fast and loose with the economic prosperity of the peoples of Europe. They are also threatening recession, unemployment and worse. The concept of the Maastricht treaty and its obligations are not an appropriate agenda or statutory framework that we should adopt in the mid or late-1990s.

Ministers have suggested that Britain might be able to continue to float its exchange rate during stage 3. Hon. Members should be aware that that idea is even more unlikely than the possibility that Britain can continue to float its exchange rate freely during stage 2. The idea that other member states like France, which had irrevocably fixed their currencies to the deutschmark, would then be content to see Britain floating its exchange rate and obtaining what they would consider to be unfair competitive advantages as a result is clearly inconceivable.

When we move to stage 3, and those other member states have irrevocably locked their currencies, they will expect the United Kingdom—if it decides to exercise the opt-out—to be playing a part in ensuring that monetary union is successful. They will certainly not be prepared to see Britain floating on the margins. I am sure that the requirements to return to the mechanism and to operate on the narrow bands of the exchange rate mechanism will be fully enforced.

We must then face the reality of the opt-out in stage 3 with Britain locked in the narrow bands against the European ecu. Britain would have no representation on the governing council of the European central bank, which would set interest rates for the ecu, while Britain was tied to the ecu within a narrow band. The governing council of the European central bank would effectively set interest rates for Europe as a whole. Is my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary really offering us that tonight as an attractive proposition resulting from the opt-out?

Mr. Cash: Does my hon. Friend recall that in the middle of the night I produced a document which had been leaked to me? That document stated quite explicitly that advice was being tendered, apparently to Ministers, after white Wednesday on 23 September last year, which clearly stated that the conclusion was that sterling should go into the narrow band. Does not my hon. Friend find that a very chilling observation?

Mr. Legg: Yes, that is a chilling observation, but hon. Members should not be surprised by it. In 12 months' time, I hope that hon. Members will not come to Members like me and express surprise if events such as that described by my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) occur.

7.45 pm

Mr. Budgen: Why on earth should that be chilling? The Government have consistently said that they wish to approve the Maastricht treaty. They claim that they have democratic authority for that, having discussed it fully at the last general election and because there is widespread support for it. Plainly, we must return to the ERM as quickly as possible to fulfil our obligations on 1 January 1994. It would be monstrous if we were not trying to get back into the ERM.

Presumably, we will hear from the Government tonight a clear indication of how they believe the ERM has worked to the benefit of the British people during the two years we were a member of the ERM. If this is only the preliminary period, we must assume that the Government regard it as having been a very successful one.

Mr. Legg: Once again, my hon. Friend has made a valuable point.

I conclude with an argument which is not often heard in this Committee, but which is put forcefully in the Corridors and elsewhere in the House. That argument seems to be particularly attractive to right hon. and hon. Members on the Conservative Benches and even to Ministers. That argument is that there is no need to worry about the Maastricht treaty because its provisions will not be put into effect. The treaty is so deeply flawed and runs so strongly against the economic fundamentals to which I have referred that people say, "Don't worry. Support the treaty: it will not work." What a gamble that is to take with the future of the British people.

Sir Trevor Skeet: The people should have a say.

Mr. Legg: As my hon. Friend says, they should have a say in that gamble.

I urge all hon. Members to act with caution in this matter. They should not rely on assurances that what I have described will not happen. Hon. Members who visit our partners discover that there is a strength, will and determination for those things to happen. There is a strong commitment on continental Europe to economic and monetary union. There are many, what I would call unionists rather than federalists and they are strongly committed to such concepts. Hon. Members must weigh in the balance the benefits of the treaty against its risks, which are considerable.

The House has many honest federalists, with certain views about Europe and Britain, who have put their case clearly and powerfully. I respect those people. It is a good process to indentify what Europe would be like under the Maastricht treaty. If the case for Maastricht was spelt out and the British people gave their full-hearted consent to the treaty, I would be happy to work to try to achieve their vision of the future. My great fear, however, is that those people will not realise the implications of the treaty. We will face continuing disillusionment, unhappiness and lack of success in our affairs for many years.

Mr. Christopher Gill (Ludlow): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Legg: I will not take any more interventions.

I urge hon. Members to be cautious and not to gamble with the future of the British people. They must realise that what they are doing now is ratifying the supreme law of the European union.

Mr. Leighton: We are faced with an odd situation. The Government did not want a conference at Maastricht and they did not want the treaty. They have not said that they are in favour of monetary union or a single currency and they claim that they can exercise an opt-out from the treaty. I do not know how valid that option will be. As far as I am aware, the Opposition do not want an opt-out. They are all in favour of monetary union and a single currency. This odd situation is what psychiatrists term role reversal.

My hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) relies upon article 2 of the treaty for the basis of his support of it. We cannot take comfort from that article, because the treaty of Rome has a general, motherhood-and-apple-pie clause that contains vague good intentions, but what good has it done us? We now have between 17 million and 18 million people unemployed in the Community—the unemployment black spot of the world—so what good have those words done us?

I do not think that any socialist can support the Maastricht treaty. I base that claim on article 105 of chapter 2, with which I am sure my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East is familiar. Article 105(1) states:

"The primary objective of the ESCB shall be to maintain price stability. Without prejudice to the objective of price stability, the ESCB shall support the general economic policies in the Community with a view to contributing to the achievement of the objectives of the Community as laid down in Article 2."

That is without prejudice to price stability and I do not believe that there can be any doubt that article 2 is subordinate to price stability.

Mr. Clive Betts (Sheffield, Attercliffe): I believe that article 105 then goes on to provide a commitment to article 3a, which is in the treaty simply for the purpose of delivering article 2. One could read that part of article 105(1), which relates to article 3a, as unqualified support for article 2. I accept that the treaty is badly worded, but there are different ways of reading it.

Mr. Leighton: I do not believe that article 105 is badly worded; it is specific and states:

"The primary objective of the ESCB shall be to maintain price stability."

There is no ambiguity about that. It could not be clearer. The objectives laid down in article 2 are set without prejudice to the objective of price stability.

When this matter was raised before, one of my hon. Friends asked me whether I was in favour of price instability. Other things being equal, we would, of course, like low inflation, but since when has it been the sole policy of the Labour party to argue for price stability? Any fool can reduce inflation by destroying the economy, creating mass unemployment and bringing about a recession. That is what the Government have done, but they have now had to pull back.

The "Bank Briefing" for November 1992, published by the Bank of England, referred to price stability and stated:

"Had the United Kingdom remained in the ERM, it is quite possible that price stability would have been achieved during next year"— which means this year.

"Although clearly desirable in itself, price stability attained so quickly might have intensified the problems of domestic debt inflation. Some easing of policy was, therefore, desirable."

We could have had that wonderful price stability, but it was causing so much trouble that it was dropped as official Labour party policy. My hon. Friends on the Opposition Front Bench should note that we want some price stability and low inflation, but we have other aims. We want balance of payments equilibrium, growth in the economy and high employment.

Article 2 makes no mention of high employment. Thousands of words, as well as protocols, have been printed about Euro-monetarism and price stability, but there is no mention of high employment, apart from a passing reference in article 2, which is itself subordinate to the idea of price stability. That must be anathema to socialists, and it is on that basis that I oppose the treaty.

The convergence criteria are all monetary; they are about inflation and budget deficits. There is nothing about real convergence, real growth and real people. Flesh and blood will be subordinated to the theory of money. Money will be the master, not the servant. I cannot for the life of me understand how the Labour party could support such an idea.

Mr. Budgen: I suspect that an observer of this protracted but useful debate would say to himself, "Well, they have, with great difficulty, defined what the position will be under stage 2, which is plainly the ERM with a large number of additional constraints added to it." No doubt that observer would say to himself how grateful he was for the elegant guidance that the right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) had given to the Committee to help us to decide the possible extent of those additional obligations.

The practical man listening to the Committee's deliberations, however, would say, "Surely, these chaps"—I must be careful—"these persons are not going to recommend going into stage 2 unless it is obvious that stage 1 was a great success, because stage 2 is stage 1 with knobs on."

If we had found that stage 1 was such a great success, we might think of going forward, tentatively, to stage 2. If, however, stage 1 was a vast disaster which brought poverty, sadness and unemployment to the British people and was still exercising its most malign influence upon our economy, surely we would think rather carefully before going forward to a worse condition than that provided for in stage 1.

The disgrace of the Government's position is that they cannot say that the ERM was a success. They cannot do other than admit that the present condition of the economy does not result from the Government's wisdom, forethought, brilliance, or anything of that sort. We may reasonably hope for some recovery in the economy, not because of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's brilliance but because of the good fortune that speculators speculated against the pound and threw us out of the ERM, and because our central bank, having lost £3·5 billion of taxpayers' money, took the view that we could not afford to buy our pounds any more and stay in the ERM. The ERM was an absolute disaster. It is important to understand that the state of the economy when we came out was near to being in a credit crunch.

Perfectly sensible, kindly, respectable business men ask, "Aren't you wasting an awful lost of time making a nuisance of yourself to the Government? Don't you think it would be better to think of ways in which you can help the Government to resuscitate the economy?" But most of the problems that business men have stem from the ERM. They ask, "What are you doing with the clearing banks? Why don't you get the clearing banks to lend more money to small builders?" The reason that clearing banks cannot lend any more money to small builders is that the clearing banks and the small builders are on the verge of going bust.

The clearing banks went in for a lot of silly and excessive lending between 1986 and 1988, a period when we were shadowing the deutschmark and when what could be described as the most disastrous Chancellor in recent history was talking about an economic miracle. At that time, the banks were lending far too much money to commercial property. They are now finding that their credit base is severely eroded, so severely eroded through the large losses that they suffered because of high interest rates that they cannot come to the aid of small business, as no doubt they would wish to do. That, I repeat, all stems from the ERM.

I remind my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary that it used to be the theory of the Conservative Government that we were, broadly speaking, monetarist, and that a change in the money supply took between 18 months and two and a half years to come through into the real economy. There has been a remarkably large relaxation of monetary policy since 16 September. It is not at all surprising that that relaxation is not yet fully showing itself in the economy.

But the irony is that, if we ratify the Maastricht treaty, only when we are under a legal obligation to go into stage 2 on 1 January 1994 shall we be finding that the relaxation, consequent upon our good fortune on 16 September, is starting to work through. We shall then find ourselves under a legal obligation to abort the good fortune of the monetary relaxation that has occurred since 16 September. The green shoots will be nipped off once again by the frost of economic and monetary union in its incipient stages.

Surely we should be explaining to those confused people who hoped that that was all part of being at the warm, friendly heart of Europe that that is the basis for yet more deflation to be imposed upon us by the Bundesbank, which will give rise to yet more trouble in our lending institutions.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, who always argues his case on these matters so well, for giving way. Does he agree that the conventional wisdom at the time—some of us, certainly including me, and, I am sure, the hon. Gentleman too, argued against it—was that the ERM was a necessity for the British economy and that it would be wrong for Britain for us to remain outside. That was the argument put by the Government and, unfortunately, by some Opposition Members. It was said that it was an inevitable step—the same argument that is being used on integration under the Maastricht treaty. Have we not been proved right, at tremendous cost to the British economy, on the ERM, and will we not be proved right again if, as the hon. Gentleman says, we go into stage 2 and return to the ERM?

Mr. Budgen: That was not much of a critical question. The hon. Gentleman was simply intervening to say that he agreed with me, albeit that he used rather different language.

Mr. Allan Rogers (Rhondda): I too congratulate the hon. Gentleman on marshalling his arguments and putting them forward in such a congent manner, as he always does. In doing so, he is projecting an image of being an objective commentator on the economic scene. Can he list the number of times and the occasions on which he objected or voted against the Government who introduced the policies that he is now condemning?

Mr. Budgen: I am consistent on that. I opposed the shadowing of the deutschmark between 1986 and 1988 and I voted against the ERM on every possible occasion. I do not remember ever being ill; I have quite good health. As far as I remember, I have voted against this European economic entanglement on every possible occasion. That does not mean that I am right, but it does mean that I have been consistent.

Mr. Rogers: I was not thinking particularly of the hon. Gentleman's voting record in relation to Europe, although I presume that he voted with the Government on the single market issue.

Mr. Budgen: No.

Mr. Rogers: If he says that he did not, I accept that. The hon. Gentleman talks about the Government's policies and the bank's inability to lend to small businesses, but when did he ever raise his voice against the Government's economic policies?

The Second Deputy Chairman: Order. I hope that we can keep to the substance of the debate.

Mr. Budgen: I respectfully agree, Dame Janet. I would simply say to the hon. Gentleman that I have done my incompetent best to raise these arguments fairly consistently over the years. I am sorry if I have not brought them to his attention, but I have done my best to bring them to other people's attention from time to time.

However, the Committee is interested not in my record but in the effect of the Government's disastrous policy on the British economy. The point that I wish to make as firmly as I can is that the only intellectually respectable argument that the Government could put forward tonight would be to say that the ERM had been a success and that, because of the success of stage 1, they wanted to build on that and move to stage 2.

The ERM has been a proven disaster. It has been a disaster in that it has cost us £3·5 billion in lost resources. It has been a disaster in that it has been a proximate cause of 3 million people being unemployed and has caused a credit crunch from which it will take us many years to recover. It has been a disaster in that it has created untold sadness for many people in the south-east who find themselves locked into houses that are now worth far less than the cost of their mortgages. It has been an utter disaster, which has been pursued not for economic reasons, but for political reasons.

Only a Government who were completely impervious to their mistakes and to the appalling humiliation of 16 September could have the effrontery to say, "Never mind all these proven disasters. Let us go into stage 2 at least at the beginning of January, cutting off the freedom that we have enjoyed since 16 September. Let us chastise the British people with a system that is even worse than the ERM."

Sir Russell Johnston (Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber): I have noticed over many years that debates on the European Community seem to attract to a disproportionate extent those who are generally opposed to progress in the Community. At the end of debates, one gets a rather lop-sided view of the balance of opinion, and the Committee is following that trend. I do not say that in praise of those who hold the views that I hold; on the contrary, the critics are more loyal in their appearance and in their contribution. I hope that the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen) will forgive me for not following directly his remarks, which I have heard him enunciate so fluently so often.

Although I disagree with the hon. Member for Milton Keynes, South-West (Mr. Legg) about Maastricht, I admit that he made a direct, forthright and logical speech. I thought that his catalogue of attitudes and responses within the rest of the Community to our economic and monetary union opt-out dealt most effectively with the Government's presentation, which is that they have somehow secured a unique discretion without losing any influence. I do not think that that is right.

Mr. Jenkin: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the whole basis for the Government's position on the Maastricht treaty is that we are winning arguments all around Europe and that the direction of the Community will be away from a federal Europe? The speech by my hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, South-West gave one example of one area of policy in which there is no evidence to support the Government's view that they are changing the mood of the European Community. Does the hon. Gentleman agree?

Sir Russell Johnston: I completely agree with that. The hon. Member for Milton Keynes, South-West quoted a number of individuals. One can quote many more. At one point in the Committee, Martin Bangemann was quoted endlessly as if he had suddenly said something startling, new and different. I have known him for years and he has been saying the same thing non-stop. It is the same with all the others.

Nevertheless, the Liberal Democrats remain committed to the things that the hon. Member for Colchester, North (Mr. Jenkin) and the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West are against. Our position has been and remains distinct both from the position of the Government and from the position of Labour Front-Bench Members. For different reasons and to different degrees, both find the prospect of full economic and monetary union and the development of the ecu difficult to accept, although both have moved a long way.

The arguments against EMU have a great tendency to be based on emotion as much as on economics, although, in my humble and not very informed opinion, much of economics has a theological aspect to it. People believe passionately in certain economic solutions on the basis of certain theories which sometimes they find it difficult either to prove or to disprove. I believe that the arguments for EMU and for the single currency have an irresistible logic, whereas many of the contrary arguments tend to be conducted at a rather surreal level.

Mr. Bill Walker: The hon. Gentleman's integrity in terms of his views on Europe cannot be in doubt anywhere. Does he base his views on EMU and on all the other matters to do with political and economic union on the belief that they will be good for the people of the United Kingdom and good because they will help us as a trading nation to trade better? If he does, how does he square that with the fact that the Japanese appear to trade better than any of us do, although they do not enjoy any of the so-called benefits?

8.15 pm

Sir Russell Johnston: The situation in Japan and the situation in the United Kingdom are dramatically different. The arguments about access to a large market are part of the arguments that have been used throughout in respect of the United Kingdom's membership of the Community. A new trading pattern has developed as the old trading patterns with the Commonwealth have slowly declined. Japan's industrial structure is so different that it is difficult to make direct comparisons.

Much of the argument focuses on the points raised by the hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow), the main intervener, who has now vanished. He always talks about national sovereignty, which affects people's thinking about what is possible economically. Many people's thinking is based on a complex of beliefs which are still held almost as a matter of religious faith. It is believed that we are better, that we are more efficient, that we have better laws, that we are more democratic and that we are more able to trade in the world than to be successful in the Community.

It is difficult to argue with all those ideas, because people believe in them deeply and passionately. I recognise that because I have been listening for the best part of 20 years to the arguments of those who are against Europe. It is not that I do not know the arguments, or that I do not respect the people who hold them. I have reached the conclusion that I shall never persuade them, and they may have reached the conclusion that they will never persuade me—[Interruption.] One sometimes wonders why we continue to debate the matter.

Mr. Winnick: It is called democracy.

Sir Russell Johnston: I suppose that democracy is about peaceful persuasion.

In the history of the Community, we have been guilty of many missed opportunities. The opt-out, which is a major part of our debate today, is one such missed opportunity and another example of our excluding ourselves from mainstream developments as a result of economic weakness, of shortsighted nationalism and of political delusion.

For those reasons, when the Bill first came into Committee, we tabled amendment No. 400 which aimed to delete the protocol and, as a consequence, the United Kingdom's opt-out from stage 3 of EMU. Such an amendment would now have the consequence of wrecking the treaty, so we shall not press it to a Division. However, we support the Labour party's amendment No. 35, which seems to be a positive contribution, because it would allow parliamentary affirmation before moving to stage 3, which would be perfectly reasonable if the economic convergence criteria laid down in article 109 were established.

We shall not support Labour's amendment No. 420 or new clause 56. We do not feel that they are necessary, despite the arguments advanced by the hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith), to which I listened carefully.

Long before Maastricht, we were in favour of a single currency. The arguments in favour of economic and monetary union, such as the elimination of exchange rate uncertainty, are well rehearsed. I do not accept the catalogue of ills that the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West attributed to our membership of the exchange rate mechanism. During our period of membership, like myself, he spoke to many business men, who are quite given to writing to one about these matters. They emphasised that they wanted to know what price they could offer in advance. They wanted some stability rather than the loss that resulted from unpredictability.

I am rehearsing old arguments, but it is recognised that the collapse of black Wednesday was related not to the intrinsic weaknesses of the system but to the fact that the level at which we joined was too high to sustain and to our subsequent refusal to realign although the opportunity to do so existed. It is not altogether fair to make the accusations that the hon. Gentleman made. Considerable savings would be made by the elimination of transaction costs, the obvious example of which is for the individual but it is also noticeable for business.

The ecu undoubtedly would become one of the world's three major currencies, with the dollar and yen. I shall quote Sir Leon Brittan, which I do not do often.

Mr. David Harris (St. Ives): Why not?

Sir Russell Johnston: I shall not go into that.

In 1990, Sir Leon said:

"Birmingham is considerably closer to Calais than to Glasgow. But even when the internal market is fully in place, selling from Birmingham to Calais is going to be more complicated, slower and more expensive than selling to Scotland, simply because, although we have a single market, we do not yet enjoy the benefits of a single currency."

I accept that argument.

The benefits of EMU, in addition to the ones outlined above, which are specific to a single currency, are based mainly on the assumption that this will render economic policy more effective by having it conducted, or major elements of it conducted, at a more appropriate level—by which I mean supranational level—and because economic policy will in any event be heavily influenced by the Community countries that are most successful. It is increasingly clear that macro-economic policy can no longer be effectively controlled independently by individual European Community states. Black Wednesday was not the only example of that.

We are unequivocally committed to a federal union. The Maastricht treaty, despite the Government's denial, represents a significant step towards such a European union. The hon. Member for Milton Keynes, South-West quoted Chancellor Kohl, saying that political union is meaningless without economic and monetary union. That is undoubtedly true. The Government's recognition of that was reflected in their lack of enthusiasm for a supranational structure and their desire instead to concentrate on intergovernmentalism, which led to the three-pillared structure of the treaty.

The core of the treaty, including the economic sections, is clearly within the supranational institutional core of the Community, which makes our opt-out all the more tragic. I take the Minister's point about continuing to participate in policy making on EMU, but, like the hon. Member for Milton Keynes, South-West, I think that a semi-detatched position does not increase one's influence.

We must recognise that the problems facing economic and monetary union are great indeed. Many circumstances have changed since the treaty was first negotiated, and the timetable in particular will have to be reviewed. One cannot be optimistic about the possibility of maintaining it. The convergence criteria—inflation performance, Government debt, membership of the narrow band for two years and the durability criteria reflected in long-term interest rates—may prove to be too strict within the confines of the current timetable. Last year, if I remember correctly, only two countries met those requirements—France, which is not looking forward to such a good position now, and Luxembourg. Even Germany did not meet them. Clearly there can be no monetary union without the deutschmark; that would be quite unthinkable. The problems will be overcome only if member states work together to resolve the reorganisation of the ERM, the problems of the timetable and the difficulties caused by convergence criteria. The economic and political advantages to be gained by full economic and monetary union in the interdependent world in which we live seem well worth fighting for.

The opt-out and our non-commitment to move to stage 3 occupied much of the Financial Secretary's speech. We regret the opt-out and, logically, regret the unwillingness of the Government to take the other consequential steps, particularly making the Bank of England independent as a prelude to the establishment of one European Community central bank.

It is not often that I agree with the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West about European issues, but his interventions on the basis of his experience with the

[Sir Russell Johnston]

Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee in France, Spain and Germany were very apposite and foreshadowed what we certainly fear; that our opt-outs will either relegate us to some subordinate position or compel us to adhere to or to shadow what other people determine.

Sir Trevor Skeet: I have listened to the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston) at length. Perhaps he will excuse me if I do not pursue him. Having been up all night, one is wilting a bit at this stage, so I shall cover the main points that I have in mind.

The most significant feature of last night's debate was that we covered three important groups of amendments on the banking system, economic policy and deficits, EMU, and traditional and second and third stages in the course of 24 hours. That is absolutely critical to the Government, because the success or failure of Maastricht will depend on monetary union and a single currency. It might have embarrassed the Government considerably if the arguments that we have been advancing appeared in local newspapers and on local radio. It is interesting that, of the 24 groups of amendments, only three relate to the economy, banking and the two stages. It is almost unique that these matters have been swept aside. After all, we are the representatives of the public and we are putting the arguments to them. If they cannot hear us because it is not recorded, they will not read them because Hansard is read probably only by ourselves.

There is another interesting point. Stages 1 to 3 will take us virtually from today through to 1 January 1999. We know that, under article N, we shall be renegotiating the treaty in 1996. Why are we legislating so far ahead when there are so many difficulties involved in passing the treaty? It would have made more sense not to have legislated to cover that period and instead looked at it carefully and decided, in 1996, whether we wanted all the convergence to go ahead to lead us to a single currency.

8.30 pm

My hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen)—who has left the Chamber—spoke about rejoining the ERM. I agreed with his analysis. We have no alternative. It is obligatory that we rejoin the ERM. The wording of some of the articles show that it is one of the criteria. For example:

"The observance of the normal fluctuation margins provided for by the Exchange Rate Mechanism of the European Monetary System, for at least two years, without devaluing against the currency of any other Member State".

If that is one of the criteria, and we are outside the exchange rate mechanism, we shall have to get into it again to qualify for stage 3. That is only reasonable.

There is another way to look at it. According to article 109m:

"Until the beginning of the third stage, each Member State shall treat its exchange rate policy as a matter of common interest."

That is an obligation that arises under the treaty.

The obligation on the EMS and the exchange rate mechanism is important. However, there are certain subsidiary obligations. Convergence, which I regard as extremely important, arises from article 2. Hon. Members who have spoken in the debate have raised that point on several occasions, so I shall not go over the same ground. I have spoken of article 109m, which sets out the exchange rate obligations, but I have not mentioned article 102a, which contributes to the achievements or the objectives of the treaty. That is another obligation that cannot be avoided. Article 103 says that we must agree with the economic policy of the union.

Let us have a look at those two. Article 102a says:

"Member States shall conduct their economic policies with a view to contributing to the achievements and objectives of the Community".

That is an obligation because member states "shall" do something. There is no way to avoid that. Article 103 says:

"Member States shall regard their economic policies as a matter of common concern and shall co-ordinate them within the Council, in accordance with the provisions of article 102a."

All those articles set out obligations under stage 2. They apply to the United Kingdom fully, as they apply to all the continental states. We have the option to opt into stage 3 if we wish to do so. Then, things alter, because we go over to the protocol and there are general dispensations and derogations at a future date which may be of advantage to us.

The interesting point about the debate in the past 24 hours is that many matters of concern to us—given that many people in Europe will be excited if we do not fulfil our obligations—are incompatible with Community obligations. For example, that is true of the floating of the exchange rate under both stages 1 and 2. If the other nations ventilate their complaints, that could lead to litigation before the European Court of Justice, which in turn could force the United Kingdom back into the ERM. I shall not go into it fully, but I shall set out some of the implications of a breach of that. The court could order us to return and impose a fine under article 171. There could be retaliatory action. All that would arise from that article.

Mr. Dorrell: This may be something of an abuse of our procedures, but I want to correct a statement that I made earlier in answer to an intervention from the hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith). He asked me whether he needed to decide next year whether we would join the single currency. I replied that we had no such need and that our protocol allows us to exercise our option to join a single currency either at the time of the original report under paragraph 2 of article 109j or at any time after the start of stage 3. I also said that the convergence criteria were assessed for the period before the start of stage 3. That was wrong. The convergence criteria are assessed under the convergence protocol for the period before the submission of the report.

Sir Trevor Skeet: I am obliged for that clarification. If we decided to opt into stage 3, the protocol will begin to apply. Certain clauses will not apply to the United Kingdom. It is entirely different with regard to the ERM. The Minister has said that the Government would return the United Kingdom to the ERM when it was convenient to do so. However, that is conditional upon us returning at an early date.

Mr. Bill Walker: The Government have always said that we would return to the ERM when the conditions were right. In stage 2, the conditions are put in there under the statutory obligations.

Sir Trevor Skeet: That is correct. On one occasion, I heard the Chancellor say that the ERM was the best thing that he had ever entered. At a later date, he decided that he would have to come out of it. The Prime Minister shared that view. It is a big man who can think again and decide that it is best to get out. However, we are caught by the treaty and our obligations. If the other member states feel that, because of the size of the exchange rate and because we have a floating rather than a fixed currency we have an advantage, they can make complaints before the court and so force us back into the ERM, which could be damaging for the United Kingdom.

Those who qualify for going into the third stage cannot be identified at the moment. The conditions for the successful applicants are set out in article 109j. We know them well. They include inflation at the correct level, a satisfactory budget balance, a reasonable level of general Government debt and long-term bond yields at a certain rate. Figures that I got from the Treasury in February this year show that only one country would qualify—France. We cannot have entry into the third stage if only France is capable of doing so. The Bundesbank is important to Germany and to the whole Community. Germany is a bigger nation than ours, with 70 million people, and will obviously have to be there.

Established criteria mean something. We either walk through the portals and get into stage 3, or we are frustrated and cannot get in. That is a twin-speed Europe. It is no use saying that we will not have a twin-speed Europe; it is inevitable from the very conditions laid down in article 109j. Some nations will be getting away much faster than others, and at this stage it looks as though the United Kingdom may be in the slow lane. I hope not. I believe that several years ahead we may be able to improve our chances. At the lower end of the list there will be Portugal and Spain; at the higher end there will be Germany and France, and probably Luxembourg, the Netherlands and Belgium. That would make a fairly strong unit. This need not unduly upset the United Kingdom, which is extremely resourceful and has shown its resourcefulness over the years.

Switzerland is an example worth noting. It was invited to join the Community, but refused to do so, on the ground that it was extremely successful outside the Community. Its living conditions are excellent. Austria, too, is doing well. But many other countries would like to get into the Community at some stage in the game.

I ask the Committee to bear in mind the fact that we are but 12 nations, and two have a right of exemption in stage 3. When we add another four countries by 1996, and probably another four after that, what will be the situation in Europe? Will the Community collapse, or will it be held up by its own braces? I am very concerned about this, and I believe that more information should be made available to the public so that they can come to the right conclusions in time.

The Financial Secretary has said that he is quite prepared to go back into the ERM, on his own conditions, when the time is ripe for the United Kingdom. But we have heard other versions of this. We have heard that the time will be ripe only when German interest rates fall. I believe that the Prime Minister has said, too, that the time will be ripe only when the flaws in the situation are removed. What are the flaws? They have never been identified.

Schlesinger has said that there are no flaws and that he is quite prepared to abide by existing arrangements. Others have suggested that perhaps the yen and the dollar should be admitted before we get to stage 3. I do not know; I am concerned and I think that we should look into the whole matter very carefully before we make the final move.

I will say one thing with absolute certainty: while I agree that there is a two-speed Europe and there is likely to be one, I would not like to see a Bonn-Paris axis. That could be as dangerous as the situation that we had many years ago.

I suggest to the Committee that, before rushing to ratify the treaty, we think of some of the strange consequences that could overwhelm us. Russia now is on the brink of civil war—but I will not go too far down that road, Mr. Morris. There are other significant movements in Europe. The former Yugoslavia is upside down and is developing some resources, which will be discussed in the next series of amendments. I will not go too far down that road, because you might check me, Mr. Morris. I am always willing to oblige and, if I am wrong, I will make myself right. There are complications in Europe. We do not know what the situation is likely to be in France with a new right-wing Government. I will not go too far down that route, because I would be checked then also.

We are dealing with the three stages. On the acceptance of Maastricht, we will be in stage 1. On 1 January 1994, we will be in stage 2. We will amble on like everybody else through all the conditions, convergence principles, and so on, complying with the treaty, and complying with the small print, which many people have not been prepared to follow. Then we will come up to stage 3. Shall we go in or shall we remain outside?

We will have no option. We will come to that point and the Prime Minister will say that it is right for the United Kingdom to enter the third stage. By that time the spring will have sprung. It will be irrevocable. There will be fixed exchange rates and we will be tied to Europe, tied to the most powerful country. The most powerful country, of course, will be Germany; it is very competitive and it can destroy our economy.

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Sydney Chapman and
Mr. David Lightbown.

Question accordingly negatived.

The Chairman: We now move to the group on foreign and security and amendment No. 227. Mr. William Cash? Mr. Spicer? Mr. Gill? Mr. Cran? Mr. Shepherd? [Interruption.] Mr. Shepherd.

Mr. Rogers: On a point of order, Mr. Morris. Before you called Mr. Shepherd, I had moved the amendment formally.

The Chairman: The hon. Gentleman did not.

Mr. Rogers: Yes, I did. I stood and moved it formally.

The Chairman: I am afraid that the hon. Member cannot do that. It is not the procedure. I have to go through the list of people who are attached to the amendment. Mr. Shepherd has the floor to move the amendment.

Mr. Richard Shepherd (Aldridge-Brownhills): Then I move it formally as well.

Amendment proposed: No. 227, in page 1, line 9, after 'II', insert 'except Article 238'.—[Mr. Richard Shepherd.]

The Chairman: With this, it will be convenient also to discuss the following: Amendment No. 231, in page 1, line 9, after 'II', insert 'except Article 228'.

Amendment No. 232, in page 1, line 9, after 'II', insert 'except Article 228a'.

Amendment No. 30, in page 1, line 9, leave out 'and IV' and insert 'IV and V.'.

Amendment No. 224, in page 1, line 9, leave out 'and IV' and insert 'IV and V'.

New clause 5—Foreign, security and defence policy—

'The Secretary of State shall lay before Parliament a report of any case in which decisions taken, or proposed to be taken, by the Union in the course of implementing a common foreign, security and defence policy (pursuant to Article B in Title I of the Maastricht Treaty) are in his opinion inimical to the best interests of the United Kingdom.'.

Mr. David Howell (Guildford): The amendments relate to the part of the Bill—and the relevant part of the treaty—concerning provisions on a common foreign and security policy. Article J of the treaty states:

"A common foreign and security policy is hereby established which shall be governed by the following provisions."

The provisions follow.

This is supposed to be the part of the treaty, and the part of the Bill relevant to the treaty, in which the full machinery of the Community—and the machinery of the Commission—are to be kept at bay. We are presented here with one of the pillar elements of the treaty, which will be governed by intergovernmental co-operation rather than by the machinery of the Community. We should first examine the degree to which the Community machinery will indeed be kept out of the creation of a common foreign and security policy.

9.15 pm

Dr. Godman: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for giving way with his characteristic courtesy. Will he confirm that states making formal application for membership of what will be the European union must accept common security and defence policy as it stands?

Mr. Howell: "Confirm" is too strong a word, but I understand that will be the case, although states may seek certain derogations in the negotiations leading to their membership. Broadly speaking, the hon. Gentleman is right: they will be embraced in this part of the union, and will be covered by the pillar of intergovernmental operations that is supposed to deliver a common foreign policy.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): At the Edinburgh summit, did not the Danes explicitly secure a derogation on defence? Denmark is not a member of the Western European Union, and it does not want the defence obligations contained in the treaty.

Mr. Howell: What Denmark did and not get at the Edinburgh summit is a very interesting, almost surreal subject. The decisions about derogation for Denmark were not made by the Community; they were decided by the individuals who happened to be present as members of the European Council of Ministers, but not in their capacity as Community members. Oddly enough, however, the decision—which was not a Community decision—that Denmark should have those derogations was then recorded in the minutes of Community affairs.

The set of derogations for Denmark has an almost Hamlet-like, almost ghostlike, quality. No one is quite sure what the Danes have or have not secured for themselves, apart from feeling that they are in some way not bound by these matters.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South) rose—

Mr. Rowlands rose—

Mr. Howell: I want to proceed with my speech. I have already given way twice in two minutes.

First, I want to examine the extent to which we shall see a separation between the activities of the Community machinery—particularly the activities of the Commission—and the activities of the Council of Ministers, acting in its intergovernmental role of dealing with foreign affairs. That requires examination, because the Commission has competences in external affairs. Those external affairs are meant to be of a commercial and economic nature, and indeed they are; but a large proportion of all foreign policy issues are intimately, inextricably linked with commerce and external financial matters. We must ask to what extent it will be possible, in practice, for a separation to be maintained between the foreign policy issues that do not impinge on the competence of the Commission and the Community, and the foreign policy issues that are inextricably woven together in both economic and non-economic matters.

It will be difficult, first, because, as I have said, up to 80 per cent. of all foreign-policy issues touch on commercial, economic and financial matters. Secondly, as the treaty makes clear, the Commission will have a seat on the Council of Ministers. It will have certain rights to initiate ideas and proposals in the Council on issues of foreign policy. I hope that we can ensure that, as the treaty develops and emerges, that does not lead to a gradual erosion of the pillar that we are discussing until it becomes a mere needle and eventually evaporates altogether, so that foreign policy and common security policy, in practice, become the bailiwick of the Community machinery.

That would be a pity, and it would go flatly against what some of us want to see, which is that the pillar elements in the treaty—the intergovernmental elements—far from being eroded and weakened, need to be strengthened so as to foster what my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary calls an alternative model for European development. If we are to develop that, it is a strengthening of the pillars, rather than a weakening and erosion, that we need to see.

Another difficulty is that the treaty insists in its early articles, long since debated, that there should be one institutional framework in which all activities, whether the intergovernmental pillar ones that we are discussing or the many issues that have already been discussed at great length in Committee, should be contained. That is a concept that we shall need to challenge as we begin to reform and revise the treaty in the period leading up to 1996, when I hope that there will be a major contribution, not least by Government and the United Kingdom, to a new constitution for Europe that will be rather different from the one that we shall find immediately after the completion of the Maastricht process.

If we are to see a common foreign policy handled in a sensible, pragmatic way, and not turned into a mish-mash and blur of the sort that I shall outline later, leading to serious foreign policy errors, it is important that in due course we should move away from a single institutional framework that embraces all the activities of European nations, large and small, ancient and not so ancient—in other words, one massive structure or network. That would be a wrong starting point, and certainly a wrong finishing point. It is important for us to recognise that in future there can be different institutional frameworks to deal with different issues. Foreign policy and, I suspect, security and defence policies are different in their texture from some of the other issues that are embodied in the Rome treaty, the Single European Act and the Maastricht treaty.

Mr. Spearing: I think that the right hon. Gentleman has reached the kernel of an important issue. Has he noticed that in the title that he is discussing there are at least 20 references to the Council, and we know that the Council will be the pivot of a single foreign and security policy? The right hon. Gentleman is the Chairman of the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs, who will be much involved in the matters that we are discussing. That being so, I am glad that he is contributing to the debate. Has the right hon. Gentleman questioned any Minister on how the separation between intergovernmental and other issues will be dealt with in the general council of the Council, which is sometimes called the Foreign Council, by a single organisation in the Council, and a single organisation under COREPER? Surely that is the unity that he has said that he fears.

Mr. Howell: The answer is yes. The Select Committee on Foreign Affairs has so questioned Ministers, and it hopes in due course to report to the House of Commons on its conclusions. Perhaps I should not go into too much detail about the conclusions we draw, but the evidence that has emerged suggests that it is very difficult to draw a permanent, hard and fast line between these two vast areas of foreign policy; and that the dangers of blurring and coincidence are considerable. We shall have to think of ways—they are not embodied in this treaty—of ensuring the continuation of the intergovernmental process by which we set great store and which is said to give this treaty a different flavour from previous European treaties. That process must be preserved and strengthened.

Secondly, not only do we want to avoid a single institutional framework but we note—perhaps we need to reinforce—the absence of any great convergence of foreign policy interests between the different powers and member states of the Community. We must be very careful not to try to impose a false convergence of foreign policy outlook on the interests of member states. If we do impose one, it will lead to unfortunate results and we will be pushing against reality, which is going the other way.

The truth is that, just as the economies of the member countries are not, alas, converging—in many ways they are diverging—so the politics and foreign policy concerns of the Community countries, although they overlap and there are areas of common interest that make a good case for working closely together in intergovernmental co-operation, are also growing apart. Changes of emphasis and contrasts of emphasis in foreign policy are becoming sharper as we move into the 1990s than they were in the 1980s. One has only to take a brief Cook's tour of continental Europe to see how these divergencies are growing. Unless we take them into account and understand them—as Keynes used to say, we must deal with what is really happening, not with what the theory says should be happening—we do not have much hope of establishing an effective framework for our foreign common policy.

The Germans, for instance, have their own agenda: they are concerned with unification. They are also on the other side of the Community; they look eastwards, and, as they always have been, their concerns are with their relations with central and eastern Europe—and with the great turmoil which is Russia today. That is their primary concern. Many Germans think of nothing else and are not interested in other dimensions of foreign policy. We must not criticise them for that.

I am not sure what the French agenda is. The French are going through a political earthquake, and what France's foreign policy priorities will be after it I am not sure. The concern in many French circles, however, is partly with eastern Europe—our concern, too—but much more with the Maghreb. The French look across the Mediterranean to the great nations of Algeria and Morocco, bound up as they are with French history and emotions. The primary fear of the Quai D'Orsay is about the problem of what will happen in these countries. Will there be a growth of vicious fundamentalism along the north African coast, ousting the moderate regimes that are trying to come to terms with the modern world?

Mr. Winnick: Was not there a good illustration of the failure of the member states of the European Community to reach a common foreign policy when we were faced with criminal aggression in 1990 in the form of the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait? The need then, as the right hon. Gentleman realised at the time, was to take up arms to end the criminal aggression. If we had waited for a common foreign policy to emerge, Kuwait would probably still be occupied by Iraq, unless, of course, the United States had acted alone.

Mr. Howell: The hon. Gentleman has made a very good point, and other examples could be cited. There is no doubt that, in the particular case to which the hon. Gentleman referred, great forces were at work in the world which drew the allies together in a coalition that was subsequently blessed by the United Nations. It was not actually a UN force. The idea of a common European policy was secondary and almost invisible.

9.30 pm

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Tristan Garel-Jones): Does my right hon. Friend agree that, during the events to which the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) referred, there was a consistent foreign policy on the part of EC countries through European political co-operation? However, there was no co-ordinated defence response from our European partners. That is one reason why the United Kingdom Government have taken the initiative in seeking to begin to develop, through the Western European Union, a defence dimension for Europe compatible with NATO. However, the political response during the crisis was there.

Mr. Howell: That is partly true, but if my right hon. Friend the Minister recalls the hectic days before the final decision to send troops into Kuwait, he will remember that there were a number of rather dramatic wobbles in the French approach to the matter, quite aside from the views from Bonn and Rome. In the end, a common foreign policy view may have emerged, but it was sadly something following the event rather than at the cutting edge of the event.

Before the intervention by the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick), I was touring the Europe of today trying to illustrate the dangers of stamping too tight a mould on the concept of common foreign policy which, I do not dispute, is useful in certain circumstances. However, if it were a general demand for uniformity, that would be gravely mistaken.

I have already referred to Germany and France. Italy is also a puzzle today. There are those, including senior statesmen in Italy, who question whether Italy will even exist as a state in a few years. It is certainly in a difficult position in respect of formulating and pursuing clear foreign policy. The previous Italian Government had a sort of agenda, particularly in respect of the Balkans. However, that is hardly a sound basis for a co-ordinated foreign policy.

Similarly, I am uncertain about the perspectives and priorities of Spain. It seems that the Spanish socialist Government are approaching the end of their time. A new Government will emerge who will probably remain very committed to the European Community, although the high promises on the economic side are clearly not being met. There is considerable disappointment about that. I really would not like to comment on current Spanish policy priorities, but I do not feel any particular closeness between what the Spanish are saying and what we are saying and identifying as our priorities.

Even poor little Belgium, which seemed to be the acme of the common approach whether in monetary affairs, economic competences or foreign policy, now seems to be quivering on the bough. It faces considerable difficulties on the economic side and in respect of foreign and internal domestic policies.

We have our own foreign policy priorities, part of which relate to the European context. In respect of many of those priorities, we want to work closely with our continental neighbours, not least in establishing a common line in respect of what we can do—if anything can be done at all—about the chaos in Russia or whether we will see that vast federation splinter into 20 countries in the same way that the Soviet Union splintered.

We have a very different perspective at the western end of Europe from that of the Germans and perhaps of almost all our continental neighbours. I have one example that I should like to draw to the attention of the Committee. We have a connection with, experience of and involvement in the Asian scene, particularly that of the south-east, as a result of chance, history and commerce of a kind that is not shared by any of the other Community countries. There is no doubt that events are now shaping in Asia in a hectic way as China begins to become the great economic power that it was always bound to become one day. The Chinese economic regions of Guangdong, Fukian, Hong Kong and Taiwan are beginning to trade with each other and generate capital flows across south-east Asia on a scale that makes our efforts in Europe look puny. It has almost reached the point where the inter-regional trade in south-east Asia is greater than ours in Europe.

I do not want to pursue the sensitive and difficult issue of Hong Kong, but, partly because of that and our traditional interests concerned with our commerce and our involvement and attitude of mind to that region, we are extremely interested in that issue, and we have a great deal to offer.

I make no apology for grinding a favourite axe, but there is no doubt that we and the Japanese have an intimacy and an understanding that is probably unmatched throughout the Community. Fears are aroused in Europe about a Japanese trade invasion, but hopes are also expressed about Japanese investment—a curious ambiguity of sentiments.

There is no doubt that Britain has a particular role to play in interpreting Japan to the rest of the Community and the rest of the Community to Japan. I would be sad to see that unique role submerged or rolled into a common foreign policy of the Community. I accept that the Commission has competencies concerning external trade and negotiates with the Japanese, but it is important to consider security and foreign policies, which are of vast importance.

We will have to become increasingly concerned with the defence structure of Asia. We will have to consider the attitude of the Asians, particularly the Japanese, to Russia, of which they see a far more brutal side than our own. That is of crucial importance to us.

Mr. Mike Gapes (Ilford, South): Is it not a fact that one of the problems of a relationship between the EC and Japan is its strong desire to become a permanent member of the United Nations Security Council? In the long term, our relationship will also be influenced by our relations, as Europeans, with Russia. The Japanese-Russian dispute over the northern islands, as the Japanese call them, is also important.

Surely it is absolutely impossible for us to have an important influence on the strategic debate within the EC unless we firmly endorse the processes towards the development of a common European policy on all aspects of security and international affairs.

Mr. Howell: I quibble only with the word "all" in the hon. Gentleman's intervention. Whether one can apply to all aspects the commonality, the commonisation—to conjure up a hideous word that is not in the dictionary—I rather doubt. The position of Japan vis-a-vis Russia is delicate and sensitive. The debate about its northern Islands is curious, especially when one considers how much territory the old Soviet Union conceded. It is hard for us to understand why the Russians want to hang on so grimly to such rather sad little islands. It is something, however, of great concern to Moscow and leads to extremely bad relations between that city and Tokyo.

Britain has a better understanding of some of the issues and how they might be resolved in a way to enable Japan to help Russia. If ever there was a natural matching, it must be between eastern Russia, a vast area of natural resources and commodities, and Japan, an island factory that uses them all up. That natural partnership does not exist at the moment because those countries detest each other. Perhaps we can help to overcome some of the problems.

Finally, I come to the saddest aspect of all of the attempts to put an over-zealous mould on the European foreign policies of EC members, and that is the Balkan fiasco. Here was an occasion when there appeared to be a European issue and the European nations said that not only was it a European issue, but that, in a sort of inverted way, as the tail came to wag the dog, we must invent a common European foreign policy and demonstrate that there was such a thing in order to deal with the Balkan issue. As a result, some fatal steps were taken, the costs of which, the penalties of which, the blood from which, we see now flowing before us on the television screens almost nightly.

I refer in particular to the decision, taken in the name of a common European foreign policy, to recognise as independent sovereign states Croatia and Bosnia—certainly in the case of Bosnia, flatly against the advice and overriding the criteria laid down by Mr. Badinter of the conseil d'etat, who was authorised to judge and assess whether those countries fulfilled the criteria to be recognised as independent sovereign states. He came to the conclusion that they were not, but they were recognised because, we were told, it was a choice between the common sense, particularly strong here in London and a view particularly held by my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary, with his vast practical grasp of these things, that it was wrong, and the demand that it had to be, because if everyone did not go along with the Germans they would do it anyway and that would bust up the common European foreign policy. Therefore, we had the extraordinary situation where unity was put before sanity.

Mr. George Walden (Buckingham): My hon. Friend makes a valid point, but the situation is even worse than he expresses it, because there was a sort of unity of contradictions. Those who believed as a dogma in a common European foreign policy, and therefore wanted to demonstrate it in ex-Yugoslavia in the way that my right hon. Friend has described, were supported, paradoxically, by those who opposed, vehemently and dogmatically, a common European foreign policy and stressed much more the nationalism in Europe. Those people pressed strongly —I shall name no eminent names—without necessarily even knowing in some cases that there were Muslims in that part of the world, from an opposite side of the spectrum for the catastrophic recognition of parts of former Yugoslavia. Therefore, we had the terrible situation where two dogmas collided to produce the sort of catastrophe that my right hon. Friend has described.

Mr. Howell: My hon. Friend is right and the catastrophe has scarcely begun. There is no conceivable end in sight. We now see the heroic attempts—I do not want to denigrate them in any way—to try to create some order after each stage, as the situation gets more and more violent in the Balkans, being frustrated more and more frequently. We now have the realisation that the famous maps put forward by Lord Owen and Cyrus Vance are unacceptable and, according to, I think, the chief of the general staff in today's papers, unenforceable.

There never was a possibility of even an EC-UN solution being imposed on the Bosnian quagmire, the Bosnian "sponge" and the Bosnian tragedy. Some difficult lessons are yet to be learnt about that sad area before there is the slightest hope that the balance of terror will be so great that the bloodshed and the shooting will cease and it will be possible to police some action to halt the atrocious Serbian aggression in some areas and the atrocities of other groups of combatants in other areas. Basically there must be a recognition—and it will take much swallowing —that the Serbians have won the war. The question is whether any of us, Europeans together or apart, with the Americans or with the Russians, have the political will to roll back the gains that the aggressors have made.

9.45 pm

Mr. Patrick Cormack (Staffordshire, South): Does it not give the most appalling signals of impotence that what has been recognised, rightly or wrongly, as an independent sovereign state is being subjugated by another sovereign state, with all the accompanying atrocities which are far worse than any since the second world war? United Nations soldiers, European soldiers and some British soldiers stand by—I make no criticism of them—while women and children are slaughtered in front of them. Is not that a damning indictment of our impotence?

Mr. Howell: It is a damning indictment of many things, including past mistakes, present impotence and failure to understand with our fingertips what is going on and what motivates people in that part of the world. We can either go on analysing the mistakes that have been made or we can say that we must try to do something constructive to halt the horrific problem that has been created.

We must ensure that both in the treaty and especially in the revision work that is to be done once the treaty is ratified we preserve and strengthen the pillars of intergovernmental co-operation. We put a question mark over the qualified majority voting. I was never in favour of that, although it is in the treaty. Even when joint action has been agreed, that system is a mistake. We must ensure that, when we build the European structure which will lie beyond Maastricht and which will have many qualities that are designed for a decentralised Europe, as my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary put in, we keep the pillars strong, pure and separate from erosion by ideas of imposing common foreign policy on all aspects of the diverse foreign interests of the different Community members, with the rich and encouraging differences that make up modern Europe.

Mr. Rogers: I thank the right hon. Gentleman who, I presume, is giving way. I hope that he will carry on and give us more of his expert advice. Does the right hon. Gentleman believe that structures should be set up on co-operation on these issues which are more elaborate than those proposed in the treaty and in the general context of the development of NATO?

Mr. Howell: I sensed that the Committee wanted to move on and I did not want to detain it for too long. My answer to the hon. Gentleman is no. More elaborate structures are not what we need. Clearer structures of intergovernmental co-operation can certainly be de veloped. We certainly need structures that have a more strongly entrenched element to prevent the constant trend towards centralisation. The language and vocabulary in the treaty beyond this treaty, which should be seen through but must be built on, should be less patronising and should recognise that power comes upwards from the people. We need such powers governing matters such as a common foreign policy, as well as the more centralised competences, rather than powers grandly devolved from the centre. We do not need elaborate structures.

Mr. Michael Lord (Suffolk, Central): My right hon. Friend has given us a delightful explanation of the situation as he sees it, and in his usual precise and gentle way, he has taken to pieces the proposals that we are debating. Does he believe that the right way forward is to ratify the treaty and hope to take things forward in the direction that he wants, or does he think that that is the wrong signal and that now is the time to say, "We don't like the way it is going. We think that much of it is wrong and this is the point where we should stop and look at it anew"?

Mr. Howell: My hon. Friend tempts me, but, no, I do not. Elsewhere, far outside the House, decisions may be taken and events will occur—perhaps in Copenhagen on 18 May or in some constitutional labyrinth in Germany, where there are difficulties with ratification of the treaty—which may stop this part of the Maastricht process. It would be utterly wrong for us actively to seek to halt the Maastricht process and its implications.

Why do I think that? Because I want to see a reshaping of Europe in ways that will be far more congenial to the British temperate and attitudes and to the new applicants—the EFTA countries, the new democracies of eastern Europe and, dare I say it, even to millions of people in France, Germany and Italy. I want Britain to be involved in that and to recognise that, after 10 or 20 years of having been told that we must trail after the train of superior neighbours who will rush ahead otherwise, it is now the other way round and that, through our rather cooler thinking and our insistence on the derogations that we sought in the original Maastricht treaty—not least in the creation of the pillar of foreign policy separate from the Community—we may be in a position, if we can get the confidence in ourselves, which we always seem to lack at the crucial moment, to lead and shape the Europe of the 1990s.

Mr. Rogers: I accept the right hon. Gentleman's advice that it would be wrong to set up elaborate structures. The right hon. Member for Bridgwater (Mr. King) is present; when he was Secretary of State for Defence, Britain took the lead in setting up a rapid reaction corps. The Franco-German brigade is being developed and I should be interested to hear the views of the right hon. Member for Guildford on the development of a European security force.

Mr. Howell: I do not think that these are beginnings. Practical bilateral and intergovernmental arrangements are being made between Community countries. People always underestimate, because there is little rhetoric attached to it, the closeness of French and British co-operation. We hear tremendous speeches about the Franco-German brigade, but the reality is that French and British senior soldiers and military personnel are co-operating in a most intimate and effective way. Such intergovernmental co-operation is good and welcome.

The NATO structure has been, to put it rather brutally, looking for a new role and new mission in the post-cold war world. I think that it will find one because it is a highly efficient model of intergovernmental co-operation. It is almost a supranational model, but it is a very subtle arrangement that we should perhaps think of copying in other areas. That NATO model has at its heart something which is very important: it is a transatlantic structure. What it tells us, the message of a successful NATO that it blinks at us, is that it is not just Britain but America that needs to be at the heart of Europe if we are to establish an effective European security structure to meet this extraordinary new world, in which we do not know where the next threat will come from.

Mr. Cash: My right hon. Friend has employed a seductive argument and put a great deal of emphasis on the separation of the pillars, but I am sure that he will agree that the Commission is associated with those activities. Furthermore, when one looks into the details a little more, one sees a problem. Under article J, the member states effectively subsume their security interests in a common position. It says:

> "The Member States shall support the Union's external and security policy actively and unreservedly in a spirit of loyalty and mutual solidarity. They shall refrain from any action which is contrary to the interests of the Union or likely to impair its effectiveness as a cohesive force in international relations. The Council shall ensure that these principles are complied with."

Does my right hon. Friend have any concern that, in going down that route, the wise words that he used about the value that can be placed on our pragmatism might be subsumed by the problem of our being locked into words that give too much emphasis to the union and to the Commission and effectively undermine the virtues of the policies that he has been advocating for so long?

Mr. Howell: That depends—this is where I differ from many of the things that my hon. Friend says—on the confidence with which one approaches those matters. He has described half the orange—the half that involves the Commission sitting round the table with the Council of Ministers. The Commission is apparently entitled to be another country and one with a considerable voice. There are dangers, as I began by saying, that the pillar dealing with certain foreign policy issues—not all—in a common way, an intergovernmental way, may be eroded, weakened and undermined by the sort of factors that my hon. Friend fears.

I say to my hon. Friend that he should not have too much fear. Let us go into the Europe of the next five years in a spirit of confidence that we can hold the line and indeed reverse some of the trends that we have seen rolling over us in the past few years. I believe that it can be done, but my hon. Friend does not.

Mr. Peter Mandelson (Hartlepool): I found interesting, in the context of his speech, the right hon. Gentleman's remarks about NATO. I assume that he is aiming to conclude his speech by 10 o'clock. In the remaining three minutes, will he say something about the role of the Western European Union as an expression of the European Community's defence identity and whether it might have a peacekeeping role in tandem with the European Community's operations and interest in these matters?

Mr. Howell: The hon. Gentleman leads me to subjects beyond those on which I wanted to touch this evening. I do not want to keep the Committee any longer. As he knows, the problem with the WEU is that it is not an organisation in the sense that NATO is, and some of its members are not members of the Community, and some members of the Community are not members of the WEU. There would be real difficulties in trying to elevate that, as some of the Maastricht treaty architects wanted, into a European security force.

I hope that, when we have ratified Maastricht—I believe that we shall unless the Danes sink it—the intergovernmental quality will be not merely defended but vigorously upheld and developed so as to give us a strong European foreign policy mechanism, which allows us to have our differences of view and pursue those differences without being submerged in a Euro-blur or a ludicrous foreign policy adventure of the kind that has brought only bloodshed and tragedy to the Balkans. I see that many of my hon. Friends wish to contribute to the debate, and I hope that they will have the opportunity to catch your eye, Mr. Morris.

9.59 pm

Mr. Geoffrey Hoon (Ashfield): I am grateful, Mr. Morris, that once again you have given me the opportunity to interest the Committee rather late in the proceedings.

I congratulate the right hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell) and hope to interest the Committee in the next 60 seconds as much as he did for the duration of his speech.

It now goes without saying that the main security problems for western Europe are no longer the military threat from the former Soviet Union or any of its successors, or indeed from the other former Warsaw pact countries. The problems now are the dangers arising from economic, political and ethnic instabilities.

It being Ten o'clock, THE CHAIRMAN left the Chair to report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Committee report progress; to sit again tomorrow.

Standard Spending Assessment (Cambridgeshire)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Nicholas Baker.]

10 pm

Mrs. Anne Campbell (Cambridge): I must confess that the standard spending assessment is not a subject which fascinates everyone. After a session in which many hon. Members were up all night, it is perhaps not surprising that so few of them remain in the Chamber for this debate. However, I am very pleased to see the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, Sout-West (Sir A. Grant) in his seat, because, as one of my fellow Members for Cambridgeshire, he obviously shares my great interest in this matter. I am very grateful to him for turning up this evening.

There is a pattern in the Government's treatment of local authorities—a pattern, I am afraid, of failing to listen, undermining local democracy and removing accountability, and at the same time imposing spending cuts.

The standard spending assessments fit that pattern in all three respects. That is not just my view; it is the view of the Audit Commission which, in a leaked draft report, says that standard spending assessments and cappings leave councils with only cosmetic accountability for decisions largely made by Ministers.

That is not just Labour's and the Audit Commission's view. At a recent meeting of the Conservative-controlled Cambridgeshire county council, a resolution which referred to gross anomalies called for an urgent review of "such dubious measures as the Standard Spending Assessment and the Area Cost Adjustment."

That resolution, I am pleased to say, received all-party support.

That is all the more surprising when one knows that Cambridgeshire Conservative councillors quake at the knees at the mere thought of the tongue-lashing that they will receive from their former leader, the noble Lady Baroness Blatch for supporting publicly a resolution so critical of the Government. It is quite astonishing, and shows how strongly they feel. It is a situation in which anger conquers fear.

I can therefore say that I speak on behalf of the people of Cambridgeshire when I call on the Government to review the basis of the standard spending assessment and to give a fairer deal to Cambridgeshire.

If we look at some figures first to put the whole thing in context, we see that Cambridgeshire's SSA for 1993-94 is £380·6 million. The council budget has been set £2 million higher than this at the capping limit, and was negotiated because of the larger sums of money lost to further education than in the Government's formula calculations. This has meant an extra £10 on the council tax for a band B property across the county.

I also welcome the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, South-East (Mr. Paice) who is now almost in his seat, and express my pleasure that he has chosen to attend this evening as well.

The education SSA for Cambridgeshire is £217·8 million, and the education budget is £226·75 million. That is £9 million higher, yet, even in that situation, Cambridgeshire is well down the list of all counties for spending per pupil. What are very sad and have angered local people immensely over the past few months are the cuts in education which Cambridgeshire is having to impose.

We have recently seen £400,000 taken out of the community education budget. That has affected many people and particularly many pensioners, people who may not have many pleasures in life and get a great deal out of community education, including social contact and the opportunity to develop their skills and talents.

The county has also taken £340,000 from its post-16 transport, which means that pupils who previously had a free bus service to school are being charged £40 a term to get to college. That affects many of my constituents who travel from the north side of Cambridge to the south side, to get to the sixth form college. It also affects much more drastically the constituents of the Conservative Members for Cambridgeshire, South-East and for Cambridgeshire, South-West. One could call it a tax on rural communities.

Also, £200,000 has been taken out of the discretionary further education awards budget; that also affects the opportunities of people in Cambridgeshire.

These, however, pale into insignificance when compared with the £1·3 million taken from the central education support services, even though Cambridgeshire is among the top 10 authorities for delegating resources to schools.

That is not all. Because of the increasing pupil numbers in secondary schools, they would have expected to receive an additional £900,000 this year, simply because of the way in which the local management of schools budget works, but that has not happened.

This is not a profligate, spendthrift, giveaway authority but a county that was so mean with its spending that the Conservatives lost control in 1985 when its leader was the noble Lady Baroness Blatch, now a Minister in the Department of Education. The Conservatives must be worried that they look set to lose control again in 1993 because the people of Cambridgeshire are fed up with penny-pinching and cuts. They want a quality service, investment in the future, in our children, in our excellent community education service; and they want the opportunity for students, particularly mature students, to win discretionary awards, so that they can gain the qualifications which they need and which the country needs.

The area cost adjustment is based on the new earnings survey, which is valid statistically at the economic planning regional level. Cambridgeshire comes into the East Anglian economic planning region, with Norfolk and Suffolk, and it gets no area cost adjustment, unlike Bedfordshire and Hertfordshire, which come into the south-east region.

The Library has supplied me with statistics looking at the standard spending assessments per pupil for five to 15-year-olds for 1993 to 1994. I see that the SSA per pupil for that age range in Cambridgeshire is £2,218. It is £115 more per pupil in Essex, £135 more per pupil in Hertfordshire and £215 more in Bedfordshire. That money buys a great deal in terms of resources.

The area cost adjustment is unfair. First of all, it is based on insufficient information. The economic planning region statistics are being used to determine spending at county and district levels. In fact, if the funding of grant-maintained schools is based on future standard spending assessments, we shall see the economic planning region statistics being used to determine spending in individual schools, and the situation will become even more ridiculous, and will give rise to even greater anomalies.

The area cost adjustment is unfair because it is based on insufficient, and insufficiently detailed, information. It is also based on the wrong information, because it assumes that, in expensive areas, staff are paid more to compensate for higher costs. In fact, a survey carried out by the Association of County Councils showed that there was very little variation in pay levels for teachers, police officers and fire fighters. These people are paid on national scales, so the whole basis of the area cost calculation is anomalous and inconsistent.

There is also in my area an inconsistency in the regional organisation of the Department of the Environment. It is a little curious that the Department's regional office covering Cambridge is in Bedford, yet, for the area cost adjustment, Bedfordshire and Cambridgeshire are in different economic planning regions. That does not seem to make sense.

When the SSA system replaced the grant-related expenditure assessments in 1990-91, the proportion of education control totals distributed for additional educational needs rose from 10 per cent. to 24 per cent. —a massive leap. Since then, the proportion has fallen a little, but it remains far higher than is justified. In fact, it is being used as a political fudge factor. A much higher proportion needs to be allocated for basic educational needs.

Finally, I believe that there is consensus that standard spending assessments are inequitable and that they are being abused—inequitable because they do not reflect the true costs of providing local services; abused because they are being used to impose on local authorities spending limits that should be decided by local people at local elections, and not by way of Government diktat.

The term "standard spending assessment" implies that the SSA takes account of the cost of providing a standard level of service in each local education authority area, but this is not true. In fact, each Department at Government level decides its control total, and then the SSA is simply used to divide this total between local authorities.

I am obviously fascinated to learn that the Secretary of State for the Environment is planning a review of the standard spending assessment system, including the area cost adjustment, in the coming year. I very much hope that that review will be more than window-dressing, that it will not be designed simply to fob local authorities off for another year. I hope that it will result in a fairer deal for the people of Cambridgeshire, but the precedents are not encouraging. I fear that the ugly pattern of imposing cuts and undermining democracy will continue. That is why I initiated this debate. I hope that the Minister will take on board the points that I have made.

10.13 pm

Sir Anthony Grant (Cambridgeshire, South-West): I am very grateful to the hon. Member for Cambridge (Ms Campbell) for allowing me a moment to participate in this important debate. She put her case with great care and a great deal of charm. In fact, so charming was she that I shall not say a word about the mismanagement of Cambridgeshire under a Lib-Lab coalition. I draw a veil right over that and confine myself to saying that Cambridgeshire county council, under Conservative control, has displayed very good, efficient financial management. The hon. Lady described it as penny-pinching and tight-fisted.

However, the hon. Lady and I are in total agreement about the fact that the council has been unfairly treated for a very long time by the central Government over the question of the SSA. I can go back as far as 1983, when I had very serious complaints. With my noble Friend Lord Pym, I abstained. We were given an acknowledgement by the Minister—now the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster—that Cambridgeshire had been unfairly treated, and were told that the Government would try to be fair in future. I have not seen much sign of fairness. We are still stuck with the wretched area cost adjustment, to which the hon. Lady rightly referred, which seriously militates against us.

My hon. Friends the Members for Cambridgeshire, South-East (Mr. Paice) and for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Moss) and I have nagged about this issue year after year. On 3 February this year, I raised the matter with the Secretary of State. I pointed out that it was ridiculous that Cambridgeshire

"does not benefit, whereas Bedfordshire, Oxfordshire and Hertfordshire do. This creates great ill-feeling. I do not believe that it can be rectified by the Association of County Councils" and I said that the Government should get a grip on the matter. The Secretary of State replied:

"I understand very well the concern that my hon. Friend expresses. Indeed, it has been expressed to me very often by several of my hon. Friends. I understand the strength of feeling on this issue, and I can give my hon. Friend the undertaking for which he has asked".—[Official Report, 3 February 1993; Vol. 218, c. 339.]

I hope that that will be reiterated by the Minister when replying to tonight's debate, and that we shall have some action at long last. The whole principle of area cost adjustment is completely outdated. It is stuck in a sort of rigid time warp. It is time to scrap it and start again from scratch.

I have been pleased to note the way in which the mood of Government seems to have changed over the years. For example, yesterday the Secretary of State repeated that he was "going to undertake a fundamental review of the SSA system in time for the next settlement".—[Official Report, 24 March 1993; Vol. 221, c. 908.]

I hope that the consensus on the issue between all Cambridgeshire hon. Members will work on the hearts and heads of Ministers, so that next year there will be an end once and for all to the unfairness from which the fastest growing county in the country has suffered for far too long.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Robin Squire): I wish at the outset to congratulate the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mrs. Campbell) on her good fortune in securing this debate and on the way she spoke. I also congratulate my hon. and long-time Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, South-West (Sir A. Grant) and my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, South-East (Mr. Paice), who has been in his place throughout this short debate. At some time this morning—which, as we know, was Wednesday—hon. Members on both sides must have wondered whether this debate would take place.

I am pleased to have another opportunity to speak about the calculation of standard spending assessments, or SSAs as they are known, focusing this time on the calculations for Cambridgeshire. Those assessments have an important place in the system of local government, but they are often misunderstood. I hope that hon. Members will bear with me if I begin by explaining some of the general principles, before going on to explain how they apply to Cambridgeshire in particular. Indeed, only by understanding the general principles can one hope to understand any individual calculation. That is because it is a hallmark of SSAs that they must be calculated on the basis of general principles, applied fairly and consistently to all authorities providing a particular service.

Hence, the method of calculating the SSA for Cambridgeshire is, and must be, the same as the method of calculating the SSA for other counties. That is a vital safeguard against arbitrary determinations and a safeguard which, I trust, commands widespread support in the House. I do not wish to stray into very controversial territory tonight, but I assure the hon. Lady that, back in the days when I was leader of a local authority, before I came into this House and when there was an alternative Government in power, the system allowed for a significantly greater variation on precisely the lines that she mentioned—I think her words were "political fudge".

In any discussion of SSAs, we must bear in mind the underlying aim of the SSA calculation: to calculate a figure for each authority—its SSA—which represents the Government's assessment of the level of revenue spending by that authority which should enable it to provide services to a common standard. This common standard is that which is consistent with the Government's view of the appropriate level of revenue expenditure for all local authorities combined, bearing in mind the position of the economy.

The SSA has two main functions. First, it helps to determine the amount of revenue support grant received by each authority. In effect, the grant is distributed in such a way that, if all authorities were to spend at the level of their SSA, the level of local tax could be broadly the same in all areas of the country. This was the case with the community charge, and will also apply to the council tax. Secondly, SSAs are used—as the hon. Lady is aware—as a benchmark for comparison within the capping framework when forming a view as to whether the level of an authority's budget, or the proposed increase in that budget, is reasonable or excessive.

These are vital roles, and they explain why I have stressed that it is important for SSAs to be calculated on general principles which are seen to be fair. I should therefore like to spend a few minutes explaining the basis of the calculations.

Although SSAs were actually introduced for the first time in 1990-91, they are the end result of a long period of evolution, in comparison with their predecessors under the previous system, which were known as grant-related expenditure assessments. SSAs have the great advantage of a much reduced degree of complexity. Nevertheless, they build on the large body of detailed research evidence which underpinned the earlier assessments. They also share with them the characteristic of having been extensively discussed, over a number of years, with the local authority associations.

SSAs aim to take account of the main characteristics of an authority which will affect its spending requirement. This is a daunting task covering expenditure in 1993-94, of some £37 billion by over 400 local authorities. There are, of course, constraints on the extent to which this objective can be achieved at any one time. In particular, SSAs have to be based on sound data sources—the census being a prime example—which are available on a consistent basis for all authorities.

Many factors are taken into account in the formulae, and they fall broadly into three categories. There are demographic factors—for example, what proportion of the population are children or elderly. These give us the size of the actual or potential client groups which help determine the need to spend in key areas such as education or personal social services. There are the socio-economic characteristics of the population. Research has shown that, for some services, the need to spend can vary with the number of people falling into certain disadvantaged categories—for example, the numbers in single-parent families or those receiving income support.

These indicators are reflected in SSA calculations. For example, over one fifth of the education SSA element is distributed by reference to an indicator of this kind representing additional educational needs—referred to by the hon. Lady.

Finally, there are adjustment factors to allow for higher employment costs in London and the south-east.

How then do all these factors affect Cambridgeshire? The total SSA for Cambridgeshire in 1993-94 is just over £380 million, which is an increase of 2·6 per cent. on last year's total. After adjusting for major changes of function. of the total, about 57 per cent.—£218 million—is accounted for by education, up by 2·6 per cent. on 1992-93, and a further 13 per cent.—£50 million by personal social services, up by 4·2 per cent. on 1992-93. This, incidentally, excludes the special grant in respect of the local authority's new responsibilities for community care. The remaining 30 per cent. of the SSA is distributed across a number of other services, such as police, fire, and highways maintenance.

It is, however, difficult to discuss such figures sensibly without providing some basis for comparison. If, for example, we divide the total SSA by the resident population of Cambridgeshire, we find that Cambridgeshire's SSA is £568 per head of population. That is a little below the average for all counties, which is £584 per head. In fact, Cambridgeshire ranks 22nd of the 39 counties on this basis. I might also mention here that Cambridge city, the constituency represented by the hon. Member, has an SSA of £116 per head, which is over 25 per cent. above the national average for shire districts, which is £92 per head; it has, moreover, increased by 5·2 per cent. on the equivalent figure for 1992-93, an increase which is more than twice the overall average for shire districts.

We find much the same picture if we examine the figures relating specifically to education. Cambridgeshire's education SSA includes £1,802 per pupil aged five to 10 and £2,613 per pupil aged 11 to 15—again, in both cases just below the average for all counties.

What underlies those figures? If we concentrate on education, which is far the largest component, we find that the formula includes a basic element per pupil in each age group which is the same for all authorities. There are then additional amounts in recognition of various special factors, the three most important being sparsity of population, an index of additional educational needs and a cost adjustment to compensate for the higher employment costs in London and the south-east.

Cambridgeshire receives a relatively high allowance in respect of sparsity, an adjustment that recognises the inevitable diseconomies of running small schools or incurring high school transport costs. It also receives an amount just above the county average for additional needs. This in turn reflects the fact that they are positioned towards the middle of the range in terms of the indicators used to measure the incidence of additional needs.

To take one example, the 1993-94 indicators show that about 12 per cent. of children in Cambridgeshire are children of income support claimants. That compares with 29 per cent. for Cleveland, at one end of the county spectrum, and less than 8 per cent. for Surrey at the other. In fact, in terms of the overall index for additional educational needs, Cambridgeshire again ranks 22nd of the 39 counties. Such reasons explain the differences between SSAs per head to which the hon. Lady referred.

Then there is the area cost adjustment. I know that it is an issue of particular concern to the hon. Lady. It is a topic which has been raised by Cambridgeshire on several occasions, including a meeting which took place just before Christmas with my hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government. As my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, South-West pointed out, he has raised the issue several times. It is a fact that Cambridgeshire does not benefit from the area cost adjustment, which is confined to London and to counties in the south-east. It is based mainly on evidence from the new earnings survey. This is a survey based on a sample of information from employers, and the sample is too small to allow reliable figures to be calculated for individual counties, even if that were considered desirable. The analysis does, therefore, have to be calculated at a regional level and, on this basis, results have shown that only London and the south-east face costs which are consistently and significantly above the national average.

It has also been suggested that the area cost adjustment may be too high because it is well above the standard rates of London weighting paid—as the hon. Lady herself pointed out—to groups such as teachers, police and firemen. We have not so far been convinced by this argument, as other relevant costs need to be taken to account. More generally, however, we have been struck by the number of representations being made about the area cost adjustment, arguing—I stress this—for changes in both directions, and by the strength of the feelings aroused. The Secretary of State has therefore already made it clear that this will be one of the topics to which we shall give very careful attention during this year's review of the SSA methodology.

I shall write to the hon. Lady about at least one of the points she made, because time will not allow me to deal with it. She spoke about cuts in education in general. Of course, she is well aware that the detailed budgets of local authorities are a matter for the authorities themselves; in general, however, we believe that provision made within the settlement is adequate when account is taken of the much reduced level of inflation, the policy of pay restraint for public sector workers and the scope for improved efficiency in the delivery of public services.

In reaching our decisions, we took account of the pressures on local authority services, but we also had to have regard to the capacity of the taxpayer, locally and nationally, to bear the burden of expenditure. Job losses are sometimes unavoidable, and of course they are always a matter of regret, but local authorities must play their part in the vital task of controlling public expenditure.

With the hon. Lady's permission, I will write to her about the delays—as she would put it—in reflecting increases in pupil numbers, and about additional educational needs.

Of course, all local authorities would like to have more money, and I am sure that there are many worthwhile projects on which the extra money could be spent. However, we all have to live within our means. I believe that the settlement that we have provided for 1993-94 is very fair, in the light of the current low levels of inflation and the difficult economic circumstances that the country faces. It is fair both to the beneficiaries of services and to those who pay for them.

I am pleased to note that council taxes in Cambridgeshire will generally be well below the national average. No doubt that reflects in large part the prudent management by Cambridgeshire authorities in general of the resources at their disposal.

I concede that many criticisms have been made of SSAs, but that is to be expected when everyone would like a larger slice of the RSG cake. I would never wish to pretend that SSAs were perfect. Indeed, I would say that perfection is a target that is always bound to prove elusive in an area of such complexity. It is one of the great merits of the system that the entire process is completely open, with all data available for inspection. The methodology is continually under inspection with local authority representatives and other interested parties.

The process of trying to improve and update SSAs is never-ending. As I have said, 1993 will be an especially busy year in SSA development, not least because we expect to take on board the full range of indicators from the 1991 census.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at half-past Ten o'clock.

House of Commons

Friday 26 March 1993

The House met at half-past Nine o'clock

PRAYERS

[MADAM SPEAKER in the Chair]

PETITIONS

Railways Bill

9.35 am

Mr. Robert Adley (Christchurch): I have the honour to present a petition from more than 300 paid-up members of the Highcliffe branch of the Christchurch and East Dorset Conservative Association who wish to express their grave concern about the Railways Bill. This is the tip of the iceberg. My political activists are worried that the Government's plans are ill conceived, will damage Britain's railways and will not increase the essential investment on which the railways depend.

The petition says:

Wherefore your petitioners pray that your honourable House determine, prior to the passage of legislation, the role expected of the railway system: and that a policy of seeking to divert traffic from road to rail, funded by the public or private sector, be determined in such a manner as to retain an integrated railway system.

And your Petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Housing

9.36 am

Mr. Charles Hendry (High Peak): I wish to present a petition which has been signed by 218,617 people from throughout the United Kingdom, organised by the Churches National Housing Coalition. It states:

That the growth and persistence of homelessness and bad housing is a fact, a scandal and a threat to future generations. The human suffering and social division caused make this an issue that each of us must face.

The churches are united in calling for compassion and justice in national housing policies.

Wherefore your Petitioners pray that your honourable House will urge the Government to make housing a higher priority by: making 100,000 affordable homes available each year, using both public and private housing, to meet rural and urban housing need; improving choice and quality of housing for all tenants; implementing further measures to tackle homelessness, especially amongst young people; targeting government resources, such as mortgage interest tax relief, to those in greatest housing need.

To lie upon the Table.

Orders of the Day

Licensing (Amendment) (Scotland) Bill

Order for Third Reading read.

9.37 am

Mr. Phil Gallie (Ayr): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

Today, it is my unenviable—perhaps some would say, regrettable—task to present the Licensing (Amendment) (Scotland) Bill. I carry a great burden, if not an unusual one, because it is, indeed, a rare task. None the less, I feel privileged as a minnow in the shoal of the massed ranks of Tory Members on these green Benches. It is, perhaps, not such a mass as before the 1992 election, but, for Scotland, I am pleased to say that it is an expanded mass. We have almost 20 per cent. more representation than we had prior to the 1992 election.

What is unusual or regrettable about the task to which I refer? Indeed, what is the task? If I do not define it, I shall risk your rebuke, Madam Speaker. The task is to amend the Licensing (Scotland) Act 1976. The means is the Licensing (Amendment) (Scotland) Bill 1992. I emphasise 1992, because the Bill is not based on a sudden impulse. It has been around for a while. It was first introduced in December. Since then, it has experienced a tortuous journey through Committee, where it had a thorough analysis. It was fully endorsed by hon. Members on both sides of the House. It was, indeed, warmly welcomed.

The Bill was fully debated for a marathon 12 minutes in Committee on 16 February. Until that time, all had gone to plan. Then, in the words of Britain's finest, most revered and most respected poet, Robert Burns, whose birth in Alloway in my constituency some 200 years ago gives cause for a worldwide celebration and ensures a worldwide reputation for my constituency and whose claim to such a position would, I am sure, be endorsed by Opposition Members,

"The best laid schemes o' Mice an' Men, Gang aft agley."

Something went wrong when the Bill was presented for Third Reading at the end of February. An Opposition Member representing a Welsh constituency was heard to object. I suggest that a slight error may have been made, because it seemed more like a cough. It is a reasonable Bill, it is fully accepted by all and there was no real reason for objection. But Mr. Deputy Speaker thought that he heard an objection and, of course, Deputy Speakers are always right. I have no argument with that. The Bill is necessary to the well-being of the Scottish people and the fortunes of all who live in the land beyond Hadrian's wall.

That brings me back to my opening words—unusual, regrettable and rare. The Bill is necessary because of a mistake that was made by the Government and endorsed by a Committee of the House. I am sure that hon. Members will agree that a mistake by a Conservative Government is a rare event. It is an unusual event, certainly since 1979. I offer no comment on pre-1974.

A mistake was made in the Planning and Compensation Act 1991. The Bill amends the Licensing (Scotland) Act 1976 and the problem is contained in section 23 of that Act, which requires licensing boards, when granting new liquor licences, to witness a certificate to ensure that the availability of premises to which it refers is valid with respect to planning, building control and hygiene. Applicants must produce a certificate showing that full or outline planning permission has been obtained under section 1 of the Town and Country Planning (Scotland) Act 1972 and that further planning permission is not required.

As from 25 September 1992, section 51 determinations were replaced by section 90A certificates of lawfulness of proposed use of development, which were introduced by section 42 of the Planning and Compensation Act 1991. Therein lies the problem that we are dealing with today.

The 1991 Act repealed section 51 of the 1972 Act, but it did not consequently amend section 23(2) of the Licensing (Scotland) Act to refer to section 90A certificates.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (Colchester, North): What a scandal.

Mr. Gallie: It sent reverberations shaking through every town hall in Scotland. It sent every licensee who thought that he might wish to change the terms of his licence scurrying to his solicitors to see what dastardly Act had been imposed on them.

The Bill rectifies all those wrongs. Clause 1(1) will amend section 23 of the Licensing (Scotland) Act. Clause 1(2) adds to section 23(2) of the 1976 Act a reference to a certificate under section 90A of the Town and Country Planning (Scotland) Act. It should be noted that the reference to section 51 remains, to ensure that determinations established before 25 September 1992 remain valid. That is very important. Section 90A enables planning authorities to grant certificates of lawful use or development to premises. Clause 2(1) contains the short title and subsection (2) provides that the Bill extends to Scotland only. I thank hon. Members from England and Wales for being present to listen to this essential piece of Scottish legislation.

I said that it is unusual and rare that such amendments are necessary—certainly in Scottish legislation. That reflects credit on my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland and his energetic, vibrant and meticulous team of Scottish Office Ministers, and there is no one more fitting to represent them today than my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, West (Lord James Douglas-Hamilton). It also reflects credit on Scottish Office officials, who draft legislation. I pay particular tribute to them.

Mr. Jenkin: I congratulate my hon. Friend on the detail and thoroughness with which he has approached this short but complex measure, but will he comment on the source of the error, how it arose and who might have been responsible for it?

Mr. Gallie: We are dealing with a complex array of measures, with many pages of documents amending legislation, especially the 1991 Act. It would be incongruous to investigate one minor omission among a mass of legislation. We do not need a witch hunt; we simply need to rectify a wrong, which I seek the blessisng of the House to do today.

I thank the Scottish Office officials for their speedy action in drafting the amendment. I particularly thank Michael Clancey of the Law Society of Scotland, who has been of much assistance in highlighting and assisting with the problems surrounding the Bill. It would be wrong not to thank the hon. Member for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall), who is not here today, and the hon. Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mrs. Fyfe) who, like me, has given up a day in her constituency to be here. My constituents in Ayr usually expect my presence on a Friday. I ask all hon. Members in the House today to approve the Bill and to give it their full support.

9.49 am

Mrs. Maria Fyfe (Glasgow, Maryhill): I congratulate the hon. Member for Ayr (Mr. Gallie) on introducing the Bill, and I congratulate the officials concerned in the Scottish Office and anyone else who played a part in correcting an admitted error.

I do not want to prolong discussion of the Bill as our agenda today contains an important Bill that matters a great deal to the people of Scotland—the Carrying of Knives etc. (Scotland) Bill on which, I hope, the hon. Member for Ayr will speak.

The Labour party supports the Bill. We know that the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities is happy for it to be introduced. It is a welcome change for a Conservative Member to admit an error. That is a rare event. Confession is good for the soul and I hope that the Government will confess their errors more often.

9.50 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Lord James Douglas-Hamilton): I warmly congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Ayr (Mr. Gallie) on his splendid Bill which helps to put right an anomaly and to rectify the matter. I also thank the hon. Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mrs. Fyfe) for her support in the matter.

During the past 90 years, there have been only four major pieces of licensing legislation in Scotland. The Licensing (Scotland) Act 1976 arose from the recommendations of the report of the departmental committee on Scottish licensing, chaired by Dr. Christopher Clayson. That forms the main corpus of current law on liquor licensing in Scotland. It was amended in 1990, as my hon. Friend the Member for Ayr said, by the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Scotland) Act, which introduced the new concept of children's certificates and standardised permitted hours for pub opening during the week and on Sundays.

The current liquor licensing law in Scotland has generally stood the test of time, although, from time to time, proposals are made to improve procedures and we consider them carefully. Problems occasionally arise which, if not remedied by statute, result in lacunas. The Bill aims to remove such a lacuna.

Section 23 of the Licensing (Scotland) Act 1976 requires applicants for the grant of a new liquor licence to produce to the licensing board certificates about the suitability of their premises in relation to planning, building control and food hygiene. The applicant has to submit a certificate from the planning authority to the effect that full or outline planning permission has been obtained or that the planning authority has made a determination under section 51 of the Town and Country Planning (Scotland) Act 1972 that planning permission is not required.

With effect from 25 September 1992, section 51 determinations will be replaced by section 90A certificates of lawfulness of the proposed use or development, introduced by section 42 of the Planning and Compensation Act 1991. The 1991 Act repealed section 51 of the 1972 Act, but, unfortunately, it did not make any consequential amendment to section 23(2) of the 1976 Act. I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Ayr for saying that there is no need for a witch hunt in this connection. Occasionally, even the best officials in Whitehall and Ministers can miss errors. I am glad that my hon. Friend is putting the matter right.

The purpose of the Bill is to amend the Licensing (Scotland) Act 1976 to take account of the changes introduced by the Planning and Compensation Act 1991. The change introduced by that Act concerned what are known as certificates of lawful use or development. That amendment was a single point of detail in a wide-ranging Act. The impact on the Licensing (Scotland) Act 1976 was inadvertent, so it may be helpful for me to explain some of the underlying issues.

In general terms, the Planning and Compensation Act 1991 was intended to improve the efficiency of the planning system and of the compensation code. It did so in a number of ways, not all of which are directly related, and as a follow-up to the commitments in the environment White Paper "This Common Inheritance" and as a result of recommendations in the 1989 Carnwath report, which focused primarily on the efficiency and effectiveness of the planning enforcement system. It had been the subject of detailed investigation and Mr. Carnwath undertook to carry out a review of that work and to draw up appropriate conclusions and recommendations for change.

I do not intend to detail those recommendations, but I shall highlight some of the general conclusions that Mr. Carnwath reached, as they provide the relevant background to the Planning and Compensation Act 1991. Mr. Carnwath concluded that previous enforcement arrangements were unduly technical and complex and that, as a result, there was considerable confusion about what the law required. He also considered that the previous system did not lend itself to dealing quickly with urgent cases of enforcement. Speed is, of course, necessary in these matters. The processes needed to be simplified. Similarly, the previous arrangements were too cumbersome and protracted for dealing with even the more simple breaches of conditions. The system also lacked teeth, in the sense that the courts appeared to be imposing inadequate penalties, a point which my hon. Friend the Member for Ayr has rightly highlighted on many occasions.

The national guidance provided to local authorities was seen as being ambiguous. In consequence, Mr. Carnwath recommended that we provided for better information and co-operation, that we rationalised and simplified our enforcement notice procedures, that we clarified the powers of the Secretary of State on appeal, that we reduced legal delay in the courts, that we better defined the nature of lawful land use and that we modified the stop notice and enforcement procedures. He recommended that we introduced injunctions and interdicts, that we increased penalties, as my hon. Friend the Member for Ayr would wish, and that we revised our policy guidelines.

The Planning and Compensation Act 1991 sought to implement many of the recommendations. In so doing, our attempts to provide for a determination of lawful land use inadvertently clashed with the need to provide certificates of established use under section 23 of the Licensing (Scotland) Act 1976. The precise significance and use of the certificates is inevitably a complex and technical matter. In general terms, the 1991 Act sought on this point of detail to define the concept of lawfulness in the context of land use and to introduce a better system for certifying the lawfulness of proposed or existing operations, uses or activities on, over and under land. It did so by providing for the new certificates of lawful use or development. The Town and Country Planning (Scotland) Act 1972 provided for certificates of established use or section 51 determinations for which, as my hon. Friend the Member for Ayr realises, planning permission was not required.

Both arrangements were repealed by section 42 of the 1991 Act. The intention was to provide a single coherent mechanism for establishing the planning status of land and to provide a statutory document for certifying the lawfulness of such uses. The benefits of such a revision were greater flexibility, convenience and a less ambiguous statutory arrangement for certifying the lawfulness of land use.

The new procedure provides a single mechanism for establishing the planning status of land, whether for existing use or for proposed development. It provides for the first time a mechanism for obtaining from the planning authority or from the Secretary of State on appeal a statutory document for certifying the lawfulness for planning purposes of existing operation, development or use.

The system contrasts sharply with the previous system under which lawfulness was determined not by reference to a single certificate, but by reference to a number of different conditions. Those conditions are related to particular definitions of development under the 1972 Act, to the nature of exact grants of planning permission and to the date of development. Anomalies could arise under those arrangements. It was, for example, possible for breaches of planning control to become immune from enforcement action. It was thus possible for ambiguities to arise, such as developments that were unlawful, but were immune from any remedies. That anomaly no longer exists.

If a development or activity is immune from enforcement action, it is now also lawful for planning purposes. In that context, certificates of lawful use or development will not preclude the need to examine the underlying issues, but, once they have been examined and a certificate has been issued, remaining ambiguities will be removed as a statutory and, therefore, unambiguous statement of the lawfulness of the land.

A number of other benefits have been conferred by the new certificates. The Act enables anyone to apply to the planning authority for a decision on whether an activity is lawful for planning purposes. The certificates also provide for a detailed statement of such land uses. Once issued, the certificates preclude the need for further detailed work by the applicants or planning authorities in relation to the granting of planning permission. The certificates equate to the granting of planning permission for the designated activity. Clearly, that will have a beneficial effect and will reduce the work for both the developer and the regulator. I stress that the certificates in no way pre-empt the need for careful consideration of the appropriateness of the specific land uses.

[Lord James Douglas-Hamilton]

My hon. Friend the Member for Ayr has done a substantial service in introducing the Bill to put right the anomaly. I welcome the comments of the hon. Member for Maryhill and I am glad that the matter can be put behind us and that the Bill will soon be on the statute book. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Ayr.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed.

Local Government (Overseas Assistance) Bill

As amended (in the Standing Committee), considered.

Clause 1

POWER TO PROVIDE ADVICE AND ASSISTANCE

10.2 am

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): I beg to move amendment No. 2, in page 1, line 16 at end insert—

'(3A) The power in subsection (1) above shall not restrict the use of any other statutory provision under which a local authority may provide information to and may undertake activities with local government and other bodies outside the United Kingdom.'.

The Bill had a constructive Committee stage. It was one of those rare parliamentary occasions when much co-operation and light, instead of heat, was exchanged. I do not think that the Report stage should delay us too much. However, I want further assurances from the Minister and the Bill's promoter, the hon. Member for Broxstowe (Mr. Lester), who is to be congratulated on introducing the Bill and steering it thus far.

Amendment No. 2 ensures that the new power is to be without prejudice to the existing powers. It raises an issue of considerable concern to practitioners in the overseas section of local government and is arguably the most important of the amendments. It would ensure that the creation of the new power—which we all welcome—does not close off the possibility of using other powers of a more general nature which may have been available to local government.

Local authorities have had to be inventive in the past in making use of general or discretionary powers when undertaking overseas assistance. They have also been exceedingly inventive in using those powers for domestic arrangements. They have been innovators and have sought to push forward work that has now gained wide official approval, using powers such as section 137—as amended —and section 142, on the powers to give information, of the Local Government Act 1972. The reason for the Bill is that, in the past, the Audit Commission has been concerned that no distinctive power existed. It rapidly became clear that a gap existed in the law, which the Bill seeks to fill.

It would be unfortunate if existing schemes and activities were disrupted by legal advice to local authorities to the effect that such work should, in future, be undertaken solely under the power contained in the Bill. Local authority lawyers and district auditors have occasionally been forced into a restrictive view of the powers of local government to secure against possible legal challenges. Amendment No. 2 provides the answer to those fears by making it clear in the legislation that the new power should not restrict the use by any authority of any other statutory provision, under which information may be provided to local government or other organisations outside the United Kingdom or activities may be undertaken with them.

It is clear that, in most cases, the authorities will undertake the new activities under the powers contained in the Bill. The amendment essentially concerns existing activities that could potentially be needlessly brought within the consent provision. It would be helpful if the Minister would explain what the position will be in relation to projects undertaken under the discretionary powers after the Bill's passage. It would also be of assistance if he could state that he will be willing to discuss both that process and the general issue with the local authority associations involved.

Mr. Jim Lester (Broxtowe): I welcome the remarks of the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) and the way in which he opened the debate. Many of us regard him as being beneficial when he is in light mood, rather than creating heat. Today must be a special day for him as I know of his profound interest in whales. I understand from the newspapers that a number of whales trapped in Scapa Flow have been rescued from their fate worse than death. They have now been released into the open sea. I am sure that we all share the pleasure that the hon. Gentleman must feel and admire him for his campaigning on behalf of whales.

Mr. Tony Banks: I wish to associate myself with the hon. Gentleman's remarks about the rescue of the sperm whales in Scotland. In a world in which so much distressing news assails us in the newspapers, that news has brought a bit of light and pleased everyone involved with the plight of whales. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will return to the subject next Friday when I have an Adjournment debate on the resumption of commercial whaling by Norway.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): I hope that the hon. Member for Broxtowe (Mr. Lester) will not seek to anticipate what will happen next week.

Mr. Lester: I never seek to anticipate anything—it takes me long enough just to get around each 24 hours. I share the feelings of the hon. Member for Newham, North-West and I thought that it was worth raising the subject of the whales as I know of his interest in them.

I thank the hon. Gentleman for the way in which he has handled the Bill for the Opposition. The issue is not one of dogma, but involves the basis of the Bill. We genuinely seek to reassure local authorities that we have no desire to restrict the powers that they may have. The Bill was introduced as we detected that there was a grey area—some authorities regarded themselves as having the power, some authorities were not sure whether they had that power and many authorities felt that they did not have it. The Bill clarifies the position to show that the authorities have a clear power.

Local authorities have been inventive—often, to represent the degree of internationalism within specific local authorities. If people genuinely want to help, they look to see how best they can do so. One reason for drafting the Bill as we have was to give such authorities a clear power. The general authorisation that my hon. Friend the Minister has already undertaken gives the authorities an unfettered power so that no one can breathe over their shoulder other than through the use of the de minimis provision.

Sir Michael Marshall (Arundel): In Committee I raised some of the anxieties of my local authorities—Arundel district council and West Sussex county council. I am glad to confirm that, in the light of what is perceived as progress on the measure, there is a feeling that those anxieties have been overcome.

I applaud my hon. Friend's work in clearing up these matters and tell him that the number of inquiries that the British Association for Central and Eastern Europe has received from local authorities wanting to pursue active schemes under this measure has greatly increased.

Mr. Lester: I am delighted to hear that. I should like to task my hon. Friend with the responsibility, through the Inter-Parliamentary Union, for spreading news of the Bill and making sure that its consequences are widely appreciated and used.

We have no argument with the local authority associations; indeed, we wish to reassure them. I am assured by the parliamentary draftsmen that the local authorities do not need this provision—there is no legal requirement for it—but if the authority associations can prove, as we have asked them to, that they need further reassurance on any particular matter I am sure that we would be prepared to discuss it with them.

Baroness Flather has undertaken to steer the Bill through the House of Lords. I am delighted about that; she is a very able lady. She came to politics from local government and she understands it. I have no doubt that she will as sympathetic to the Bill's intentions in the Lords as we have all tried to be here.

Mr. Eric Pickles (Brentwood and Ongar): We have already discussed some of these concerns in Committee. It would be a great tragedy if the Bill took away powers that local authorities currently enjoy. I hope that my hon. Friend will make it absolutely clear that the power in question is not necessary and that there is no possibility of powers being removed from local authorities.

Mr. Lester: Absolutely. We have a reasonably good audience here today, so perhaps I may describe the power that seems to be causing the difficulty. Under section 137 of the Local Government Act 1972, local authorities already have the power to twin with local authorities anywhere in the world. They also have the power to promote the interests of the inhabitants of their areas, which means that they can send delegations from and to major conurbations. But they do not have the power—and they have never had it—to transfer technology or the tremendous range of technical experience that our local authorities have. The know-how funds exist and many European countries are starting to set up a basic local authority fabric. That is the purpose of the know-how funds and it is widely appreciated.

We discovered that the technical aspect was not covered by law, which is why this Bill has been widely considered since it started out. The Bill enables local authorities in Great Britain to provide assistance in respect of matters in which they have skill and experience to bodies—not necessarily local authorities, but bodies preparing to become them. We are talking about bodies outside the United Kingdom carrying on or attempting to carry on the activities of local government.

Lady Olga Maitland (Sutton and Cheam): Does my hon. Friend agree that although it is essential that local authorities should be encouraged to develop good trading links and know -how links with towns abroard, we should also bear it in mind that that would be no excuse for junketing or abusing their powers?

Mr. Lester: I think that we dealt with that in Committee. No one wants this beneficial power to be misused and, besides, junketing is often no more than a matter of judgment on the part of the editor of the local newspaper. I have made international visits over the years; all of them have benefited those in the places that we visited and those who took part in the trips. In some of the towns in which I am trying to encourage local authorities to get involved, the accommodation is hardly five star. We are talking about pioneering conditions which many of us would like improved. So I can give my hon. Friend the assurance that what she describes is the last thing we want. I am sure that the same goes for local authorities.

This is not a very controversial area, but it may still need to be clarified. I am assured that it does not need legal clarification, but I am sure that the Minister, who has rather better legal advice than I have, will shortly give us his opinion. Meanwhile, I have no doubt that we can make further amicable progress with the Bill.

10.15 am

Mr. Matthew Carrington (Fulham): I do not want to detain the House long discussing a probing amendment which clarifies what is already in the Bill. In as much as it does so, it is welcome. I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Broxtowe (Mr. Lester) for what he said about the interpretation given to him by the parliamentary draftsmen of its effects on the Bill.

I am worried about one aspect of the amendment and I should be grateful if the Minister would deal with it. I regret that I was not on the Standing Committee, but I have followed the Bill's progress carefully. I am worried that the amendment might reverse one of the Bill's principal effects, which is to ensure co-ordination of effort in local authority activities when helping overseas bodies to develop, particularly in eastern Europe. Such co-ordination is vital. If local authorities from this country are to assist nascent democracies in eastern Europe, they should do so as part of a United Kingdom entity. We do not want them to find ways around, or innovative interpretations of, existing statutes which already give them powers. As the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) said, they have done that successfully in other areas in the past. If they found ways of operating outside the scope of this Bill they might be able to undertake activities that would conflict with the assistance being offered by local authorities working in conjunction with this Bill, with the approval of the Secretary of State. That approval is the key. It ensures that, for instance, Lambeth borough council cannot rush off and set up a local government structure in some town in Hungary, modelling it on Lambeth itself, with all the attendant corruption.

Mr. Pickles: Does my hon. Friend accept——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I remind the hon. Gentleman to address me, not his hon. Friend.

Mr. Pickles: I beg your pardon, Madam Deputy Speaker. Does my hon. Friend accept that Lambeth is precisely the model that these new countries want to dispense with?

Mr. Carrington: I am well aware of that and I am grateful to my hon. Friend for pointing it out.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (Colchester, North): A number of local authorities in eastern Europe are well ahead in the development of contracting out and in their philosophy of service to the customer—ahead of Lambeth council, that is. I submit that Lambeth council could learn a lot if the technology transfer were in the other direction.

Mr. Carrington: My hon. Friend makes a strong point which suggests that perhaps we should have a Bill to enable Lambeth to take advice from local authorities in Hungary, although that takes us a long way from the subject of the debate.

Mr. John Bowis (Battersea): The Bill should have a degree of reciprocity, but perhaps for that we would need to seek the leave of the Hungarian Parliament rather than this one. The issues of criteria and monitoring the value of schemes are important because the last thing that we want is duplication by local authorities or by parties on a local authority. It is conceivable that two parties on a local authority would seek to provide schemes and that would not be in anybody's best interests. That is why we need control and monitoring.

Mr. Carrington: My hon. Friend's valid point reinforces my argument. Not many overseas local authorities would think that they had a great deal to learn from Lambeth. The danger is that a sharp-suited salesman, perhaps trained in the old GLC, would rush out to persuade local authorities——

Mr. Tony Banks: I am quite happy to lock on to the debate about such matters, although it will not get us very far. I should be far more suspicious of a sharp-suited man from the PSA in view of the considerable amount of corruption there during the time that the Conservative Government has been responsible for the activities of the PSA. The hon. Gentleman should be cautious about attacking Lambeth borough council because much Government departmental fraud and corruption could bear some critical examination.

Mr. Carrington: The hon. Gentleman is right to criticise people who wear sharp suits. People dressed like that always raise suspicions.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am suspicious about the validity of these arguments in relation to the amendment. Hon. Members must address the amendment.

Mr. Carrington: I am grateful for your direction, Madam Deputy Speaker. My point is not about sharp suits, but about Lambeth persuading local authorities to take actions that are against their better judgment.

Model local authorities are legion and Wandsworth is an especially good example. It could set up in a neighbouring local authority in Hungary an efficient and cost-effective system that would deliver the required services. Because the two authorities were close there would be tremendous conflict. Therefore, the Secretary of State's involvement is vital to ensure that the good model is used overseas and the bad model is not. The amendment may allow a council such as Lambeth to act in contravention of Government policy and best local government practice. Perhaps the Minister could reassure me about that.

Mr. Pickles: Hon. Members will note from my size that it is some years since I was able to fit into a sharp suit. I apologise to the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) for missing the early part of his speech, but I had the opportunity to listen to the debate in Committee. I have received assurances that the measure will not restrict the powers of local authorities.

Many taxpayers and ratepayers feel that this is not the sort of activity in which local authorities should engage. Councils are under financial restraint and it is a brave councillor who announces that his authority is about to embark on such work. Government blessing for many of the schemes is needed to legitimise them and to demonstrate that they are in the interests not only of local residents, but of the wider community. I hope to speak later in the debate about how the schemes could be extended to help local firms and communities.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley): Does my hon. Friend think that it would be useful to have the ever-vigilant eye of local residents watching what is being done and how money is being spent? Every penny spent abroad to assist developing countries should be spent as carefully as money spent at home.

Mr. Pickles: That is important. Many local people will have experience of the countries that the legislation will affect, but most will not. However, even that experience may not enable them to make value judgments on schemes. Local people should be given judgment criteria and the Bill suggests that that should be provided by the Secretary of State. The Bill does not give the Secretary of State the power to say what must be done, as some local authorities suggest. Councils may engage in certain activities, provided the residents and the councils think that they are good. It is an enabling power, rather than one that forces councillors to follow a specific course.

Mr. Lester: I would not want anyone to get the wrong idea. The Bill will give authorities power to act as agents for the spending of money that is not provided by charge payers. That is one of the key measures in the Bill. Local authorities have a tremendous range of experience, but it would be wrong for charge payers to fund overseas schemes. Money will be provided from the know-how funds, the Overseas Development Administration, and European and United Nations funds, but local authorities are able to provide the best technical assistance. There is a de minimis provision, but it is so small that it would not affect any charge payer's bill.

Local authorities are being granted an important freedom to look at projects before they make a bid for money from the know-how funds. The legislation is not designed to give charge payers or council taxpayers a shock by saying that local authorities will suddenly take on the work of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office.

Mr. Pickles: Of course, my hon. Friend is correct. I am sure that he readily accepts that, while local authorities will be the agents for funds that will come mainly from the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, there will be some cost to local authorities. The Bill is about stopping——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. We are not discussing the Bill as a whole: we are discussing an amendment.

Mr. Pickles: I apologise. I was about to speak specifically to the amendment which relates to the powers of the Secretary of State.

Mr. Jenkin: The concern to which the amendment, in conjunction with the rest of the Bill, gives rise is whether we are in danger of allowing local authorities to undertake activities of a quasi-commercial nature, which the officers or the councillors might purport to be breaking even or even making a profit for the local authority, but which might subsequently result in substantial liabilities for the authority, which would be taken up by the charge payers.

Without wishing to antagonise the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks), I have to say that we all know local authorities that undertake ambitious schemes that subsequently do not match the financial expectations. Do the Bill and the amendment provide safeguards against incompetence or failure adequately to assess the situation of a potential project?

10.30 am

Mr. Pickles: The assessment comes in partnership between the Government and local authorities, and recognises the needs of the countries that it is designed to help. In other sectors, local authorities may wish to use existing powers in conjunction with new powers and we need to be certain that those powers are not restricted. The intention is to clarify the law and ensure that local authorities have confidence, but, in doing so, we should not take powers away. That is the central point.

My hon. Friend the Member for Colchester, North (Mr. Jenkin) may think that the Bill will suddenly open the floodgates and that councils of various political persuasions will be trading throughout the world, but the simple answer is that that will not happen.

Mr. Nigel Evans: Does my hon. Friend agree that one of the greatest fears of many residents—I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Broxtowe (Mr. Lester) for clarifying the point that the money will be Government money and that councils will be acting as agents—will be about what the local authority is doing spending the time of its officers and councillors on assisting other countries when there are problems in their council area? People will feel that councils should be devoting all their time and energy to clearing up the local problems, rather than messing around abroad. The very fact that projects will go to the Government for approval will enable the assistance to be given. Without the approval of the Secretary of State, the assistance might not be given because local authorities would be afraid to get involved.

Mr. Pickles: I am grateful. My hon. Friend has made a number of useful contributions to the debate on the amendment. He has aired the concerns that many members of the public will have. The debate will assure them that that is not the intention of the Bill. It will enable work to be done in partnership. I look forward to my hon. Friend's contribution later in our proceedings when we can underline many of the points that he has made so well.

Mr. Bowis: If we are speaking in terms of sharp suits, perhaps I can refer to the elegant curves of my hon. Friend the Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. Pickles). The debate is following the good lines set out by the debates in our useful Committee stage. With the amendment, the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) has allowed us to debate again a point that we debated in Committee, to see whether it can be clarified further.

We are talking about the balance that we need to strike between the enterprise, initiative and enthusiasm of local authorities that are willing to give their expertise to parts of the world that need it and the need for the control and sensible use of resources, which is where the Secretary of State comes in.

The Bill has that balance right, as my hon. Friend the Member for Broxtowe (Mr. Lester) confirmed in his intervention. It is important that we get that balance right, because nobody wishes to restrict local authorities to such an extent that they say, "We cannot be bothered if they are not interested in what we have to offer. We wanted to offer this, but they say no, so we shall give up and go to somebody else." Equally, we must take account of the total of resources and the way in which they can and should be used.

Lady Olga Maitland: Does my hon. Friend agree that a local authority, by offering technical know-how and assistance, may gain enormous benefit for its locality by opening up trading links, and that trading links with newly developed eastern European countries can be of enormous benefit to the local businesses of that borough?

Mr. Bowis: My hon. Friend is right. I am not sure of the extent to which the Bill will advance trading links, except that the more that local authorities have links abroad under the auspices of the Bill, the more likely it is that when they go abroad with their expertise, they may be accompanied by local business men. That would be an offshoot, but it cannot be written into the Bill.

Mr. Carrington: I did not wish to intervene again in the debate on the amendment, but I must make it clear that the point is that, as my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam (Lady Olga Maitland) has made clear, if a local authority is giving assistance, through whatever way, to some other local authority, it will lead to trading links, if only because that other local authority will look to this country for support services, computer services, software services and others. There will be true economic benefits, as well as the principal purpose of the Bill, which is to spend aid money.

Mr. Bowis: That is correct. The benefit may flow back to the specific locality that has been giving assistance or to the country in general.

I am conscious that Madam Deputy Speaker would prefer us to stick closely to the amendment. The key is the role of the Secretary of State and of monitoring and the need to avoid the problem of duplication, along the lines mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Fulham (Mr. Carrington). We must also ensure sensible prioritising. Many councils, such as Wandsworth, may have good schemes and experience to offer, but the priority in terms of national spending and national advice may require that one or two of those be selected for this as opposed to subsequent years, and that, again, is where the Secretary of State comes into the reckoning.

My hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam (Lady Olga Maitland) gently prodded the question of what she called junketing and what we in Committee called jollies. We looked for guidance to the hon. Member for Newham, North-West. He has great knowledge and experience, which he shared with us. He could take us round the world in a silver car, with the chairman in the boot—or was it the other way round?—no doubt from county hall, or to the Nicaraguan airlines office. I say this with great benevolence.

Mr. Tony Banks: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Bowis: I had a feeling that I might have to give way to the hon. Gentleman on that point.

Mr. Banks: For the sake of the record, I should inform the hon. Gentleman that I was the only chairman of the Greater London council who never made a visit abroad. It was not so much that I did not want to do so but that I felt that, as the GLC was threatened with abolition, if I went abroad something nasty would happen to it in my absence.

The House is perhaps not the best place to discuss trips abroad. We have not many lessons to teach people in terms of abstinence. As my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) would no doubt have said about House of Commons visits abroad, if he had been here in his usual place, "They never go fact finding to Greenland in the middle of winter".

Mr. Bowis: I am sure that we shall be visiting Greenland next. I was not criticising the hon. Gentleman. Had it had the opportunity at the time, I would have recommended that the entire GLC was sent off to a remote desert island where it could give advice to the local monkeys. London would then have been a happier place sooner than it eventually became one. Let me leave that subject on the happy note of unanimity across the Floor of the House.

My hon. Friends the Members for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) and for Brentwood and Ongar spoke about local opinion. We want to ensure, of course, that local opinion supports the various measures that are undertaken. The main funding will be recouped from national and international sources, but there will be some on-costs. If, for example, a council officer is seconded to carry out work in another country, some sacrifice will be made by the local community. It is important that the local community gives its full support to such work or there could be resentment.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Broxtowe said, we want to ensure that we avoid the flavour-of-the-month mentality. I am sure that at the moment any project involving Bosnia or Somalia would have the wholehearted support of a council, while similar projects for Cambodia or Bulgaria would not. On the other hand, perhaps we should be sending people to those countries. By the time that Bosnia is in a position to accept help, it may not be headline material and another sad part of what was Yugoslavia may have come to the fore.

I support the amendment.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Robin Squire): It has been said that the powers that local authorities already have to provide assistance overseas may be endangered by the Bill. Indeed, it has been suggested that such powers make the Bill unnecessary. For reasons that I shall explain, the Government believe that authorities do not have such powers. As my hon. Friend the Member for Broxtowe (Mr. Lester) would be saying fortissimo, that is precisely why the Bill is before the House. There is no reason why authorities that are already undertaking activities for which they believed they had powers—that is, prior to the passage of the Bill—will be prevented from continuing them when the Bill takes its place on the statute book. The Bill will give them formal, legal powers.

The amendment, which was moved by the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks), is designed to introduce a without-prejudice clause. The argument for it is that, by providing a specific power to give overseas technical assistance, the Bill will remove local authorities' existing ability to undertake such work on the basis of discretionary powers, such as section 137 of the Local Government Act 1972, or of other specific powers such as the power under section 33 of the Local Government and Housing Act 1989 in respect of the promotion of economic development.

That is one concern to local authority associations that was not discussed in detail in Committee. The reason for that is that while stressing that the Government remained unconvinced of the need for such a clause, I agreed to review the matter if the local authority associations gave us further information. The hon. Member for Newham, North-West then properly withdrew his amendment.

My officials met officials from the associations, both immediately after the Bill's consideration in Committee and earlier this week, and the associations will let us have the necessary further information in time for the Bill's consideration in Committee in another place.

I shall restate my undertaking. I shall review the case for a without-prejudice clause seriously as soon as the associations are able to produce the further information that they have promised. In the meantime, it may be helpful if I set out as clearly as possible why, on the basis of the information that is to hand, I am opposed to a without-prejudice clause.

Section 137 of the 1972 Act permits an authority to incur expenditure which in its opinion is in the interests of, and will bring direct benefit to, its area or any part of it, or to all or some of its inhabitants. However, that power is limited. First, an authority may not rely on the section for a purpose on which it is authorised to incur expenditure by any other power, whether the power is conditional or unconditional. Secondly, and perhaps most importantly, the direct benefit to the authority's area, or any part of it, or to all or some of its inhabitants must be commensurate with the expenditure incurred under section 137. I do not see how incurring expenditure in providing advice and assistance to overseas bodies can be of any direct benefit to the inhabitants of an authority's area, let alone a benefit that is commensurate with the amount spent.

Section 33 of the 1989 Act gives authorities the power to take such steps as they consider appropriate for promoting the economic development of their areas.

Mr. Tony Banks: The Minister is taking up the point that was made by the hon. Member for Fulham (Mr. Carrington). It is a matter that could lead to a legal argument. If, for example, information or assistance had been provided under section 137 and there was a spin-off in terms of contracts coming back into the area of the local authority that had provided that information or assistance, it could be argued that there was a direct benefit to the people living in the area controlled by the authority. Section 137 gives an open power to local authorities, and it would always be possible to find a lawyer to argue that there was direct benefit to the local authority as a result of assistance given to an overseas authority.

Mr. Squire: The hon. Gentleman highlights why we need the Bill, which clarifies and spells out the relevant powers of local authorities. We are discussing a narrow but important point and I reiterate my willingness to listen to the massed ranks of lawyers, if such a body can be imagined, as they advise me whether a without-prejudice clause is necessary.

Mr. John Whittingdale (Colchester, South and Maldon): Does my hon. Friend agree that section 137 has been used by socialist local authorities to divert ratepayers' funds to help a wide variety of extremist, lunatic fringe groups? It is perhaps not surprising that there is a degree of suspicion on the part of the ratepayer whenever the section is mentioned. One of the benefits that will stem from the Bill is the recognition that the involvement of local authorities in overseas assistance is entirely legitimate and welcomed by the Government.

Mr. Squire: My hon. Friend makes a valid point. Were we to develop it, we would take ourselves back over much of the history of the past 15 years or so. Fortunately, all the signs are that local authorities in general are much more responsive now than they were during the time to which my hon. Friend directly and properly referred. He is right, however, to suggest that there is a balance to be struck. In recognition of that, the Bill introduces some restraints and restrictions so that council tax payers, as they will be in a week's time, will have the knowledge that they will be properly protected.

Mr. Jenkin: The hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) made an interesting intervention. He highlighted the possibility that local authorities might seek a contractual relationship with local authorities in eastern Europe to provide services, or to manage services, in the areas covered by those authorities. My concern is that there are not sufficient checks and balances to ensure that such work is undertaken on a commercial basis. Would that work, under the Bill, be acceptable trade in which a local authority might engage?

Mr. Squire: Most of the activity that is covered by the Bill would be funded, in effect, by one or more know-how funds; in other words, the Bill does not provide funding. Where that is not the position, upper limits are spelt out that apply to the moneys that a local authority will be able to incur over and above the sum that is being funded by one or other of the know-how funds.

I was referring to section 33 of the 1989 Act. There are various restrictions on the power contained in that Act and the regulations made under it.

Mr. Jenkin: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Squire: Yes, but I want to make progress.

Mr. Jenkin: I apologise to my hon. Friend; I am grateful to him for giving way again. We all know of occasions when it emerges that local authorities have taken part in what has subsequently been regarded as unlawful trade. I thought that that was the point raised by the hon. Member for Newham, North-West. I am still not clear whether the Bill interferes with the rights of, or restrictions on, local authorities. Does it change the nature of the rules that might allow local authorities effectively to trade with counterparts in eastern Europe? Will my hon. Friend comment on that?

Mr. Squire: The Bill would state in law what was previously believed to be the law, under which a number of local authorities were carrying out activities—until one of the flotilla of lawyers, to which the hon. Member for Newham, North-West referred, drew attention to the error. The important point is that to the extent that local authorities are involved overseas, the Bill makes it clear that it must be in areas in which those authorities have expertise. They must genuinely be able to demonstrate that they have that expertise within their own ranks. I think that that is probably the best assurance on restraint that I can offer my hon. Friend.

I find it impossible to imagine how the power under the 1989 Act, which permits an authority to take steps to assist in the setting up of a commercial undertaking in the authority's area, and the creating of opportunities for employment in that area, can be said to give an authority power to provide an overseas body with advice and assistance. Surely the point of the Bill is that there is a serious doubt about the legitimacy of using the existing power for overseas technical work. The Audit Commission has taken the view that there are no existing powers for technical assistance—otherwise, as I said to my hon. Friend the Member for Colchester, North (Mr. Jenkin), there would be no need for the Bill. It is difficult to envisage the purpose of a without-prejudice clause relating to certain powers, when there are substantial grounds for doubt that those powers exist.

However, to meet the concern of the local authority associations that small-scale technical assistance work arising out of, and incidental to, other links with overseas communities—such as the traditional town twinning with which hon. Members will be well acquainted—should not require consent under the Bill, my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State proposes to give a general authorisation for such work below an approved threshold, which is twice such expenditure in the previous financial year or that planned for the current year.

I will deal briefly and succinctly with the points made during the debate. The hon. Member for Newham, North-West cannot tempt me down the road of discussing the Property Services Agency this morning. I urge him to await the outcome of the current inquiries and not to believe everything that he reads in The Guardian—indeed, particularly everything that he reads in The Guardian.

The hon. Gentleman asked me two questions. The first related to what would happen to the existing powers under section 137 when the Bill is enacted. The short answer is nothing; they will continue. As I have made clear, existing powers under that section cover technical advice and assistance.

The second and important question was about what happens to work already under way as a result of a local authority's interpretation of section 137. Again, the answer is nothing. That work is currently taking place in the absence of clear powers, but my right hon. and learned Friend is ready to offer sanction for such work during the passage of the Bill, should that prove necessary. Once the Bill is enacted, work already under way will continue under the Bill's provisions. The hon. Gentleman and some of my hon. Friends rightly raised the legitimate concern that existing work might be threatened, but I am happy to assure them that that is not the case.

My hon. Friend the Member for Fulham (Mr. Carrington), without necessarily knowing it, hit the bullseye when he spoke about Hungary. You know, Madam Deputy Speaker, that any reference to persons outside this Chamber would be out of order, so I certainly would not make one. However, hon. Members may be interested to know that among those advising me this morning, and not located many miles away, is a visitor from Hungary. He has been following our activities as part and parcel of the Department's work with Hungary and other countries. I am certain that he would have been fascinated to hear our comments this morning. I am also certain that he would conclude, as did my hon. Friend, that although Hungary has little, if anything, to learn from Lambeth, Lambeth may have a significant amount to learn from Hungary.

Mr. Tony Banks: Send in the tanks.

Mr. Squire: It would be tasteless to take up the hon. Gentleman's comment.

My hon. Friend the Member for Fulham, echoed by my curved hon. Friends the Members for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. Pickles) and for Battersea (Mr. Bowis)—but who am I to speak?—spoke of the importance of striking a balance between a reasonable check on the activities of local authorities and not snuffing out the good, creative ways in which local authorities are already assisting so many other countries, especially in central and eastern Europe. I assure my hon. Friend that it is not our intention to do the latter and nothing within the Bill would do that. On the contrary, I hope that the Bill will bring the opportunities and advantages available to the attention of those local authorities that are not yet involved in this important work.

A without-prejudice clause is unnecessary, would achieve nothing, and would reintroduce an element of confusion into an area that the Bill would sort out and clarify once and for all. In the light of my undertaking to consider the matter further, I hope that the hon. Member for Newham, North-West will withdraw his amendment.

Mr. Tony Banks: I am very much encouraged by the Minister's response. Both he and the hon. Member for Broxtowe (Mr. Lester) said that the amendment was unnecessary. There are still matters that need to be resolved, but from what the Minister said I understand that the local authority associations will continue to talk to him about them. It is for those associations to demonstrate that a without-prejudice clause is required. I feel confident that if they can do that to the Minister's satisfaction, the necessary amendments will be introduced in another place.

The Bill has all-party support. All those involved in it understand that there is no intention to limit the ability of local authorities or to make the position more difficult for them, but, on the contrary, to facilitate what has been happening and to encourage further developments. I take what the Minister said as an encouraging sign that if there is an omission from the Bill that would frustrate the activities to which we have been referring, he will rectify that.

I am still a little concerned about the questions surrounding section 137 of the 1989 Act, which was, perhaps, passed in happier times. It is a broad section which gives very wide powers. The Minister did not mention section 142 of that Act, which relates to the provision of information. That is also widely interpreted by local authorities, as it was meant to be, and it can be used for the provision of information overseas. The hon. Member for Fulham (Mr. Carrington) said that such activities should be generally co-ordinated. The hon. Gentleman can afford to be elegantly dressed. While he was speaking, I took the precaution of checking the Register of Members' Interests, and can understand how he can afford to shop at the best tailors in Savile row, and no doubt he does.

Much needs to be done in terms of co-ordination, and no doubt the Secretary of State will be able to do it. One must commend many local authorities of all political persuasions—I am not as biased as some Conservative Members—for their pioneering work, and the Bill acknowledges that and encourages and facilitates that process.

I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman used the amendment to make a ritual attack on Lambeth. I well understand why he might be suspicious of sharp-suited sales persons. Knowing that he is an adviser to the Saudi International bank, I well understand his concern, given the amount of corruption and palm-greasing that goes on in the area in which he no doubt gives a great deal of advice in the middle east. If the hon. Gentleman is suspicious of a sharp-suited sales person, perhaps he would not be quite so suspicious of a sharp jellaba-dressed gentleman wearing a gold Rolex on his wrist.

The hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Bowis) mentioned the Greater London council, which is appropriate because we are just approaching the week in which, on 31 March, we will mark the seventh anniversary of its abolition—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] That was an entirely predictable response from the Conservative Benches and would not be the response elicited from the great majority of Londoners. I am far more concerned about them than ideologically fixated Conservative Members.

Mr. Robin Squire: As that is such an illustrious anniversary, and in response to the hon. Gentleman's point, in at least the past four or five of the seven years since the GLC's abolition, I have not—as a London Member of Parliament—received one letter from anyone asking me to recreate that monstrosity.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Before the debate continues, I point out that it is not appropriate to hold either a celebration or a wake.

Mr. Banks: I agree, Madam Deputy Speaker, and it would be pointless writing to the Minister on that particular subject.

Mr. Carrington: I do not want to pursue the abolition of the GLC, but it does raise the interesting point of whether the hon. Gentleman considers that it would be appropriate for the Inner London education authority to give advice under the terms of the amendment and clause. One effect of abolishing the ILEA is universal agreement across all parties that the ILEA's education provision was wasteful and poor, and did not achieve good standards. However bad some boroughs are, the education that they provide now is better—even in the worst of them—than that provided by the ILEA.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. That point is entirely irrelevant. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not pursue it and that the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) will not respond.

Mr. Banks: It is unfortunate, Madam Deputy Speaker that your stricture was not applied a little earlier before the hon. Gentleman completed his intervention. It would, of course, be impossible for a now-defunct body to give advice to anyone. As someone who received his education under the Inner London education authority, I thought that it was a wonderful authority. Were the ILEA to be extant, it would give excellent advice.

A strategic authority such as the Greater London council could have given tremendous advice in eastern Europe.

Mr. Jenkin indicated dissent.

Mr. Banks: The hon. Gentleman shows his ignorance of not only the Greater London council but good tailoring.

In the case of emergency services—such as the London fire brigade—that were the responsibility of the GLC, tremendous information was given to overseas authorities. As to waste disposal——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I am also not inclined to permit a trip down memory lane.

Mr. Banks: You old spoil-sport, Madam Deputy Speaker—I said that affectionately, rather than with any reference to chronological order.

London does not have a strategic authority now, but when we have a Labour Government one day soon, one will be established. I was not so much taking a walk down memory lane as pointing out that a strategic authority for London could give advice in many areas. The powers that I mentioned with regard to emergency services have passed to the London fire and civil defence authority, which gives advice overseas and has sent teams to disaster areas to apply the techniques learned under the London county council, the GLC and the LFCDA. That is precisely the kind of advice and assistance embraced by the Bill.

The waste disposal authority that took over from the GLC can give information and pass on some of the high technology devised in London to cope with waste disposal from such a large conurbation. Such information would be invaluable and would no doubt be welcomed by authorities in eastern Europe, for example.

Mr. Lester: Waste disposal authorities are covered in the Bill.

Mr. Banks: I mentioned them for the benefit of those who did not have the pleasure of sitting on the Committee with the hon. Gentleman. I hope that I am passing on a little light, but not a great deal of heat. In eastern Europe, standards of waste disposal have been appalling in countries such as Albania and Romania. A London authority could teach them a great deal.

Mr. Bowis: It goes wider than that, because international agreements would be needed to solve some of those problems. The hon. Gentleman set up various arguments and then knocked them down himself. Strategic authorities that have a purpose, such as the LFCDA and the authority that brings together waste disposal in various boroughs, are covered by the Bill and can give advice. The hon. Gentleman has demolished his own argument for the need for other strategic authorities, which would be merely wasteful monstrosities and a burden on taxpayers.

Mr. Banks: That does not necessarily follow from the hon. Gentleman's remarks. I referred to a number of bodies that are engaged in such activities. The hon. Gentleman will remember that they were all grouped under one body when the GLC existed. His argument does not bear logical examination.

Mr. Jenkin: As to waste disposal, some large private sector companies in this country and throughout the European community are extremely good at providing advice. The Bill needs to guard against excessive crowding out of private sector activity by the excessive ambitions of the public sector as embodied by local authorities. The best lesson that eastern Europe can learn from the abolition of the GLC is that it should rid itself of unnecessary tiers of government.

Mr. Banks: I hope that that will not be a lesson that they draw from the abolition of the GLC. I hope that they will draw the lesson that if a country has a constitution, it will not be possible for someone to walk in and abolish a directly elected and democratic body, merely because the Government of the day, particularly the Prime Minister of the day, does not happen to like it. That seems to me to smack more of the Stalinism and totalitarianism from which they have just escaped. If she could be dug up, I suppose that the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam (Lady Olga Maitland) would probably go over and give advice to some of the beleaguered democracies in eastern Europe and tell them how to restore Stalinism. They might like it.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is, so to speak, taking off again. Can I bring him back to the amendment?

Mr. Banks: I could not resist the temptation, Madam Deputy Speaker. I blame the hon. Member for Colchester, North (Mr. Jenkin) entirely for provoking me. I can resist everything except temptation.

When the GLC was in being, it worked in concert with the private sector over waste disposal. Correy, the waste disposal company, worked closely with the GLC. One saw its barges going up and down the Thames. The hon. Member for Colchester, North needs to understand a little more of the history of that period of abolition that preoccupied the House for such a long time.

I tabled all these amendments at the request of the local authority associations. The Minister has assured us today that the discussions with the local authority associations will continue and that in the event of their being able to demonstrate beyond peradventure that there is a difficulty, he will introduce the necessary amendments in another place. I am delighted to hear that Lady Flather is to be responsible for taking the Bill through the other place. She has great sensitivity when it comes to both overseas development and local authorities. As I am happy with the Minister's assurances, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. Tony Banks: I beg to move amendment No. 7, in page 2, line 5, leave out 'or'.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 8, in page 2, line 8, at end insert

'or,

(c) a parish, town or community council within the area of any local authority as specified in this section.'.

Mr. Banks: These amendments test the intention of the Bill to limit its scope to local authorities and the bodies derived from them, as set out in clause 1(7) and (8). Parish, town or community councils are currently excluded from the Bill.

Under the know-how fund technical link scheme, however, proposals have already been received from several parishes. These include Castleton parish council in Derbyshire, in concert with the Peak District national park. Their prospective partners are Skala and Ojcow national parks, both of which are in south Poland. Dulverton parish council in Somerset, in conjunction with the Exmoor national park, have prospective partners in Poland and the Czech Republic. Everyone can immediately see why both Poland and the Czech Republic should be involved with parish councils; they lie in the area of national parks. Interest has been shown by other parish councils—in the Grampian region, Kent, Lancashire and South Yorkshire.

11.15 am

From this recent display of interest, it will be clear that parish councils are anxious in many cases to offer overseas assistance. By definition, parish councils are very small. Even the largest employs only a few members of staff. What they lack in staff expertise, however, is more than compensated for in enthusiasm and a direct involvement in the community.

In line with the general desire to devolve powers and to involve people down to the lowest level—subsidiarity being the term with which we are most familiar in this place—it is a little puzzling that the sponsor of the Bill and the Minister have not so far shown any great interest in extending the scope of the Bill in that direction. The active involvement of local communities, probably drawing directly on the enthusiasm and expertise of parish councillors and the community, is to be welcomed.

It would help if the hon. Member for Broxtowe and the Minister were to agree to consider further this question, in the light of the interest from parishes in the Government's scheme. We have heard about the upsurge of interest. Areas of involvement in which parishes have expertise have been indentified. Therefore, I hope that the Minister will give favourable consideration to the amendments.

Mr. Lester: The request for inclusion of this amendment in the Bill is similar to the previous one. I have nothing against parish, town or community councils. My overall view, however, as someone with previous experience of local government, is that it is hard to see how a parish council could employ technical staff and therefore be able to offer technical assistance overseas.

The illustrations given by the hon. Member for Newham, North-West are borne out by my research. Quite by accident I came across such a scheme. Marlborough town council has linked up with Gunjar in the Gambia. I would add, by the way, that Marlborough is a small and attractive town. The town council plays only a part in that role. However, it takes over to Gunjar a team of people, all volunteers, who add classrooms to schools and do all sorts of worthwhile work in the Gambia.

Marlborough has assisted in the most positive way that I can describe. A young man from that community wrote to me. I did not know him from Adam. He said that he would like to come to this country to study hotel and catering skills and asked whether I could help him. I wrote to a college in London that specialises in teaching those skills. Much to my amazement and gratitude, the principal of that college wrote back to me and said that, as I had asked, he was prepared to give this young man a scholarship. I was very grateful to him.

The problem then arose of what to do next. I had neither the resources nor the facilities to house that young man in London while he pursued his scholarship. He then informed me that there was the Marlborough link scheme. Very generously, it took on the cost of maintaining him in this country. It also assisted him by providing him with work experience in a local hotel in Marlborough. He has returned to his country with a sheaf of qualifications and recommendations. He is a very enterprising young man. I hope that those qualifications and recommendations will lead to his being quickly ensconced as the manager of one of the new hotels that are being built in the Gambia and providing services in that hotel of a quality that will encourage many people and, I hope, many of my hon. Friends, to go there for a holiday. In that way we shall assist in developing a very small country, but one which is important to us.

I use that example to show that town councils can be part of something that is worth while. I do not believe, however, that they need the powers of the Bill to do what they have already achieved through the link scheme. It may be, however, that in future they will need that power. I have no particular reason for excluding authorities of that size from the provisions of the Bill, if their exclusion is seen in any way to be to their disadvantage. Nevertheless, the local authority associations will need to make more of a case, in terms of the Bill, to bring about that type of beneficial interchange and exchange.

I am conscious of the fact that town councils can be fairly large bodies. One town council, Brackley, serves a population of 59,000 people. If we compare that with anything in the third and the developing world, we see that it is a substantial authority. Therefore, I do not wish to prevent any local authority with the necessary capability from participating, by means of the Bill, in the interchange that we are trying to promote.

I hope that those remarks will reassure the hon. Gentleman that in no sense are we negative. In every sense we are positive. We are trying to obtain the maximum that we possibly can from the Bill in order to promote these various interests.

Mr. Carrington: It worries me when I find myself in some measure of agreement with the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks). We differ on most matters, including matters sartorial. However, he has an extremely valid point on this amendment in that I cannot see a reason for excluding town councils from the legislation.

I understand that there may be a few instances where a parish council would be able to give advice or, indeed, would be advised to give advice—if that is not too convoluted a phrase. I can see circumstances where it may be possible that such advice would be sensible and where we would not wish to exclude a body, however small, from the ability to make use of the legislation or be able, under the auspices of the Secretary of State, to come in as part of a complete restructuring advice package that is being given to an area of some foreign country. One can imagine a situation where a whole structure of local government might be set up with advice from an equivalent local government structure in the United Kingdom. In such cases, one would not wish to exclude the bottom tiers of councils from being able to participate in that. I understand the concern that too small a council might have to use a disproportionate amount of its resources to be able to give advice. With few officers or, in some cases, no officers at all, such councils may take on things which are impossible for them to deliver in the final analysis. At the beginning, they may go in with enthusiasm, determination and good ideas, but then time passes, the project slows down and things become more difficult. Finally, the Secretary of State may have to bail out the parish council which is giving the advice and that may cause an enormous problem. The Bill contains sufficient safeguards to ensure that that will not happen.

If a parish council takes on something that is patently too large for it to be able to undertake, that is too complex or, indeed, that is not done in partnership with a larger authority that would give support, the Secretary of State will have the power to refuse permission for the council to get involved. Therefore, the purpose of the amendments must be welcomed.

The Bill may already include parish councils; I am not clear on that. If that is the case, the amendments are unnecessary, and that is also welcomed. We need to clarify the exact position of small councils because the advice that they can give could be worth while for the development of countries, especially those in eastern Europe.

Sir Michael Marshall: I support my hon. Friend's argument. When we were discussing this matter in Committee, I got the impression that it was difficult to foresee circumstances in which parish or town councils might come forward. Recently, Bognor Regis town council in my constituency carried out an exercise—this is an interesting example for my hon. Friends and Labour Members—using automatic vote-counting machinery for a local referendum. Under present legislation, such automatic vote-counting machinery cannot be used in the United Kingdom for the normal processes with which we are all familiar. At that level, it is possible to experiment.

In this specific case, the manufacturer of the equipment provided it as a trial. Observers came from different parts of the world, including the different part of the world called the Home Office. It was an extremely interesting example of something to which, I suspect, we shall have to bend our minds before too long—whether we should be using automatic vote-counting machinery. It could have been used in this case to give know-how to visitors.

We have been talking about taking know-how outwards. With such experiments, it is possible to give some practical experience which would be of value to the sort of countries that we have in mind under the terms of the Bill. In view of what has been said about the Bill, I am not sure whether we need to carry the amendment. Certainly, it raises a proposition that is worthy of consideration. Perhaps it might be re-examined in another place, if not here.

Mr. Robin Squire: As the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) said, the purpose of amendments Nos. 7 and 8 is to extend the provisions of the Bill to allow parish, town or community councils to provide advice and assistance to overseas bodies with regard to any matter in which they have skill and experience. At present, the Bill does not give them that authority.

[Mr. Robin Squire]

The Government are entirely open to argument on this point. It has been said that, throughout the discussions and the passage of the measure, we have been at pains to take into account the views of the local authority associations on all aspects of the Bill and accommodate their wishes, if at all possible. When officials and my hon. Friend the Member for Broxtowe (Mr. Lester) met the associations on a number of occasions before Christmas, the question of including parish, town and community councils was raised by the associations, but was not pressed hard. My hon. Friend told the local government side that parish councils do not employ technical officers and the local government side did not pursue the matter further at the time.

On that basis, my hon. Friend and I concluded that it seemed unlikely that parish, town and community councils had much to contribute to the provision of technical assistance abroad, not least because many of them are small with limited resources. I should add, slightly tongue in cheek, that it may seem a little odd that associations should now wish to have parish powers extended in that direction when they have resisted extensions of parish powers a little closer to home than the subject of the Bill.

My serious and unqualified commitment is that if the associations can demonstrate that some parish, town and community councils have the ability to provide technical assistance to overseas bodies, I will certainly reconsider the matter. Of course, I should need to consult separately my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Scotland and for Wales. My commitment has been conveyed by my officials to the associations. I understand that the associations have undertaken to provide further information to enable the matter to be reconsidered before the Committe in another place. On that clear undertaking, I hope that the hon. Member for Newham, North-West will feel able to withdraw amendments Nos. 7 and 8.

Mr. Tony Banks: How I have yearned to hear a Minister come to the Dispatch Box, say that the Government are entirely open to argument and, on this occasion, mean it. It is a step forward for civilised behaviour and good government.

I welcome the Minister's assurances. The hon. Member for Broxtowe (Mr. Lester) demonstrated that there are examples of activities in the local authority structure which the Bill is beginning to highlight and we are gathering more information all the time. The hon. Gentleman referred to Marlborough, which, as a town council, is its own parish council. Effectively, it is a parish council with a mayor. The need to extend the Bill is clearly demonstrated. The hon. Member for Arundel (Sir M. Marshall) gave a further example. As the knowledge of the Bill permeates through the local government structure, I suspect that hon. Members on both sides of the House will be able to discover more examples tucked away in their own areas.

If one looks at the Bill, one will find that parish, town and community councils are excluded. It is good to know that the Minister is prepared to listen to arguments. I suspect that the arguments will come from his own side as well as from the local authority associations. The hon. Member for Fulham (Mr. Carrington), whose support I greatly welcomed, referred to our shared lack of sartorial tastes. That is because I have the taste but not the money and he enjoys the opposite condition.

Parish councils will be undertaking ventures in co-operation with other authorities. I gave examples of parish councils which were involved with national parks. Clearly, parish councils, by definition, do not have the resources to enable them to spare staff, as it were. However, a great deal of expertise has been built up in rural areas. It would be a shame not to allow it to be passed on to areas of the world where it is obviously very much needed.

I accept what the Minister said. It is good to know that on this occasion the Government are working with an open mind and are prepared to listen. Under those terms, and with the assurances that he has given me, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendments.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Order for Third Reading read.

11.29 am

Mr. Lester: I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

When I made my peroration on Second Reading, I suggested that by passing the Bill, the House would light one thousand candles in various parts of the world in which light could be cast on local communities by their linking with such communities in this country. During the Committee stage and since, I became convinced that that was an accurate analogy. Those of us who seek to encourage the forces of light rather than the forces of darkness will see that the Bill is perhaps one small way in which we can help to develop that concept.

Colleagues have mentioned local opinion. I should have thought that in any locality, opinion would be in favour of a more integrated and closer world, and the sharing of information and assistance in a way that narrowed the gap between those of us who live in privileged societies in the privileged world and the rest.

All my parliamentary and personal experience has convinced me that one of the truths of life is that the maximum human contact that is designed through good will to assist is essential to move things forward to counter the negative processes which are all too apparent to us in different parts of the world. Ethnic cleansing, the breaking of contact, the manufacture of nationalistic feelings of which we have many experiences in history, and the encouragement of hate, disgust and those forces that I am sure that no one in the House remotely encourages, are all too obvious.

Therefore, it is important that legislation such as my Bill, which seeks to encourage the best of our standards in a particular walk of life, are used to maximum effect. Some of us have come through local government to the House and, therefore, have a particular affection for it. We recognise that local government is the sinews of our democracy and that, unless we have the bricks with which to build democratic values and a democratic society, we cannot impose one from the top.

Equally, local government is highly relevant to our daily lives. For many people in many parts of the world, what is achieved in their locality is infinitely more important than what might be done in their national parliament or any international body. I have given one example of that today. It is important to one community of 20,000 people in the Gambia.

I am a member of the Foreign Affairs Select Committee. Currently we are examining Boutros Boutros

Ghali's document "Agenda for Peace", which sets the big scene for the world and the way in which it will develop into the next century. As part of that, I recently visited Cambodia—a tragic country which I know well. I have tried in many ways in the House to influence Government policy to help Cambodia's people to emerge from a dark passage of their history.

In a short time, there will be elections in Cambodia. It is essential that we assist the people with technology, which the United Nations has already done. Cambodia is turning to local authorities, including in Britain, for people to go out to Cambodia and man the election booths and electoral offices. Cambodia wants to convince its people that the election involves a secret ballot—something of which they have no experience—and that it will be run to the highest standards so that they can accept the result. That is important.

Cambodia is turning to us to send 50 people from all our local authorities who are prepared to join 950 people from other parts of the world to ensure that the election is run properly. The election could be crucial. We could have another Angola or we could move forward into a wholly different situation. That is a simple example of where standards that we have established and seek to maintain could be put to immediate practical effect.

One of the essential elements of "Agenda for Peace" is what we call preventive diplomacy. It is far better to prevent a dispute or a breakdown in society. One official from the Foreign Office or one ambassador is much cheaper than a battalion or an international rescue attempt, such as we have seen in Somalia. The Bill offers one further thread in that ability to prevent trouble and assist with preventive diplomacy.

The amount of money that we devote to preventive diplomacy is minuscule. It includes the know-how funds, which are essential. The Foreign Office budget represents only 1 per cent. of public expenditure. As "Agenda for Peace" suggests, diplomacy is the real way in which we defend our values and standards and share in giving assistance to other countries. So 1 per cent. of public expenditure seems a small amount to devote to that priority. That is not the issue with which we are dealing today, but all of us in the House should ensure that the means exist to play the full part that we can play because of Britain's history.

Britain is the only country in the world which is a member of the Security Council, the Commonwealth and the European Community. That is a unique combination which no other country has. That is to say nothing of our historical links through the Commonwealth with many other parts of the world. We can give much in terms of diplomatic skills and funds such as the know-how fund. We can share the skills of our local authorities wherever in the world they are most needed.

We have concentrated a great deal on the know-how funds as the means of assisting countries in eastern Europe. Indeed, we see daily how desperate Russia is for assistance. I am 110 per cent. behind that effort. Having provided the means for the implementation of the measures in the Bill, we need to grow the powers and ensure that the assistance is accepted. We need to propagate the knowledge in the relevant countries that the service is available.

It may reassure some of my colleagues who mentioned their anxieties about local government and local opinion that the initiative usually comes from the recipient country. People turn to our local Foreign Office staff and say that they desperately need help on a certain matter. The Foreign Office makes a list from which local authorities make a bid to carry out the project. The Foreign Office ensures that the local authority is not only expert in that matter, but is able to make the link.

I said on Second Reading that many towns, cities and counties in Britain were linked to places in other countries. It is helpful if a link already exists and people have already got together for other reasons. In giving technical assistance and offering help, it is essential not only to provide assistance but to monitor it and continue to support it. In many cases, people have been offered help and advice and left to get on with it. So many things in this life require constant monitoring and assistance.

The town clerk in Harare, which is twinned with Nottingham, can pick up the telephone and speak to the chief executive of Nottinghamshire county council and say, "Michael, I have a problem. How can you assist?" The chief executive can immediately respond by sending a further officer or by offering advice on the telephone. Much can be achieved by such a human link.

Interestingly, other Commonwealth countries operate similar systems. I was particularly interested in the Federation of Canadian Municipalities international programme, whose symbol is what a good symbol, because apart we can destroy the world, which I am afraid is happening in too many parts of the world. In terms of the benefit to British people, one of its findings is interesting. It says that the programmes that it has already established

"Together we can change the world"—

"have had a very positive impact on the Canadian municipalities involved, particularly in terms of professional growth. An improvement in the morale of Canadian municipal staff involved in the exchanges, and a shift in their attitude to how their city functions is beginning to be seen."

It further commented on the link between Burkina and Quebec:

"Managers who have gone to Burkina have found lessons to be learned. In Quebec, one gets used to a standard of life, to good working conditions. Seeing the situation in Bogande gives one some humility. One also learns much by the way people there have retained the strong human warmth, in their business relations as well as their day-to-day life, something we have lost a little of here."

There is a two-way process, which can only be to the benefit of the local community. I am sure that all my colleagues will agree that we must build on that example.

Where do we go from here? One wants to look to the future. The Commonwealth Parliamentary Association and the Commonwealth should start to see how it can link our local authority associations with those in other parts of the Commonwealth. That is a natural link. Sadly, many parts of the Commonwealth are still undeveloped and local authority associations may not exist. I hope that one of the sponsors of the Bill, my hon. Friend the Member for Hereford (Mr. Shepherd), who is a member of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association, will be able to make such a proposal for consideration at the association's international conference and, I hope, at the Heads of State conference. It would help to unite and assist the Commonwealth to develop and propagate the principle that together we can change the world.

I want my hon. Friend the Member for Arundel (Sir M. Marshall), who is president of the Inter-Parliamentary Union, to use the beneficent effects of the IPU to be big brother in the kindest and most helpful way to the many little brothers in local government. I hope that, through his good offices, he will be able to make the rest of the international community aware of the many talents that British local government can offer in building a single world.

I am sure that no sane council tax payer would begrudge such measures of assistance or would take the line about junketing and all the negative attitudes that people tend to mention.

Eastern and central Europe are covered by a fund that is already established. I should like it to be enlarged and used as effectively as possible, but my interest is in countries that have less than those in eastern and central Europe, which are covered by the Overseas Development Adminstration. I hope that we can encourage officials and the very able ODA Minister to take account of the Bill under the technical link scheme, because the Bill is the most cost-effective means of offering assistance. Instead of the ODA using international consuultants, the Bill is a more direct practical link. The ODA may need to change its thinking, which sometimes takes a little time. The de minimis provision of our overseas aid budget is very small, but, cumulatively, the small amount that a local authority can spend under the Bill and, with ministerial encouragement, under the general authorisation could do an enormous amount of good. It would be helpful if my friends at the ODA began to think positively about how the relevant local authorities will be asked to offer assistance.

Lady Olga Maitland: Does my hon. Friend agree that, although it is essential to give as much help and assistance as possible to overseas countries, it is important that they have to pass the litmus test of being a democratic system in order to receive financial aid? That is one of the criteria that were first suggested by the Foreign Office.

Mr. Lester: That should not be the first litmus test, because much of what we are doing is to enable such countries to establish democratic systems. The only way in which we can genuinely serve communities throughout the world is under a democratic system. We must be a little careful in thinking that we have the only democratic system. There must be accountable government at any level where Governments should be accountable to the people that they serve. How countries achieve that object is very much a matter for them. The thrust of the Bill and of my speech is that we are trying to export our high standards, and democracy in this place is one of our highest standards.

I hope that this small Bill will have an enormous and profound effect. I am most grateful to all those who played a part in drafting it, in developing it and in crafting it in Committee: Opposition Members have been constructive and supportive; Conservative Members have revealed their intimate knowledge of the subject; the Government have been very supportive; and the Local Government International Bureau and members of local authorities shared the best of their knowledge and experience. I thank in advance Baroness Flather, who was commended by the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks), and who I am sure will do a marvellous job in the House of Lords.

I hope that before we adjourn for the summer recess all those who played a part in drafting the Bill will take the same joy and fundamental sense of purpose from their role and that the Bill will be given Royal Assent before the summer recess.

Mr. Pickles: I congratulate by hon. Friend the Member for Broxtowe (Mr. Lester) on his initiative in promoting the Bill. My hon. Friend was luckly to come high in the private Member's ballot. I do not know whether he came first or second. He could have chosen a controversial subject and achieved a lot of national publicity. It is entirely consistent with his distinguished record that he should choose to promote a Bill which will do good both on the local government scene and, more important, on the international scene.

The world has changed a great deal over the past few years. The great founding fathers of modern local government would be surprised to find British local government offering advice and assistance to countries many miles from these shores. Those engaged in local government activities are surprised to find that many of the problems and challenges faced in Britain by those seeking to deliver good local administration are almost exactly the same as the problems faced in Africa and in the former eastern bloc. It is important that we enable local councils to share their experiences and to point to good practice to ensure that democracy flourishes in other countries. Democracy now exists from Stettin to well beyond the Urals. It may not be the kind of democracy that is readily recognisable by the good councillors of Brentwood District or of Epping Forest District, but it is a vibrant and developing democracy.

The powers in the Bill are built on good local government practice. There has been a gradual build-up of information. The Bill is important in clarifying and codifying practices that are developing. We need to ensure that in years to come, district auditors, whether sharp-suited or not—my experience of district auditors leads me to believe that they are unlikely to be sharp-suited —will not be able to rule these matters outside the competence of local authorities. As we are all aware, the principal function of a district auditor is to arrive on the battleground long after the battle has been won and lost and noisily to bayonet the wounded. We need to ensure that local authorities have the power to avoid such problems.

In Committee and on Report, hon. Members have expressed the worry that the Bill will open the doors to junketing. I have been very critical of junketing. We must make it clear that the advice offered is largely technical and practical. It is principally designed to ensure that the officers and practitioners of the council have the opportunity to share their experience with people from other countries. I make a prediction. The clanking of the mayoral chain will not be heard as a result of the powers that my hon. Friend the Member for Broxtowe seeks to give local government.

The new powers will develop in the way in which the twinning powers of local authorities have developed over the past 50 or 60 years. When I first became a councillor, I listened to a moving description of the patient and painstaking way in which links were built between this country, France and Germany between the two world wars and of the way in which, after the conclusion of the second world war, those links were patiently and gradually built up again. Local authorities, along with the local communities, were prepared to make enormous efforts to forge links. Families from across Europe and beyond have grown up together. Schoolchildren have become familiar with the customs of this country, and our schoolchildren have become familiar with customs of other countries. There have been exchanges of cultural events and exchanges of trade events.

The links are directly relevant to the Bill. As I know from my constituency of Brentwood and Ongar, the schoolchildren from abroad who visited my part of Essex in the 1950s and 1960s are now adults of some importance in local industry, in local councils and in local business. They are familiar with Essex and we are familiar with the parts of the world from which they came. Naturally, when we think in terms of trade, of cultural exchanges, or of advice, we look to the people whom we have known for most of our lives. The Bill will start an important movement because the friendships and professional advice proposed in the Bill will serve this country well. We should not be too starry-eyed. The aims of my hon. Friend from Broxtowe are good and decent, and will bring democracy. The Bill will also help to promote the interests of this country. The development of democracy and economic growth in the countries concerned will have a direct bearing on our economy.

What do the newly emergent democracies want? I have had the opportunity to offer advice to colleagues in other lands. What strikes me most forcefully about eastern Europe is the fact that a whole generation has disappeared in terms of leadership. The people who run local councils and local democracy have had no experience of such work. They are generally people on the fringes of society. Many were imprisoned under the former regimes. They now find that, having stormed the barricades, they have to deal with many of the difficult practicalities that come with running a modern local council. I welcome the Bill. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Broxtowe on making a valuable contribution to local government. I look forward to the Bill being given Royal Assent this year.

11.57 am

Sir Michael Marshall (Arundel): I am glad to have the opportunity to follow my hon. Friends the Members for Broxtowe (Mr. Lester) and for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. Pickles), because I intend to address a number of the points they raised. My hon. Friend the Member for Broxtowe rightly took us into the wider international dimension which lies behind the Bill. He is somewhat modest in speaking of it as a "little" Bill. The legislation has the potential to create an important extension of the development of the democratic process in many parts of the world.

I will outline some of the aspects of the legislation from my standpoint as president of the Inter-Parliamentary Union. My hon. Friend the Member for Broxtowe asked me what the IPU could do in taking the process forward. I will outline what is happening at present and consider briefly how the process may go further. I will deal first with specific examples of local government activity within parliaments and within the IPU. One of the most striking examples, of which a number of hon. Members have experience, is the fact that delegations from many countries, especially the newly emergent democracies in central and eastern Europe, relate strongly to the constituency visits and to discussions at local government level. As my hon. Friend the Member for Brentwood and Ongar said, we are dealing with a generation of people who have no experience of such structures.

I slightly disagreed with my hon. Friend the Member for Brentwood and Ongar when he said that he saw multi-party democracy only in the officer context. I do not want to ignore the role of councillors in providing the sort of crash courses and assistance needed. I certainly agree with my hon. Friend that such work can be undertaken by people with worried looks and heavy frowns, not those wearing chains for ceremonial purposes, but links are being forged by parliamentary visits, particularly of those coming to this country from the newly emerging democracies.

The IPU stands for the peaceful resolution of conflicts and the development of representative institutions—two processes that are intermingled—and is able to take the process wider still. The IPU can help in deploying the interests of local government at the elected level as well as the interests of Parliament and national Government at a higher level.

Cambodia has been mentioned. It is a good example of the way in which the partnership is beginning to emerge. I had the chance to meet Dr. Boutros Boutros Ghali a few weeks ago specifically to discuss what can be done to assist in the electoral process in Cambodia. I am sure that it will be appreciated that trying to co-ordinate the work of 118 Parliaments—not just one's own Government—is an enormous task. It is not easy, and we are still in the early days.

There is a worry over Cambodia. In Angola, while the electoral process was generally seen as free and fair, it was challenged simply because the presence of overseas observers was limited. There were not enough people on the ground to prevent the sort of challenge to the outcome by opposition parties and others. That is why the United Nations has overall direction of the Cambodian elections and is seeking to assist at every level and particularly—as my hon. Friend the Member for Broxtowe said—in the process of overseeing the polling stations which are often in remote areas.

The process is not confined merely to local government officers and councillors. The request has gone out to Members of Parliament to undertake such work, which is arduous and in some ways seen as lower down the scale of work normally undertaken. However, the needs are such that the appeal has gone out on the wider spaces. I am proud to see that a number of hon. Members have considered the matter carefully—and I believe that some will come forward to assist the process, and possibly camp up country to participate in it.

Last week, I had the chance to visit the Romanian Parliament and address the Chamber of Deputies. We had perhaps underestimated the way in which that Parliament is moving towards a wider multi-party spread than we had previously thought. The Romanian Speaker will visit this country soon and will, I know, hope to have the opportunity of discussing with you, Madam Deputy Speaker, and your colleagues, the activities of the Chair in the way in which our parliamentary organisations are currently structured. In Romania, debates quickly turn to issues of local government and how it should be organised. Discussions then bring into play the way in which such activities can be underpinned. The various possibilities include not just the know-how fund and the opportunities provided through the British Association for Central and Eastern Europe, but the Westminster Foundation for Democracy, which is doing important work in ensuring that party organisations have a chance to grow and develop. The current project list is widely drawn, although I suspect that it does not go as far towards local government as many hon. Members would wish. That is precisely why the Bill is so well timed and can act as a catalyst in taking the process forward.

I will not seek to rehearse the discussions that we had in Committee, but I am worried about one or two aspects of our proceedings this morning. Some of my hon. Friends —including, I think, my hon. Friend the Member for Colchester, North (Mr. Jenkin)—seemed to believe that the process could displace commercial activities. I believe that it will have the opposite effect. My experience of county councils shows that they are organised to provide the know-how on road building and management for many parts of the world, not just central and eastern Europe, but Africa and Asia. In doing so, they bring British civil engineering interests into the various consortia. Specific commercial opportunities are provided by the work that is encouraged by the Bill.

Looking to the future, there are ways in which the process can be accelerated and taken wider to bring together a partnership of local government, councillors, the House of Commons, the other place, Government and commercial interests in schemes that have validity in a world with ever-increasing needs. I do not know what the local authority organisations are currently doing, but here may be a case for creating some sort of international organisation of local authorities to exchange ideas. We cannot simply assume that it should be a purely British effort.

My hon. Friend the Member for Broxtowe referred to work being done by the Canadian municipal organisations. In Committee, I asked my hon. Friend the Minister whether he had any other examples of the work being done in other countries. My research suggests that there is not much information on that subject, and I have the impression that the work in that sphere is limited.

In my response to the Bill, which I trust will become an Act, I will ensure that we take the process forward and draw it to the attention of the 118 Parliaments so that they take back to their local authorities the suggestions made. I believe that my hon. Friend the Member for Broxtowe, through his work on the Bill, has started the process. I hope that it will be not only irreversible but worldwide.

Mr. Whittingdale: I will make a brief speech. I do not want to detain the House long and I am aware that other hon. Members wish to speak.

I was unable to be present for the Bill's Second Reading, but I read the debate carefully, and the subsequent Committee stage. I join my other hon. Friends in congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Broxtowe (Mr. Lester) on introducing the Bill, which appears to have won wide support on both sides of the House.

The collapse of communism and what has happened in eastern Europe in the past couple of years is the most exciting event during my lifetime. I went to eastern Europe in 1983 and saw the state of poverty and the expressions of despair. I never thought that the collapse of communism would happen so quickly or come so soon.

With the collapse of communism come new problems, both economic and political. It is essential that we in the west give every assistance that we can to the people in eastern Europe to make the transition to an economic free market and political democracy. This country has been at the forefront in giving economic assistance through the know-how fund and other institutions, such as the European bank for reconstruction and development, the British Council and, most recently, the foundation set up by Baroness Thatcher, with which I had a small connection before becoming a Member of Parliament.

Such efforts must be matched by political assistance. My hon. Friend the Member for Arundel (Sir M. Marshall) mentioned the Westminster Foundation for Democracy, which is doing good work in helping embryonic political parties in eastern Europe. The Conservative party has also been providing those parties with help on campaign techniques and political skills. It is essential that we should help not merely national political parties, but local ones.

When I made a brief visit to eastern Siberia with Baroness Thatcher, we stopped to refuel at Bratsk. She was greeted by a delegation of local dignitaries, who turned out to be the hierarchy of the Irkutsk communist party. My hon. Friend the Member for Broxtowe said that the essential requirement for functioning democracy is accountability, but I believe that that delegation had no accountability to the people of Irkutsk. I suspect that its members were accountable only to the Kremlin.

It is extremely important that we should give all the help that we can to the countries of eastern Europe, the former Soviet Union and other parts of the world to develop properly functioning local democracy. That is why I welcome the creation of the technical link scheme by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, and why I give my full support to the Bill.

We have a long tradition in this country of town twinning links which have been set up to improve international relationships and promote friendship with other European countries. Essex, my area, is twinned with the region of Picardy. Maldon is twinned with Cuijk in Holland, a link established 14 years ago by the then mayor, Ron Daws. Since then, there have been regular exchanges between the two towns.

Colchester is twinned with Wetzlar in Germany and with Avignon, and has developed friendships with the towns of Siena, Zwolle, Tarragona and Tortosa. All these places are in western Europe. They provide valuable links, but we need to look further. We need to encourage towns such as the ones in my constituency that I have mentioned to develop links with towns and villages in eastern Europe and beyond, so that we can pass on to them our experience and skills and help them to develop their own forms of local democracy.

I welcome the Bill and I hope that towns across the country will take advantage of it, so that in due course Colchester will be twinned not just with Wetzlar but with Vladivostok, and Maldon not just with Cuijk but also with Cracow. This Bill will enable them to do that, and I give it my full support.

Mr. Bowis: I had not realised until now that my hon. Friend the Member for Colchester, South and Maldon (Mr. Whittingdale) was responsible for sending our former noble leader to Siberia. I salute my hon. Friend the Member for Broxtowe (Mr. Lester) for introducing the measure and for all that he does for the developing world east and west of the iron curtain. Occasionally, we have to mix our envy of his endurance of the tropical sun with admiration for what he achieves on these countries' behalf.

The Bill meets the concerns of local authorities about the possibility of finding themselves acting ultra vires. I will want to continue to monitor their concerns about currency fluctuations affecting the implementation of their plans. Given the uncertainties of currencies like the rouble, we do not want to find that a council that has sent staff somewhere runs out of money before the scheme has got under way. That problem needs to be treated with sympathy by the powers that be.

I entirely endorse the point about countries that are not yet democracies. My hon. Friend mentioned Cambodia, for instance. I recall being in Namibia in the run-up to what the United Nations deemed were free and fair elections. There I met an electoral registration officer from Somerset, offering his expertise. I should like that to happen in more parts of the world, such as Palestine.

I would encourage local authorities to use for this purpose officers who have just retired. They have the requisite expertise, and using them will not deprive communities of that expertise. I think particularly of the former chief executive of my former council of Kingston —recorded as Wandsworth in the Official Report of the Committee proceedings—Bob McCloy, who has done so much for Bulgaria.

As for the financial benefits to local authorities, Wandsworth council has been selling its advisory services to many parts of the world, especially eastern and central Europe. Last year, that brought in £100,000 for the benefit of the community. That sort of activity should be further developed.

The Bill goes a long way towards bringing benefits to the recipient countries—and to the donor countries. Our councils can often learn something from the procedures and practices of the towns abroad to which they go. That is why we should endorse the Bill and wish it well. I wish Baroness Flather every success in taking the Bill through the other place, and I congratulate my hon. Friend once again on taking the measure through to the statute book.

Lady Olga Maitland: Because time is short I will briefly offer my sincere and wholehearted congratulations to my hon. Friend the Member for Broxtowe (Mr. Lester) on bringing in the Bill. The clarification that it affords is well overdue. The world is becoming like a global village; we must reach out and help those in need.

Of course we must help emerging democracies, but I must emphasise that know-how funds should primarily be given to countries that are already democracies. Advice is also badly needed. When I was in Yugoslavia before Christmas monitoring the elections it became clear to me how much that country need good advice on how to run elections. I will not go into the political shenanigans that were going on, but there was a genuine need to understand how to carry out free and fair elections.

The Bill is welcome because it can serve as a vehicle for developing trade links, too. In a week of great tragedy for Warrington, I have heard that the borough council there is doing magnificent work developing trade links in the form of technical expertise with eastern Europe, especially Czechoslovakia—to the tremendous benefit of local businesses.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Broxtowe on a splendid effort.

Mr. Carrington: I add my congratulations to my hon. Friend the Member for Broxtowe (Mr. Lester). He has piloted the Bill through with considerable skill. The Bill is timely because it will be of general application—and specific application to eastern Europe, an area with which we have great historical and cultural ties. Its attitudes to democracy can be expected to be similar to our own and its structures will benefit enormously from being able to call on the expertise of British local government.

It is impossible to run a functioning system of democracy without that democracy permeating to the lowest levels of society, and working effectively there. It must permeate all activities in the public domain, as well. That is the area in which this country has a great deal to offer others.

That assistance must be given at other countries' request, however, not at our insisting. Only they know what they need for their democracy. We can provide the extra technical assistance to enable them to achieve their self-defined democratic goals, and that is what the Bill does. Hence, I strongly support it; I congratulate my hon. Friend and I look forward to the Bill's successful passage through another place.

Mr. Nigel Evans: I am grateful to have the opportunity to congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Broxtowe (Mr. Lester) on his important Bill. It is tempting to say that we should of course automatically give countries in need of assistance the help that they need. Not so; when canvassing one's constituents, one often hears them say, "We have our own problems here. The money you spend on overseas assistance should be spent on this country." I do not share that view. Emerging democracies are fragile flowers which need oxygen to survive. If we, through our work here, can give them part of our oxygen, they will grow and blossom.

In the past, I was sceptical. I was on West Glamorgan county council for six years and made it clear from the start that I would not go on any foreign trips. During my time there, I did not take any such trips although there were opportunities to do so. The discerning electorate will be able to see whether local authorities are abusing the privileges that the Bill will grant them to assist emerging countries. They will know whether the system is being used or abused.

The Bill will banish the jolly-junket image and every pound will be invested properly to assist emerging overseas democracies. When I was a councillor in West Glamorgan, many of the areas that I represented were twinned with other towns and villages. Some of the boards and banners in our towns and villages suggest that it would be easier to state the places that they are not twinned with. However, twinning gives valuable two-way information. We, as well as the countries that we are assisting, will benefit from contact. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Broxtowe and have great pleasure in supporting the Bill.

Mr. Tony Banks: I associate the Opposition with all that has been said about the hon. Member for Broxtowe (Mr. Lester) and his excellent Bill. We are delighted at its progress and wish it fair wind in another place. When I listen to the hon. Gentleman in Committee and in the House, I realise what a thoroughly decent person he is. He has the distinction, the badge of merit, of being one of the first Ministers to be sacked by Mrs. Thatcher when she became Prime Minister. That was because he is such a thoroughly decent person.

I was interested to hear that the hon. Member for Colchester, South and Maldon (Mr. Whittingdale) accompanied Lady Thatcher to deepest, darkest and ice-bound Russia and that she was greeted by members of the local Communist party. They recognise a good old Stalinist when they see one and if they ever wish to restore Stalinism, Baroness Thatcher will be an excellent person to take over and consult.

We have had many clashes in the Chamber over the role and functions of local government: we gently touched on a few of them today. Many Conservative Members have local authority backgrounds. I am a passionate believer in the role of local government, which has been sorely undermined since 1979 by many Conservative policies. The Prime Minister recently spoke about the need for partnership between local and central Government and about the need to move away from the acrimonious past. We all say, "Hear, hear" to that, but we want to see action by the Government; otherwise what the Prime Minister said will remain mere words. So many powers have been taken from local government and it has been so sorely undermined that not just words but Government action are needed to remedy all the past attacks. Without that, I am afraid that our local democratic structure will remain fragile.

There is much to be proud of in what is left of local government in terms of its structures, democracy and traditions and, in terms of what we have been debating, —its expertise. It is little wonder that east European and other countries have turned to our local authorities for assistance in the areas that hon. Members have mentioned in this short Third Reading debate. Long may those requests come in and long may we be able to extend that expertise, tradition and everything else that is good about local government to countries elsewhere, and especially in eastern Europe, that are struggling to enjoy the light of democracy.

Local authorities need to do a great deal to assist emerging democracies. The hon. Member for Broxtowe was correct when he said that we must not say, "We will assist you only when you are a fully fledged democracy." One could argue that our democracy is not as fully developed as we want it to be, and we have had many generations of practice. It is a little much to expect emerging democracies in eastern Europe to make an enormous leap in a short time. They need help and encouragement, and that is precisely what the Bill is about.

Governments must do more. I was delighted by what President Clinton said about the G7 and its role in helping President Yeltsin in Russia. In the same context, I was not happy to hear what our Foreign Secretary said in Washington—that policies to assist would simply not be justified at the moment because of the economic position in Russia. We need to assist at both national and local level.

The hon. Member for Broxtowe said that he hoped that the Bill would receive a fair wind in another place and that it would receive Royal Assent before the summer recess. I am confident about that. I somehow feel that the Maastricht Bill will not reach the statute book as speedily as the hon. Gentleman's excellent measure.

Mr. Robin Squire: I suspect that I shall be the last Member in the debate to congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Broxtowe (Mr. Lester) on his good fortune in winning the ballot, on choosing the Bill and on his skill in guiding it through its various stages today and in previous proceedings. I also congratulate hon. Members who have taken part in our proceedings. Anyone reading the reports of the Second Reading and Committee debates will be struck by the depth of expertise displayed by all hon. Members. That reflects well on the House.

The Bill has the strong support of Government and local government. I am pleased that it is strongly supported in all parts of the House. Its purpose is to clear up the confusion that exists over local authorities' powers to provide technical assistance overseas.

The needs of such assistance, and local authorities' capacity to provide it, were brought home to me last week when I attended and spoke to the Council of Europe's Standing Conference of Local and Regional Authorities annual conference in Strasbourg. Progress in some of the east European countries—Poland, Hungary and the Czech Republic—is encouraging, and they are gaining local government experience and skills rapidly. I believe that the assistance of our authorities and other western European authorities has played a significant part in this.

All this modest but self-evidently useful and good work has been put in jeopardy by the doubts that have arisen over local authorities' powers. The only way to remove those doubts is by primary legislation and that is why the Government, and the local authority associations are so grateful to my hon. Friend for agreeing to take on this Bill. Indeed, one of the features of the whole history of the Bill has been the close co-operation and constructive dialogue between central and local government. I might add that this is one example of many which illustrates the improving relationship between us, which the press and —dare I say it—even at times, Labour Members seem unaware of, or choose to ignore.

The Bill is a short and relatively simple measure—a "minor" piece of legislation. It will not grab headlines, but it will enable our local authorities to help communities of all sizes in other parts of the world. It will help in the provision of vital assistance to eastern Europe, but it will also help in the wider world. Who can look at the television pictures coming out of Sudan, Somalia, Ethiopia and Angola without wishing that there was something, however small, that we could do to help the ordinary people of these countries? Local government matters. It matters here in Britain. How much more important it must be in countries struggling to achieve the basic level of stability and organisation necessary to begin to save and improve people's lives. In passing the Bill, hon. Members on both sides of the House will be doing something that allows our country to make a positive contribution to the world we live in and to help those of our fellow men and women who are so much less fortunate than ourselves. I commend the Bill to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill read the Third time, and passed.

Protection of Animals (Scotland) Bill

Order for Third Reading read.

12.30 pm

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

This is a small but important Bill. It will bring the penalties imposed in Scotland into line with those imposed elsewhere in the United Kingdom. I begin by thanking Ministers and officials at the Scottish Office, who helped me by amending my original Bill until it became the Bill that I introduced. The House will realise that, without that assistance and support, private Members's Bills have little chance of getting through the House. I also thank Opposition Members who assisted me in Committee and who encouraged me to promote the Bill.

The Bill has the support of all political parties on the Scottish scene and I believe that it will be welcomed by all who have an interest in the care of animals. There is no doubt, particularly given some of the recent evidence of the maltreatment of animals, that the penalties in Scotland should be brought into line with those of the rest of the United Kingdom.

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn (Perth and Kinross): I congratulate my hon. Friend on the Bill, but there is a danger in just homogenising the penalties in Scotland and those in England for the sake of it. We have a different situation and we should be careful. Our penalties might be greater or smaller or better or worse, but I do not like homogenisation of either penalty or law.

Mr. Walker: My hon. and learned Friend, who is a practitioner in these matters when I am not, understands the problems that are faced in court. I am a simple chap and I should not like to think that someone who wished, as some appear to, to maltreat animals—particularly horses, in which my children have a great interest—might feel that if he popped across the border to commit the crime, the penalty would be more lenient. That is why I thought it important to align the penalties in this instance. I accept what my hon. and learned Friend says about the importance of our retaining our different laws in Scotland.

All those who are interested in the welfare of animals will, I feel, welcome the changes.

12.34 pm

Mrs. Maria Fyfe (Glasgow, Maryhill): The Labour party supports the Bill and we welcome the move made by the hon. Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) in introducing it. We agree that cruelty to animals is contemptible and inexcusable and that the penalty should reflect the seriousness of the offence.

12.33 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Lord James Douglas-Hamilton): I think that I can speak briefly in tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker), who has introduced an important Bill. I am glad to have the opportunity to speak in the debate on the Bill, which deals with an important aspect of animal welfare. I strongly congratulate my hon. Friend on his initiative in introducing it, with the support of the Scottish Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals. As my hon. Friend said, the Bill simply increases the maximum fine for an offence of cruelty to animals under the Protection of Animals (Scotland) Act 1912 from level 4 on a standard scale, which is currently £2,500, to level 5, which is currently £5,000. This will bring the maximum fine in Scotland into line with that which applies in the rest of the United Kingdom, which has been at level 5 since the introduction of the Protection of Animals (Scotland) Act 1987. That, too, was a private Member's measure, which was introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway). The Government considered at that time whether the increase in penalties introduced by that measure might be extended to Scotland. Unfortunately, that would have required an amendment to the long title, which would have seriously delayed its passage.

The Government's position has been that we would be prepared to support an increase of the maximum fine in Scotland at the next available opportunity. As the House will appreciate, pressures on the parliamentary timetable meant that such an opportunity for a Government measure did not arise.

There is, of course, no requirement for identical penalties—I take up the point of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Perth and Kinross (Sir N. Fairbairn)—to attach to equivalent offences in the different jurisdictions within the United Kingdom. Indeed, between 1912 and 1987, the maximum period of imprisonment for the equivalent animal cruelty offences was six months in Scotland and only three months in the rest of the United Kingdom. We wish, however, to send a firm and clear message to those who might be considering acts of cruelty to animals that the courts should have the ability to impose a substantial fine in appropriate circumstances. I know that issues of animal welfare generally have raised a great deal of public interest in recent years and that general concern exists throughout Scotland about cruelty to animals. There are several issues related to animal welfare about which many hon. Members have, understandably, strong views.

It would be remiss of me to talk about cruelty to animals in the context of the Bill without paying a strong tribute to the work of the SSPCA, which initiated and supports the Bill. The work of the society is crucial in ensuring the protection of animals. The evidence of its inspectors is often instrumental in securing the conviction of those involved in offences of cruelty to which the higher penalty that the Bill will introduce would apply.

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn: As the Bill protects horses, we should remind those who think that they are protecting foxes that wounding horses is not advancing non-cruelty to animals.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I accept absolutely that cruelty to horses should be visited with severity.

The SSPCA undertakes work beyond seeking prosecutions for offences of the type with which the Bill will deal. It acts to ensure that the welfare of animals at markets, breeding establishments and boarding places is catered for properly. In particular, it operates 10 welfare centres throughout Scotland to provide vital back-up to the inspectors. It has an important role in educating members of the public, especially young people, in the better care and welfare of animals. I congratulate the society on the success of its work. I am sure that all hon. Members will join me in wishing it continued success in all its worthy areas of activity.

There is an immense amount that I could say, but I shall say only a little more. There is unanimity of support throughout the House for the Bill. I compliment my hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North and welcome the support of the hon. Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mrs. Fyfe). I emphasise the Government's wholehearted support for the Bill and the increased penalty that it contains. I congratulate my hon. Friend on introducing it and I hope that it will continue to have a swift and uneventful passage.

Mr. Hartley Booth (Finchley): It is often said that politicians are animals. Of course, that is entirely untrue. There are, however, such creatures as political animals, but I am sure that no animal would ever choose to have all-night sittings.

I welcome the Bill, which is an example of the way in which the House has legislated repeatedly to stop cruelty to animals, to protect animals and to demonstrate that right hon. and hon. Members are animal lovers. There has been a huge rise in the incidence of cruelty to animals. It is sad that that has happened after 100 years of the RSPCA and its Scottish equivalent, which has been praised in the debate. There was a 27 per cent. rise in Scotland during the last recorded year and a similar rise in England in 1990-91.

It is difficult for an English Member of Parliament to speak in a debate on a Scottish Bill. However, this is an important issue and Scottish legislation often goes on to become English legislation—for example, legislation on alcohol abuse was introduced in Scotland in 1981 and then in England in 1986. Therefore, it is often useful for English Members to speak on Scottish Bills.

This is the Bill's Third Reading, so it cannot be amended, and I am not suggesting that it should be. However, it contains an unsatisfactory element on which, perhaps, the Scottish Office could help by issuing guidelines. I refer to the substance of the Bill—punishment. All those involved in the drafting, proposing and debating of the Bill are opposed to cruelty to animals, so it behoves us to get the element of punishment right.

In 1912, when the previous Act reached the statute book, there was a more primitive attitude to punishment. It was thought that the only appropriate punishment was a fine or imprisonment. Sadly, those alternatives are repeated in the Bill. In our more enlightened and experienced time, we should go beyond those alternatives wherever possible. For example, we should consider compensation for those whose animals have suffered. Indeed, the theme, "Always think of the victim", would benefit the criminal justice system.

We should consider forfeiture of, for example, items of equipment used in the torture of animals. We have all read the horrible stories about that. It may be that some poor animal has been kept incarcerated in a van——

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn: All the penalties to which my hon. Friend has referred are already available to courts in Scotland.

Mr. Booth: My hon. and learned Friend is right. I was about to come to that point.

As those punishments do not appear in the text of the Bill, they should be the subject of Scottish Office guidance. The sheriff and other courts would then automatically put them at the top of the agenda when sentencing.

There is another matter on which the Scottish Office should consider issuing guidance. It is the classic case where those who are likely to commit the offences referred to in the Bill have jobs. Such offenders should, in these more enlighted times, be put in weekend prisons, so that they may keep their jobs, pay substantial compensation, and support their families.

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn: And pay a fine.

Mr. Booth: Yes, as my hon. and learned Friend says. Those and other penalties should be considered automatically by the courts, but be discretionary in every case. However, the guidelines should be clearly spelt out by the Scottish Office. I hope to see that practice repeated south of the border.

We are in times of change and while I support the Bill in every way, I recommend further work by the Scottish Office to support those people who want greater enlightenment in respect of punishment.

Bill read the Third time, and passed.

Carrying of Knives etc. (Scotland) Bill

As amended (in the Standing Committee), considered. Order for Third Reading read.

12.45 pm

Mr. Phil Gallie (Ayr): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

It is my privilege to rise for a second time today to address the House, and to present a second, important Bill —one which will be welcomed by many people in Scotland.

The Bill has the support of every party represented in the House, and I hope that that support will continue and that the Bill will clear its final stage today. It was amended in the Second Scottish Standing Committee earlier this week.

The urgent need for the Bill was reflected in amendments tabled in Committee by Opposition Members. One amendment from the hon. Member for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall) disposed of the two months waiting time that would normally follow Royal Assent. I had some reservations, because those two months represented the preparation time that is built into virtually all legislation; it allows solicitors, courts and the police to prepare for new legislation. However, the hon. Member for Dumbarton was right about the urgent need for the Bill to be enacted, and I was pleased that the Committee was able to accept such an amendment.

If the Bill receives its Third Reading today, the police prosecution service and all in the Scottish legal criminal procedure chain should take note now, and be prepared to implement its provisions.

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn (Perth and Kinross): I apologise to my hon. Friend for the fact that, owing to illness, I was not able to attend the Committee to which he was gracious enough to appoint me. Having read the proceedings of the Committee, I feel that the House should be reminded that under the Prevention of Crime Act 1953, section 1 of which applies to Scotland, there is a penalty of two years' imprisonment—which is greater than any penalty imposed by the Bill. My hon. Friend may not accept the view of the law taken by my hon. Friend the Minister or me, but I have argued frequently that section 1 of the 1953 Act is qualified by subsection (4) and therefore any instrument —be it a knife, axe, tin, mace, or even the Speaker's head —carried for an offensive purpose requires the accused to explain why he is carrying it and to prove that he is not carrying it for an offensive purpose. That is the present law, punishable by two years' imprisonment. The House and the country ought to be reminded of that fact.

Mr. Gallie: I thank my hon. and learned Friend. I am aware of his concerns and have looked into the matter long and hard. I recognise that my hon. and learned Friend has far greater experience than I. However, having taken advice, I still believe that the 1953 Act does not cover the carrying of these weapons.

My hon. and learned Friend referred to the fact that if an individual carries an axe, he will inevitably be faced with punishment. In my constituency, however, when an individual, a well-known worthy, was picked up with an axe in his possession his defence was that he intended to use it to scrape the wallpaper off his mother's walls. He got away with that defence. That is unacceptable to the people of Scotland, either in the streets or in their homes.

[Mr. Gallie]

Therefore, we are trying to correct the deficiencies in the 1953 Act. With the greatest respect to my hon. and learned Friend, I suggest that he ought to look into that incident.

If the Bill is given its Third Reading today, it will lead to important messages being got home. One of those messages is that every thug who carries a blade will risk having a very severe penalty imposed on him. The provisions of the Bill would lead to a two-year term of imprisonment, which I welcome. The onus is not now, as it was in the past, on the courts to prove intent. That onus is now on the thug and, perhaps more significantly, on the carrier of the knife to prove that he had reason for having a blade in his or her possession.

My first speech today was intended to include an element of humour when seeking the approval of the House for the Third Reading of the Licensing (Amendment) (Scotland) Bill. I feel no humour and I display no humour as I speak on the Carrying of Knives, etc. (Scotland) Bill. I refer to the fear, anger, and the lack of understanding of every law-abiding Scot. They are all mystified and disillusioned by the evidence of the violence on our streets. All too often, that violence is not just on our streets; it is to be found in the home. Many elderly people, living alone, fear being violently attacked by people who gain illegal entry to their homes.

People parade our streets carrying threatening weapons. At present, however, they cannot be prosecuted. Carving knives, axes and Stanley-type knives can be carried without the fear of automatic prosecution. That is what we are trying, by means of the Bill, to prevent. I have referred to the Scots, but in this United Kingdom of ours it is not just the Scots who live in Scotland; the English, the Welsh and people of many other nationalities reside in Scotland. All those who live in Scotland feel under threat.

Before I deal with the details of the Bill, I ought to provide some statistics. They highlight the problems in my region of Scotland. They also highlight the growing tide of violence elsewhere. I am critical of a tendency that has built up since the 1960s of Governments going soft on crime. Figures for the United Kingdom demonstrate that other countries also have problems. I draw attention to some figures for murder and attempted murder in countries worldwide and compare them to figures that I have obtained for London. For example, the rate of murder in Los Angeles and New York runs at some five or six times the level of that in London. The figures for attempted murder and crimes of violence in Los Angeles and New York far outweigh the figures in London.

It is not simply in the United States. The figures for South America are absolutely horrendous. In Canada and Australia, we also see the trend. There are a few countries in which the same trends are not reflected—one of them is Japan. I cannot offer reasons why that should be so, but it would be worthy of investigation. Other countries that do not reflect the same trends include Saudi Arabia in the middle east. I wonder what effect the seriousness of penalties has on deterring crimes of murder and attempted assault and a whole range of perhaps petty crimes in such countries.

What about Strathclyde and my region of Ayr? I have looked at the figures for the five years between 1988 and 1992. The figures for murder show that the reasonably level playing field has gradually risen over that period. In 1992, the figures had almost doubled. For crimes involving the use of knives and blades, the figure rises by an amazing 135 per cent. There is something deeply wrong which fills me with concern. I express the feelings which came out in Committee.

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn: In case my hon. Friend does not know, invading another person's house to assault them is an additional crime in the law of Scotland of hamesucken. The reason why knives started to be used historically in Glasgow and elsewhere is simple: previously, people slashed others with a razor. When Lord Carman started sending people down for 14 years for razor-slashing, they used a lethal weapon rather than one which only wounded.

I appreciate my hon. Friend's spirit, vigour and purpose. I emphasise that the Prevention of Crime Act —I have appeared some 500 or 1,000 times in section 1 cases—covers matters which the Bill covers with a two-year penalty.

Mr. Gallie: I thank my hon. and learned Friend for his intervention. When he comes to the point at which he is defending these people, the prosecution system has decreed that there is a case to answer. Under the 1953 Act, the Crown must prove that there is an intent to use or that the weapon has been deliberately converted to be used for violent means. At present, it means that the prosecution service does not take the case to the point at which my hon. and learned Friend would be involved. There is a well-recognised requirement. I see that the hon. Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mrs. Fyfe) is nodding her head in agreement.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): Although clever legal minds such as my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Perth and Kinross (Sir N. Fairbairn) turn their cleverness properly to the assistance of those who are charged, as a layman who knows little about these matters, I should be happy with belt and braces for the prosecution. If the belt is suspect, it is a good thing to add the braces.

Mr. Gallie: I agree. We must acknowledge that the people whom we aim to protect are the public—the law-abiding people who want to do nothing other than live in their homes and walk the streets without fear of their life or of assault. That is the aim of the Bill. I hope that the House will go with me.

Other figures show a massive rise in Strathclyde in instances of attempted murder. The use of blades and knives has risen at an astronomical rate in the past year. There has also been an escalation of serious assaults. We must send out a message from the House. If nothing else, the Bill will send out just such a message. That underlines the need for the Bill. Originally, the Bill sought to equate Scottish law with the law in England and Wales under section 139 of the Criminal Justice Act 1988. As amended, the Bill creates more appropriate sentences to suit the scene in Scotland as it is seen by Scottish Members of all parties. Scottish Members were unanimous in Committee.

Prison is now seen as a justifiable penalty for carrying a weapon. Opposition Members highlighted anxiety about overcrowding of prisons during the Committee stage of the Prisoners and Criminal Proceedings (Scotland) Bill. I welcome their change of heart on the issue. I recognise that they made justified comments in that Committee, and the fact that Opposition Members pressed for the measures in this Bill underlines the strength of feeling. I welcome that, just as I welcome the agreement of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland and the Home Office to allow the Bill to be amended.

Perhaps further reviews of punishments could take place. I said in Committee that some older punishments could be effective. I might be slightly out of step with other hon. Members. I referred in Committee to the stocks. I accept that perhaps the stocks have had their day. I do not contemplate a return to the stocks of old in which criminals were placed on the street and had eggs and apples thrown at them. I do not see that as the way ahead.

However, we could have modern-day stocks. We live in a high-tech age. We have television. The bully and those who carry knives and blades and use them depend on their macho, hard-man image. Perhaps we should consider punishments that undercut their standing among their contemporaries. Perhaps we could use the television to do that.

In Committee the hon. Member for Glasgow, Shettleston (Mr. Marshall) said:

"The saddest aspect is that it is often the most vulnerable members of society who are threatened with knives and weapons. Frail, elderly pensioners who live alone, particularly ladies, are most at risk. What sort of inhuman being threatens an old lady in her 80s or 90s with a knife?"—[Official Report, Second Scottish Standing Committee, 23 March 1993; c. 11.]

I agree with the hon. Gentleman. We should let the public see what kind of person does that. Perhaps we could use television as part of the sentencing process so show society's abhorrence at what they have done, which may reduce their standing with their contemporaries. I believe that it is worth considering.

I know that I will not receive the agreement of hon. Members about other forms of punishment. Last Wednesday, the European Court endorsed the use of the cane in schools. That represented a change of direction and a new, enlightened vision. I emphasise that it is not relevant to the Bill, but it is perhaps a thought for the future.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley): I, too, welcomed the European Court's ruling allowing private schools to use the strap because of the lack of discipline in our schools and in the fabric of our society, which has led to the depths that we now have in many parts of the country. Does my hon. Friend agree that following the court's ruling we should reconsider the reintroduction of corporal punishment in the state sector?

Mr. Gallie: I welcome my hon. Friend's intervention——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): Order. I do not think that we can go into corporal punishment this morning.

Mr. Gallie: I would never disagree with you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I said that the issues were not relevant to the Bill, but I welcome my hon. Friend's intervention and take his point.

I should like to review the background to the Bill. The Prevention of Crime Act 1953 covers people who carry weapons with intent to use and weapons that have been designed to cause physical harm. In recent times, the courts, the prosecution service and certainly the police have not always been able to use that Act. The Bill, as amended, rectifies that issue.

Some of the Bill's provisions replicate the Criminal Justice Act 1988. For example, the Bill allows certain defences. One can carry a blade in public if it can be shown that the individual is clearly en route from place of work to base—home or another works premises. A blade can be carried for religious reasons. That defence was incorporated for Sikhs, who carry small blades in their turbans, in order to preserve their rights. There may be other instances of which I am not aware.

Mr. Matthew Carrington (Fulham): One aspect of the Bill causes me some concern. I am a rather enthusiastic amateur cook who cooks a great deal. In common with most cooks, I am determined to use my own knives when I cook. Cooks get very used to their knives, which are especially sharp. When I cook somewhere other than at home, I carry a collection of knives with me. Cooking is not my work, but my entertainment. However, the knives could be pretty vicious things in the wrong hands. I have a 10-in cook's knife and a 12-in boning knife, both of which are razor sharp and could perfectly happily fillet individuals as well as joints of meat. I should hate to think that people like me in Scotland would no longer be able to enjoy the gentle entertainment that I enjoy.

Mr. Gallie: On this rare occasion, we in Scotland are lagging behind people in England. My hon. Friend the Member for Fulham (Mr. Carrington) describes the law in England. I suggest that cooking is not only a leisure pursuit, but a form of leisure work. As the law seems to have caused him little difficulty until now, his mind will be completely at rest when we in Scotland come into line with England. It will cause us little difficulty either.

The exceptions also include an exception for a person who is carrying a blade as part of his national costume. My hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) and I on occasion wear with pride our national costume and we do not intend to change. The Bill allows us to do so.

Mr. Bill Walker: My hon. Friend will be aware that he and I have, interestingly, been accused of not wearing the correct national costume, although I shall not go into detail on that. I am in no doubt about the fact that the skean dhu is part of our national costume. My hon. Friend may be interested to know that I was responsible for ensuring that the Criminal Justice Act 1988 included a provision to allow Scots to wear the skean dhu in England. I am sorry that I have not been successful so far in Dallas, Texas where I was arrested for carrying a knife. One can carry as many guns as one wishes in Dallas, but one is not allowed to carry knives. We still have some way to go, although I thank my hon. Friend for including this exception in the Bill.

Mr. Gallie: Once again, we are all indebted to my hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North for enlightening the House. He put forward his views when the Criminal Justice Act 1988 was going through the House. I was not aware of any questions having been raised about my wearing of the national dress, although I have been aware of some questions about his wearing of it. That is his business and I shall go no further.

Clause 2 provides powers of stop and search. There is no need for concern about that. In Scotland such powers already exist for dealing with an individual who is thought to be committing an offence. When we create a new offence in a Bill, we must give powers in relation to that new offence, and that is the intention behind clause 2. As a result of an amendment, clause 3 provides that the Bill should come into force immediately after Royal Assent.

The Bill is but a small—I emphasise "small"—step in the fight against thugging. No one conceals the fact that much more needs to be done. There are many reasons for investigating the roots of violence on our streets and the actions of some—a small minority—of our citizens. The Bill is a step in the right direction, and marks another item to be chalked off the list of our manifesto commitments—perhaps ahead of programme, but not before time.

I have a shopping list of activities, as, I am sure, do other hon. Members. We may need a major review of criminal legal procedure in Scotland, but I make no apologies for this first small step. We must keep the battle going. A Scottish phrase is appropriate, as the hon. Member for Maryhill will no doubt agree: "Many a mickle maks a muckle". By jove, we need this mickle now, and a muckle more in the future.

I thank the individuals involved in preparing the Bill—my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, my right hon. Friend the Minister of State in another place and the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland, who has been a tower of strength to me in recent weeks. I thank the supporters who have backed the Bill, and the Opposition Members, particularly the hon. Member for Dumbarton who have given support. Their contributions to the debates in the House have certainly given everyone something to think about. I also thank the Scottish Office officials who helped to prepare the Bill and provided a great source of strength to me.

I hope that the Bill will proceed without opposition. The people of Scotland will be eternally grateful to the House if that happens.

1.17 pm

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Ayr (Mr. Gallie) on his success in introducing the Bill. Lengthy debates and changes took place in Committee, and I believe that the resulting Bill will contribute substantially to overcoming the ever-growing problem of the use of knives in a offensive manner. For a Scot to have two Bills on Third Reading on a Friday in Parliament must be a record. I have no recollection of that happening before and I think that my hon. Friend may have a contribution to make to the "Guinness Book of Records".

Whatever may be said about my hon. Friend's dress and mine, I am sure that we dress alike. The misinformation being spread by odd sources is quite wrong. I wear the Scottish national costume regularly as I am proud of my ancestry, and it is important to ensure that we do not impede people who are properly dressed. I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Ayr for including such a provision in the Bill.

It was important to recognise the problems that have occurred in the courts. I have no wish to cross swords with my hon. and learned Friend from Perth and Kinross (Sir N. Fairbairn)—his constituency is next door to mine—but it has been clear to all of us who have been looking at the problems in the Scottish courts that something was not quite right. I hope and believe that the Bill, if it becomes law, will help to redress the balance.

Lady Olga Maitland (Sutton and Cheam): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Ayr (Mr. Gallie) on introducing the Bill. I have a particular interest, in that I am a patron of a charity called the Why? campaign, whose founder, Bill Dennison, suffered a grievous loss when his son John was stabbed to death. It has become acutely obvious that young people are increasingly carrying knives, careless of the damage they can do.

These knives have become a scourge, associated with the sort of macho image that young men like to foster. They go out in the evenings carrying car keys, wallets and knives as if the latter were part of their masculinity.

This culture of knife-carrying has led to an enormous increase in the number of deaths from sharp implements. In the past four years, the numbers of such deaths have risen by 25 per cent.

In Standing Committee, the hon. Member for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall) tried to move an amendment to make the Bill cover 3-inch pocket folding knives. Gruesome evidence was given of victims who had died from wounds less than three inches deep. Such wounds can reach the chest, heart or lungs and can prove to be mortal. There is no evidence, however, that such injuries are caused by penknives or pocket knives. Much larger weapons are needed to cause them.

In any case, the people who carry small folding pocket knives are not usually the ones likely to be committing an offence. It is the people who carry larger weapons who are more likely to inflict injury.

There is no evidence in the south that pocket knives are giving rise to concern. As my hon. Friend the Member for Fulham (Mr. Carrington) said, knives can be innocently carried for other purposes, such as cooking or whittling wood. Every self-respecting cub and boy scout knows how to handle a pocket knife. They are a part of everyday life.

There is a mythical story that Zsa Zsa Gabor kept a drawer full of pocket knives as presents for her admirers, knowing that the knives would remind them of their childhood.

We are trying to draw attention to the serious knife carrying which can lead to mortal injuries. I welcome the efforts that have gone into the Bill. When educating young people, we must emphasise to them more than ever that knives are highly dangerous and will not be tolerated in public.

1.23 pm

Mrs. Maria Fyfe (Glasgow, Maryhill): I was somewhat alarmed to hear the hon. Member for Ayr (Mr. Gallie) explain his notion of further steps that he might consider taking to achieve a muckle out of today's mickle. I will be listening carefully to his future proposals for updating the stocks and bringing back caning, but he cannot rely on our support for any such moves.

The Opposition welcome and support the Bill——

Mr. Bill Walker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Lady, but does she wonder where the Scottish National party is today? Its Members pretend in Parliament to defend Scotland's interests, so why are not they here today to discuss this important Bill?

Mrs. Fyfe: The members of the SNP do a great deal more talking about supporting Scottish interests than acting for them.

Mr. Gallie: In all fairness—and, as everyone knows, I am very fair—an hon. Member from the Scottish National party voiced support for the Bill and was one of its listed supporters. I should not like the position to be misrepresented.

Mrs. Fyfe: I shall leave it to the members of the SNP, all three of them, to work out whether they should have been here for this debate.

We wholeheartedly support the Bill. I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall), who had the idea originally. Hon. Members will recall that when he raised the issue the Government claimed that they could not find time for it because of the time taken by the Bill on Maastricht. There followed such an uproar in Scotland that the Government were forced to change their mind. Instead of having the generosity to support the Bill of my hon. Friend the Member for Dumbarton, I am sorry to say that they chose to bring in a Bill of their own and place it in the hands of the hon. Member for Ayr. (Mr. Gallie). Nevertheless, I welcome the hon. Gentleman's action.

The Bill matters a great deal to people in our communities. It arises from our people's anger and sorrow at the lives that have been thrown away. We are determined to get to grips with this evil in our society. No one should have to walk the streets of our cities in fear and it is appalling that young and otherwise law-abiding men start to think about carrying weapons in case someone, perhaps crazed by drink or drugs, attacks them for no reason. As the hon. Member for Ayr said, women feel especially vulnerable to attack and will greatly welcome this move to increase their safety on the streets and at home. Many people are vulnerable in many ways, especially the elderly and those who, because of racial or other prejudice, feel under particular threat.

An alarming number of the knives that were handed to Strathclyde police during its recent amnesty initiative and the knife produced in the Chamber a few weeks ago by my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Shettleston (Mr. Marshall) are vicious instruments of death and no one could pretend otherwise. It would be foolish for society to permit the carrying of such weapons and to render our police unable to take appropriate action to secure the safety of the public. I do not think that Maryhill police are entirely likely to believe some Ned walking along the street with a collection of knives who says, "Actually, officer, I am on my way to cook up a cordon bleu meal." Such a story might be more readily believable if it were told by some other member of society.

Conservative Members are aware that although we support the Bill we retain some worries. We all know that a 3-inch blade can kill, as any incident and emergency department in our hospitals will testify. I am sorry that the hon. and learned Member for Perth and Kinross (Sir N. Fairbairn) is not in his place. He may feel that the law as it stands is entirely satisfactory, but it is quite obvious to those of us who read in our daily newspapers about vicious attacks by knife-wielding thugs that the law is certainly not adequate to deal with such thugs and deter them from carrying blades. When such Neds can laugh at the law, it is time for society to do something about it.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Lord James Douglas-Hamilton): I am grateful for the opportunity to respond briefly to the debate. Once again, the Scottish National party is conspicuous by its absence. We should have a great deal more respect for SNP Members if they took the trouble to turn up for important debates, especially those on law and order on which there is strong feeling throughout Scotland.

I assure my hon. Friend the Member for Fulham (Mr. Carrington) that the Bill contains a defence provision. Clause 1(4) states:

> "It shall be a defence for a person charged . . . to prove that he had good reason or lawful authority for having the article with him in the public place."

My hon. Friend's good intentions in this matter, as an able cook with great culinary skills, would be respected by all concerned, both south and north of the border. My hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam (Lady Olga Maitland) was correct. There have been no problems with the provisions relating to 3-inch blades so far. We shall monitor the effect of the provisions carefully and, if it is necessary to take further action, we shall take it, but so far there is no evidence that that is so.

My hon. Friends the Members for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) and for Ayr (Mr. Gallie) are right in their reply to my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Perth and Kinross (Sir N. Fairbairn). I have told my hon. and learned Friend that he is a brilliant man, but he is not always right. Nowhere is that more clear than in his assertions in relation to the Bill. The weakness in his argument, which he put only an hour ago, is that a knife is not necessarily classed as an offensive weapon under the provisions of section 1(4) of the Prevention of Crime Act 1953. For a knife to be classed as an offensive weapon, the prosecution must first prove that the person intended to use it to cause personal injury. If the prosecution cannot prove the intent to cause injury, a knife is not an offensive weapon, so the 1953 Act is not relevant and is insufficient to deal with the problem that is facing the nation. Under the Bill, it would not be necessary to prove intent. Actual possession would be sufficient and that would be a deterrent.

I agree that there is a growing tide of violence and that we need to take strong action to confront and deal with it. Violent crime is all too common today. It disfigures the lives not only of the victims and their families but of the wider community. People change their way of life in response to concern about violent crimes. They fortify their homes, they go out less frequently, they try not to travel alone and they avoid secluded places.

Law-abiding citizens should not have to live in such fear or to consider taking such precautions. They should be able to live their lives in safety and security. That is why we place the maintenance of law and order among our highest and most important objectives. It is why we will continue to ensure that the police and the courts have the powers and the resources to tackle crime, particularly violent crime, and to protect law-abiding citizens.

Since 1979 police numbers have increased by 1,100 officers. Over £500 million a year is spent on policing in Scotland. That represents a massive investment in law and order and reflects our full support for the police.

Despite that, it is sadly true that the number of homicides and the number of attempted murders have been rising. In Strathclyde the number of homicides rose from 55 in 1991 to 92 in 1992, while the number of attempted murders rose from 126 to 201 over the same period.

Knives figured prominently in these assaults: they were used, for example, in over half of last year's homicide cases in Strathclyde. I commend Strathclyde police for their initiative in launching Operation Blade. I also welcome the support given to the "Bin a knife" campaign by STV and other sections of the Scottish media. That touches on what my hon. Friend the Member for Ayr said about the modern equivalent of the stocks. What television portrays is extremely important in that connection.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): I apologise to the House for not having been here for all the debate, but I have been engaged in a series of interviews concerning the circumstances surrounding the death of four very young children in my constituency yesterday. Will the Minister confirm that new guidelines will be issued to both the police forces and the police college concerning the powers given to the police? What kind of publicity exercise will be initiated by this most welcome Bill?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Guidelines and training of the police will be revised to take account of the new measures that we are introducing and the police will receive the fullest possible training. I hope very much that what we decide today will be taken full note of by the media in Scotland.

For our part, the Government have come to the view that the powers of the police and the courts need to be strengthened in relation to the prevention of indiscriminate knife carrying. We promised in the Conservative party manifesto to "tackle the scourge of the indiscriminate use of knives to wound and kill on our streets."

We gave a commitment to "create a new offence to make it unlawful for anyone to have in a public place any article with a blade or a sharp point."

There will, of course, be an exception for my hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North wearing his skean dhu when he puts on highland dress.

The key feature of the Bill is to make it an offence to carry a knife or any other article with a blade or sharp point without good reason or lawful authority. There would be no need for the prosecution to prove, first, that the person involved intended to use the knife. It would simply need to prove that the person had the knife in a public place. It would then be for the person concerned to prove that he had lawful authority. The Bill will enable the police and the courts to deal with an enormous number of people who carry knives before those knives are used to damage or end innocent lives.

I will say a few words about the penalties that are proposed. When the Bill was introduced, the maximum penalty available on summary conviction was specified as a fine not exceeding level 3 on the standard scale—that is £1,000. However, when the Second Scottish Standing Committee scrutinised the Bill, it was clear that the Committee considered that, in the light of great and entirely legitimate public concern, the Bill should specify the same penalties as those contained in the 1953 Act—in other words, to provide for a maximum penalty of imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months or a fine not exceeding the statutory maximum, or both. The Government share the Committee's concern that the new offence and the consequent powers of the police should be available at the earliest opportunity. In all cases, the onus of proof will lie with the knife carrier.

Against the background of rising public concern about violent crime, I believe that the Bill will serve an invaluable purpose. It will prove to be a useful and effective extension to the range of powers that are available to the police and the courts. It meets the terms of the Conservative party's manifesto commitment. I am sure that it will help authorities to act in a preventive manner to reduce the number of assaults taking place on our streets. I welcome the Opposition's support for the Bill and I strongly commend the measure to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed.

Newly Qualified Drivers Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

1.38 pm

Mr. Simon Burns (Chelmsford): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

It gives me great pleasure to move the Second Reading of a Bill which started life as a ten-minute Bill; the vagaries of the parliamentary timetable have made it possible. I accept and understand that it would be unfair and unrealistic of me to expect the Bill to be given a Second Reading today. That is because we have only 40 minutes to debate an important and complicated issue. As several hon. Members wish to make known their views and to submit possible improvements, it would not be right to expect such a measure to be rushed through the House.

I appreciate that the Department of Transport is studying carefully ways of improving road safety. I suspect that the Bill may be a few months premature. None the less, I hope that it will open up a discussion that will help the Department in its deliberations.

I must offer an apology to the House, especially to my hon. Friend the Minister. I regret that I shall have to leave the House early because I need to get to Chelmsford for an important engagement. As I am driving, I want to get out of London ahead of the rush hour traffic so as not to miss some appointments that have had to be postponed to enable me to be in the House this morning.

I have introduced the Bill against the backdrop of a relentless campaign by the Government and motoring organisations to make driving and our roads safer and to reduce deaths and injuries on our roads. Yesterday, the Department of Transport published figures showing that the number of road deaths had fallen, once again, to 4,273. Of course, that figure is far too high, but it is a remarkable improvement on the figure in the mid-1960s, when it was almost double that. During the past few years, there has been an inexorable reduction in the number of deaths, and that has been due to the Department's activities. The figure announced yesterday was the lowest since 1926, yet there are now 14 times more vehicles on our roads. I congratulate successive Ministers on their devotion to and success with campaigns——

Mr. Michael Stern (Bristol, North-West): My hon. Friend is falling into the trap of having been in this place too long. Surely, the principal credit for the reduction in driving accidents should go to the motorists.

Mr. Burns: My hon. Friend is right in that it is up to motorists to be sensible and careful and to avoid accidents. However, it would be churlish to take away from Ministers and motoring organisations the credit for the way in which, with single-minded dedication, they have concentrated on the issue and sought not only to highlight the problems facing motorists as the drive, but to use campaigns to target specific areas such as drink-driving. Without that, I suspect that the figures announced yesterday would not have been so low.

The purpose of my modest Bill is to contribute to making roads safer and drivers better equipped and more confident when driving. As I have said during previous debates on this matter, during the past 25 years there has been a revolution in motoring. Improved living standards have ensured far wider car ownership. Instead of the norm being one car per family, it is now more likely that two cars or even more are owned by members of one family. Advances in technology, design and engine power have made cars far more sophisticated and powerful.

More than 29 million people have licences to drive cars. In 1988, 1·39 million people passed their driving tests, of whom 73 per cent. were aged between 17 and 25, 21 per cent. between 26 and 40 and 5 per cent. between 41 and 60. Surprisingly—indeed, staggeringly—0·3 per cent. were over 60. That intrigues me. As I shall explain later, newly qualified drivers do not necessarily mean young drivers.

I am an Essex man, in that I have the honour to represent an Essex constituency. I am pleased to see here today my hon. Friend the Minister for Transport in London, who is an Essex man, as are my hon. Friends the Members for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. Pickles) and for Colchester, North (Mr. Jenkin). They may feel some affinity with a small article in the Daily Mail today, entitled "Essex girl, 83". The article said:

"A woman of 83 who sparked a major search when she vanished from her old people's flat"— in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Brentwood and Ongar—

". . . in nightclothes was found two hours later—in bed with an elderly man next door."

I accept that that has nothing to do with motoring, but if elderly Essex girls have such enterprise at the age of 83, who knows how many other enterprising Essex men and women will want to learn to drive and pass their driving tests at the age of 83? My Bill would apply to them no less than it would to youngsters of 17 to 25.

Mr. Eric Pickles (Brentwood and Ongar): This matter is of deep concern to my constituents. The case that my hon. Friend mentioned is by no means exceptional behaviour for the people of Brentwood and Ongar. Indeed, it would be a matter for national comment if my constituents in their 80s were not to show that degree of vivacity and joy of life.

Mr. Burns: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, who is the epitome of a fun-loving Essex man.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (Colchester, North): I congratulate my hon. Friend on the diligence with which he is presenting his Bill. Does he think that the lady in the aforementioned article—an Essex girl, as he rightly called her—could have been on the hormone replacement therapy recommended by my hon. Friend the Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman)?

Mr. Burns: It seems to me that the Essex girl to whom I referred is in no need of hormone replacement therapy —but if problems were to arise, she will know doubt know to contact my hon. Friend the Member for Billericay, who I am sure would be more than happy to give her plenty of advice, to ensure many more years of joyful fun.

On a more serious note, the statistics that I gave before we were diverted by Essex girl made it abundantly clear that the majority of newly qualified drivers are aged between 17 and 25. The casualty figures for 1991 highlight another serious problem. In that year, drivers aged between 16 and 19 who were killed accounted for 4·6 per 100,000 of the population. The figure for those aged between 20 and 29 were almost unacceptably high, at 4·5 per 100,000. For age groups above that, the figure fell dramatically, to an average 2.2 per 100,000.

Those statistics are reinforced by a recent study by the Transport Research Laboratory of the Department of Transport on the attitudes, opinions and development of skills among novice drivers in the first two years after passing their test. It showed that 28 per cent. of respondents had been involved in at least one accident as a driver. Twenty-five per cent. of those had been driving for only 12 months, 27 per cent. for 18 months, and 35 per cent. for 24 months.

[Mr. Burns]

Thirty-three per cent. of those involved in an accident had been involved in an injury accident. From their own estimations, 34 per cent. of those drivers felt it likely that they would be at least partly to blame if they were to have an accident as a driver during the first 12 months of their driving careers.

The report also highlighted the fact that those who had been driving for two years had higher scores on confidence in decision making than those who had been driving for a shorter period. That group also reported more frequently failing to notice a pedestrian waiting at a crossing, failing to use their mirrors when they should, misjudging, trying to beat other drivers on a getaway from traffic lights or in other stationary situations and taking other action that they knew might be dangerous.

Interestingly, the report showed that the proportion of new drivers involved in an accident between 18 and 24 months after passing a test was greater than the proportion involved between 12 and 18 months after passing one. Those statistics prove that there is a serious problem in respect of newly qualified drivers and road safety.

My Bill introduces measures to improve road safety for not only newly qualified drivers but other drivers and innocent pedestrians. The problem partly emanates from the fact that inexperienced drivers, as soon as they pass their test, are given the same privileges and rights as drivers who passed their tests more than 20 years ago and who have since gained experience and maturity. To my mind, that must be rectified.

My Bill aims at bringing greater safety and protection to newly qualified drivers and to others who share the roads with them. As I have said before, newly qualified drivers are not exclusively under the age of 25. They can be any age, through to the ages to which I referred earlier.

Clause 1(4) would make it law that a condition of granting a full licence would be that for two years after the passing of that test, the newly qualified driver would have to display a sign on his car noting that he was a newly qualified driver, in the same way as learner drivers have to display an L-plate before they pass their driving test. The type of display to be used would be left to the Secretary of State, but it is obvious that it should be something like "P" for provisional or, if one did not like that, perhaps "R" for restricted. We may quibble over the letter of the alphabet, but that would be the principle. Power would be given to the Secretary of State, who, after consultation, would come up with the right letter. My choice would be "P" for probationer.

P-plates for probationers would be a constant reminder to newly qualified drivers that they are newly qualified, that they do not know it all and that they do not have the experience of other drivers. It would also serve the useful function of drawing the attention of other drivers to the fact that they are in the vicinity of a newly qualified driver. They could then be more considerate and take more care with their driving.

It is interesting to note that the Transport Research Laboratory report shows that more than half the respondents felt that to require newly qualified drivers to display a special plate to let others know that they were inexperienced would prevent a great many accidents. Some may say that such a proposal is unenforceable, I do not share that view. I suspect that when L-plates were introduced for learner drivers, many people said that the proposal was unenforceable. Experience since then seems to be that the system works well.

Clause 2(1) would make it an offence for newly qualified drivers not to display their P-plate or their R-plate for the first two years after passing the driving test. Failure to do so would contravene the Road Traffic Offenders Act 1988. The maximum penalty on conviction would be at level 3 on the standard scale, which is a maximum fine of up to £1,000—the same penalty as is currently imposed on those who are convicted of failing to display a L-plate if they are learner drivers.

Clause 1(5) would amend the Road Traffic Act 1988. Any newly qualified driver would, for the first 24 months after passing his or her test, have to drive a vehicle of no more than 1300 cc.

Mr. Pickles: Can I ask my hon. Friend for his advice on engine size? Mine is a rural constituency. My constituents use large vehicles, such as Land-Rovers and diesel cars. A sensible choice for a young person who had just passed his driving test would be a diesel car. The Bill would discourage the use of a sensible form of transport. There has been a great increase in car ownership, but many families have only one whose engine size is usually greater than 1300 cc. The Bill would mean that newly qualified drivers would be unable to drive the family car and obtain the experience that my hon. Friend wants them to obtain. Therefore, two years after passing their test, precisely the problem that my hon. Friend has identified would arise.

Mr. Burns: I am extremely grateful to my hon. Friend. With his usual perspicacity, he has anticipated my next point. I accept that this is the most controversial and potentially the most difficult part of the Bill. I hear what my hon. Friend says, but it is important not to lose sight of the fact that the purpose of the Bill is to improve road safety. One could find exceptions to, or plead a special case for, many of the measures that we pass. I believe that 1300 cc represents a respectable level of engine size for it not to become a major problem for the majority of families. Nevertheless, I accept that it may cause some problems for some families. One could argue that a one-car family might have only a series 7 BMW. It would be slightly odd to allow a 17-year-old to drive a series 7 BMW which belongs to his or her mother or father.

In theory, 17-year-olds could pass the driving test on their birthday and leave the test centre in a Porsche, a series 7 BMW or some other high-performance car. If they got into difficulties, they would not have the experience, maturity or capability to handle the car in the same way as a more experienced driver and avoid an accident—possibly a fatal accident.

Mr. Jenkin: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Burns: No, I have little time. I accept that it is a difficult position. If the Bill were to reach the Committee stage, the matter would have to be examined carefully because one does not want to be ludicrous and over-extend the law. One must give serious thought to how newly qualified drivers can cope with road safety, which is a primary concern to everyone. New section 102A(2) specifies that those who are restricted to driving cars not exceeding 1300 cc would have that specified on their driving licence to help with the enforcement of that provision.

As hon. Members will have noticed from reading my Bill carefully, no penalties are specified in clause 2 for an offence that is committed. The reason for that is deliberate. To get it right, we must not make the law look an ass. We must produce a law that is enforceable and rational. At this stage, it would be preferable for a Committee to consider how we can get it right with the most realistic proposal and the most realistic penalties for those who contravene the law.

I accept that the Bill will not get on the statute book because it comes much too late in the parliamentary timetable. However, if it raises awareness of the problems facing newly qualified drivers, if it goes some way towards improving road safety in the United Kingdom and if it raises a serious debate about road safety and provokes discussion of ways to improve the safety of newly qualified drivers, others on our roads and innocent pedestrians, who may be seriously affected through injury or death, it will be worth while.

As I said earlier, the Minister's Department is carrying out an ongoing study of ways further to improve road safety and the position of newly qualified drivers. All hon. Members must welcome the Department's work. We await publication of the Minister's White Paper and ideas which can be put out to consultation and, if necessary, result in legislation.

My Bill is a step in the right direction. It will bring more maturity and the opportunity for newly qualified drivers to gain experience on the roads. It will give more protection to other drivers and pedestrians and make people think more about how to make our roads safer for everyone. I commend the Bill to the House.

1.58 pm

Mr. Matthew Carrington (Fulham): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Chelmsford (Mr. Burns). It is a remarkable feat to get this Bill from a 10-minute rule Bill through to Second Reading. It is such a remarkable feat that it is hard to remember any other instances in which such a progression of events succeeded. My hon. Friend the Minister has achieved the same remarkable distinction, and I congratulate him on that.

The Bill is to be highly commended. It has the most remarkably worthwhile objective of improving road safety. That is an objective to which all Members of Parliament dedicate many hours of their working lives. Although fewer people are killed on the roads now, the roads in Britain are still far too unsafe and we need to do more to make them safer.

One of the great problems of road safety is undoubtedly the difficulty of other drivers in identifying motorists who are not fully in control of their motor car, so it is right that my hon. Friend has introduced a Bill which would enable an inexperienced driver to be readily identified by other road users and avoided or given enough room. Other drivers would know not to anticipate that such drivers could cope in the difficult situations which can arise on the road.

Mr. Stern: My hon. Friend is rather more complimentary than I might be about the driving standards of drivers who come across a newly qualified or learner driver. Without wishing to poor-mouth my driving standards any more than my family would consider necessary, I am not sure that my reaction when confronted by a learner driver is to make things easier for him. My reaction, which I am told is not abnormal, is to get away as fast as possible, if necessary by accelerating as fast as possible past that driver. Does that necessarily contribute to road safety?

Mr. Carrington: I am sorry to hear that intervention from my hon. Friend. He must be unusual. But I know him well and I imagine that his comments are driven—if that is the right word—by modesty. I know him to be a kind and courteous man. For all that he might not want to get too close to less experienced drivers on the road, I am sure that he would get past in such a way as to ensure that their progression down the road was safe and easy for them so that they could learn. I am sure that my hon. Friend does himself less than justice.

The Bill is an extension of the principle that has been observed since the 1930s that a learner driver should display an L-plate. My hon. Friend's Bill is a natural progression from that. I suggest that we could equally benefit from other classes of road users and drivers being required to display a sign showing what they were.

We have just been hearing about road hogs, not that I suggest that my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, North-west (Mr. Stern) is a road hog. People who had been convicted of being road hogs or unsafe drivers should perhaps also display something on their car. People convicted of drink driving who had just got their licence back could also be required to display something on their cars. The principle could be extended to all sorts of groups.

Lady Olga Maitland (Sutton and Cheam): Is my hon. Friend aware that the concept of a restricted driving licence or plate is not novel to the British Isles? Northern Ireland has them. An R-plate restricts a driver in speed and other matters. I hope that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary will say how effective the scheme has been in the Province.

Mr. Carrington: My hon. Friend raises an interesting point. She is right. We have other plates in this country. For example, the diplomatic corps, who are a noble and trustworthy body of people, display a D in the middle of their number plate. Any other drivers using the road know full well to steer clear of a car with a diplomatic number plate because if they have an accident with it their rights as citizens of this country will be severely reduced.

It is a well-established principle that certain classes of road user must identify their presence for the safety of other road users. One could wish to bring a number of other groups into such a category, to the point where most road users would have to display a sign on their car identifying themselves for the benefit of others.

I have to tell my hon. Friend the Member for Chelmsford that I have one or two worries about the Bill, some of which were mentioned by our hon. Friend the Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. Pickles). He mentioned people who need cars with engines above a certain size. Cars that have a larger engine size may be inherently safer than those with small engines. One thinks, for instance, of the three-wheeled vehicles, which have small engines——

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): What has the hon. Gentleman got against Reliant Robins?

Mr. Carrington: I have nothing against them at all. A Reliant Robin requires skill and understanding to drive. It is the sort of car to which people should aspire once their driving skills are such that they can cope with the challenge. The Bill should provide that only experienced drivers should aspire to driving such cars.

The other problem is that a foreigner—I am thinking particularly of someone from the United States of America—who intends to live here permanently and wishes to drive on the roads must pass an English driving test. He or she may be an extremely experienced motorist, but the moment they took their test they would have to display a "P" on their car and may have to buy a car with a smaller engine.

Mr. Burns: Does my hon. Friend accept that the vast majority of foreign drivers will not have experience of driving on the left hand side of the road? However experienced they are at handling a car, they may experience great difficulty in getting used to driving on the left hand side, with the associated problems of turning at crossroads and using roundabouts.

Mr. Carrington: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. I look forward to discussing that in Committee and I hope that my hon. Friend's pessimism about the likelihood of the Bill going into Committee is ill-founded. We must debate such issues.

Does it take two years to learn to drive on the right or left hand side of the road? Should a British motorist be allowed to drive in France without displaying a sign on their car?

Mr. Burns: They have to display a "GB" sticker.

Mr. Carrington: Even before the Maastricht Bill, once we joined the European Community motorists no longer had to display those stickers.

The Minister for Transport in London (Mr. Steve Norris): If I recall correctly, my hon. Friend's dear lady wife has been through precisely this experience.

Mr. Carrington: Indeed. My hon. Friend is absolutely right. My wife is American and she went through that great trauma. As hon. Members can imagine, marrying me was a trauma, but it was made worse by the fact that, having been a driver for 20 years, she had to pass another driving test.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley): Does my hon. Friend agree that when our European neighbours come to this country, their cars have foreign plates which enable us to work out whether the driver is from Germany, from France or from Italy? We normally give such cars leeway simply because we see the foreign plates and because of the problems already mentioned.

Mr. Carrington: That is right. The Bill proposes nothing revolutionary. It is an extension of the fact that we identify cars by looking for signs such as whether the steering wheel is on the right or the left, whether the driver is smoking a pipe—or wearing a sharp suit, to pick up a point made in an earlier debate. We look for signs of potential problems.

I strongly recommend the Bill to the House, but I make one suggestion for improvement. My hon. Friend the Member for Chelmsford said that he felt that the right sign to have on the back or front of a car, where the L-plate now is, would be a P-plate. I can see the argument for having letters and we can discuss in Committee whether to have P, S or some other letter, such as D for danger.

I suggest that it would be more appropriate to have not a letter, but a picture which would make the whole process more flexible. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Chelmsford will realise the merit of what I am saying. Someone who has been disqualified for drink-driving and who gets his licence back could, for the next three, five or 10 years, display the sign of a foaming tankard on the back of his car, which might be a considerable discouragement. Similarly, a driver who had had a road accident could display a sign of a crash which might also be a considerable discouragement. One could extend the principle to those whose cars had been clamped or to those who had not paid parking fines. The potential is enormous and I hope that my suggestion will be considered.

Mr. Harry Cohen (Leyton): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that as the Chancellor of the Exchequer has just put up taxes on petrol, a suitable picture for him would be of a hand in somebody else's pocket?

Mr. Carrington: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is making a serious point. His comment is extraordinary in that he is, I know, absolutely dedicated to preserving our environment and to stopping the misuse of carbon energy resources which is so dangerous in terms of global warming. Far from wishing the Chancellor to carry a sign which, I am sure from the description, would be for the purposes of vilification, the hon. Gentleman should wish the Chancellor to be identified as somebody who has contributed significantly to saving our planet. I am sure that my hon. Friends join me in that wish.

I am straying a long way from the Bill and I am sure that you will call me to order before long, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I shall now make a point that will be vital for the whole process. At present, L-plates have to be tied on to cars with bits of string or stuck on with Sellotape which destroys the finish. Under the Bill, we should make it a condition that all motor cars are designed to have a card holder on the front and the back so that, as the motorist progresses, the appropriate sign can be inserted to demonstrate the stage of his or her development as a motorist. That is another matter to be discussed in Committee. I look forward to the debates in Committee, which will be important for road safety. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Chelmsford and I wish the Bill well.

2.13 pm

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (Colchester, North): It is always a pleasure to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Fulham (Mr. Carrington), who developed a number of important arguments. My hon. Friend said that the Bill might require the modification of motor vehicles at the point of manufacture to allow a plate to be displayed on the vehicle as required. Unfortunately, I believe that such action may be beyond the Bill's scope. It would also require European legislation, as national legislation for the approval of changes to the manufacture of motor vehicles is governed by, and falls under the exclusive competence of, European law. Therefore, we would be unable to legislate on that.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) on presenting his Bill so ably. The principle of the legislation has an entirely laudable aim. New, upstart young Members of Parliament like myself are allowed, on their first outing, a maiden speech, during which other hon. Members are advised by the Chair or convention to avoid running into them or upsetting them. They give us a wide berth so that we can complete the process without damaging or injuring anyone.

I have a number of concerns about the Bill. My hon. Friend the Member for Chelmsford made it absolutely clear that the issue of the plate would be one for the Committee or the Secretary of State if the Bill becomes law. However, the use of the letter "P" could be open to misinterpretation, particularly if we move to a system such as that recommended by my hon. Friend the Member for Fulham, in which "P" could be seen to stand for a poor or pathetic driver.

I believe that "N" for novice would be a more appropriate plate. The "N" could stand for new, novice or "newly qualified" to reflect the Bill's title. If the system is expanded, my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, North-West (Mr. Stern) might have an "A" on his plate to stand for aggressive driver—if that is not being unfair to him. I note that he is nodding. We might have "C" for careless or "E" for expert—we could develop the concept of driver labelling to inform others in a variety of ways. The letter "A" for aggressive is attractive as it is a reversible letter. The driver of a car in front could read it in his mirror to give him an idea of the sort of person driving behind, not just in front.

Lady Olga Maitland (Sutton and Cheam): Does my hon. Friend agree that all the discussions about putting plates on cars are somewhat beside the point? We should really be discussing the introduction of a suitable restriction such as 45 mph speed limit, or—as in New Zealand—a ban on carrying passengers so that teenagers do not show off, or not allowing driving at night. We should be considering elements to discipline newly qualified car drivers.

Mr. Jenkin: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's intervention, which leads me to the next part of the Bill: the restriction on engine size—the only restriction currently proposed in the Bill—about which I am anxious. I used to work in the motor industry for the Ford motor company. I did so when the then Chancellor of the Exchequer introduced restrictions on engine size relating to the taxation of company cars. It caused great distortion in the car market and it was a relief to the motor industry when the restrictions were altered so that the engine size restriction no longer applied.

When the restrictions on engine size applied, some privately owned car fleets—not those of my employer—adopted a system called badge engineering. The fleet manager, more than anyone else, used to indulge in the process and ensure that the badge on the back of his car suggested that the car's engine was below 1800cc—other documentation might also lend weight to that suggestion. The car driver would know that he was driving a car with a larger engine and would not want the taxation authorities or his boss to know that he had a better car than the boss.

This leads to the problem of the enforceability of engine sizes. It might be impossible for the police to know whether a car had an engine bigger than 1300cc. I recall using my father's car many years ago. Its engine was considerably larger than 1300cc, although it was not a BMW 735—hon. Members will know the sort of salary my father had to live on. [Laughter.] Nevertheless, because it was my father's car, I took great care of it. I was far less likely to damage it than I would have been had I driven a cheap banger of my own with a small engine. So restricting engine size might not achieve the intended result.

Mr. Nigel Evans: Does my hon. Friend remember that a Reliant Robin was caught speeding at well over 70 mph? The owner had souped up the engine. Robins present challenge enough to drive and they must be somewhat worse with souped-up engines.

Mr. Jenkin: I remember the newspaper stories about that. It amply demonstrates some of the difficulties that might be involved in applying this restriction to newly qualified drivers.

I emphasise that this measure has great merits which deserve serious debate. I hope that all hon. Members who want to speak on Second Reading will have the time to do so. I end with a few remarks about foreign drivers. We can see from the signs on the back of their cars that they are foreign—and clearly inferior drivers. We know from watching foreign buses manoeuvring round Hyde Park what a risky business that can be, so the principle behind the Bill has a proven track record and I hope that the House will continue to give it lengthy and sober consideration.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley): I am glad that my hon. Friend the Member for Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) has introduced the Bill. The intention behind it is right: to reduce the number of accidents on our roads and to reduce the numbers of people killed, maimed or injured on them.

My hon. Friend the Member for Chelmsford said that a great many 60 and 80-year-old people are learning to drive these days, but I want to talk about the number of accidents caused by younger people.

The idea of putting a letter or symbol on the back of a car to identify a newly qualified driver is right. My hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam (Lady Olga Maitland) said that people in Northern Ireland in this category have to display an R plate. It has proved extremely successful.

Mr. Peter Bottomley (Eltham): Common sense might suggest that, but no research that I have been able to find shows that it makes the slightest bit of difference. The problem has been properly identified, but the solution to it has not—certainly not by this simple method.

Mr. Evans: Research has shown that the number of accidents caused by young, learner or newly qualified drivers in Northern Ireland has fallen significantly.

[Mr. Evans]

In this country people are not obliged to carry their driving licence with them. How long a person has been driving can be determined by the licence. If such a person is stopped and asked to produce his licence within three days at a police station, there is nothing to prevent him from giving the wrong name and address to the police officer and asking somebody else to furnish a licence to a police station that is many miles from the scene of the incident. It would be difficult to enforce the measure, although it opens wide the door to the introduction of identity cards, a measure which I favour for reasons other than enforcing the proposed legislation.

It is rather anomalous that a newly qualified driver is allowed to build up 12 points in the same way as someone who has been driving for 20 years. A newly qualified driver should initially have a lower points limit, perhaps four, so that if he causes an accident or breaks the law in some other way he can lose his licence far earlier and have to retake the test. That would be better than being allowed three or four accidents before the licence is removed.

Education should also be more widely used to warn of the dangers of speed on the roads. The advertising industry has much to answer for. Some vehicles are advertised in a way that will attract people who wish to drive fast cars. Time and again, the fast car is presented as the vehicle for virile young men to prove their masculinity on the roads. That is wrong and other drivers are placed in danger by the emphasis on such cars.

Education in the home is also important. My hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, North-West (Mr. Stern) said that members of his family comment on the quality of his driving. It has been proved that competent drivers—I am sure that that describes my hon. Friend—influence members of their families who are learning to drive. People tend to imitate some of the habits of their parents on the roads. Parental persuasion is therefore important.

Mr. Stern: The picture conjured up by my hon. Friend is mind-boggling. On the principle that he advocates, if my daughter emulates her parents while being driven by them she will look around the car for another back-seat driver.

Mr. Evans: I am sure that many people suffer from a similar problem. More discussion is needed of the measures that are necessary to reduce the number of incidents and accidents on our roads.

2.27 pm

Lady Olga Maitland (Sutton and Cheam): I welcome the Bill because the time has come to take a much more disciplined approach to newly qualified drivers. We should seek examples in Northern Ireland and overseas. For instance, Germany applies strict rules under which the licence of a first offender is taken away and he has to resit the driving test. The authorities in Australia are extremely tough on young drivers. That is right because most offences are caused by teenage boy racers and the time has come to stop them racing and showing off. If we can clip their wings we shall do a great service for mankind because fatalities in the 16 to 19 age group is disproportionate to all other age groups. I hope that the Bill receives a fair wind, if not today on another occasion. Perhaps it can be reintroduced later. The time has come to take a firm grip. What do we mean by allowing newly qualified drivers on the roads without any supervision or restriction?

2.29 pm

Mr. Michael Stern (Bristol, North-West): I intend to be brief. Given the time, I will be brief. However, I wish to make two points. The first, which has not yet been made, concerns the showing of signs on the vehicle. I do not know whether my hon. Friend the Member for Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) gets as confused as I do by the multiplicity of signs on the backs of cars. I am a little worried, and he will have to be careful about how the Bill defines the regulations——

It being half-past Two o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): Debate to be resumed what day? No day named.

Points of Order

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. My point of order is about the availability of papers for Monday's debate on coal. You will recall that yesterday, as reported at columns 1233 and 1234 of Hansard, the President of the Board of Trade referred to the French interconnector.

Following those exchanges, I asked the Library whether I could be provided with a copy of that agreement. I have been advised by the Library that the agreement consists of the original protocol, which was signed in 1981, and subsequent commercial agreements. None of the commercial agreements is in the public domain. The original protocol has never been made public either, although part of one of the articles was quoted in a recent report from the Select Committee on Trade and Industry.

The report of the Committee, which was published on Wednesday 2 December 1992, contained a quotation from article 14 of the protocol. The White Paper that is the subject of Monday's debate makes numerous references to the French interconnector between pages 55 and 58, as well as references to the protocol. The report of the Select Committee is of considerable importance in the context of Monday's debate, and it makes extensive comments also on the protocol and the subsequent agreement.

Bearing in mind the vital interest in the French interconnector, the agreement and the protocol, which have never been made available or published, and bearing in mind also the direct quotations in the report of the Select Committee on Trade and Industry, I urge you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and perhaps Madam Speaker, to reflect on whether the protocol and all the subsequent agreements relating to the French interconnector should be made available in time for Monday's debate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): I am sure that the hon. Member realises that the occupants of the Treasury Bench will have heard his point of order. Presumably they will act accordingly.

Mr. Harry Cohen (Leyton): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. My hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) has raised a most important matter. I heard what you said, Mr. Deputy Speaker, about my hon. Friend's point of order being heard by those on the Treasury Bench, but there is a ruling that if documents are referred to on the Floor of the House they should be provided subsequently. They certainly should be provided for the debate on Monday. There is a great deal of political capital——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That rule applies only when there is a direct quotation from a state paper.

London Taxis

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Arbuthnot.]

2.36 pm

Mr. Vivian Bendall (Ilford, North): First, I declare an interest; I represent the London Taxi Drivers Association. My representation is listed in the Register of Members' Interests. In this instance, however, I am not representing only the association. I believe that I shall be speaking for the vast majority of black-cab drivers in London. Therefore, this is a significant debate.

I initiated the debate because of the speculation that has recently appeared in much of the national press and the London evening press. I refer especially to an article that appeared on 2 March in the Evening Standard, which said:

"Mr. Norris has now decided to impose the same minicab regulations in London as the rest of the country."

That is causing great concern and distress to most of the black-cab drivers in London, who now number about 20,000.

I am sorry that I have had to bring my hon. Friend the Minister into the Chamber on a Friday afternoon; I appreciate the onerous duties of a Minister. However, given the distress that has been caused to London taxi drivers, I felt that it was necessary to bring the matter to the attention of the House.

I begin by referring to a report from the Department of Transport working party on the safety of users of taxis and minicabs in London, which was published in July 1992. Paragraph 23 states:

"If the Government were minded to propose a two-tier system of licensing in London, we believe that it should first look hard at the provincial system and any difficulties being experienced there."

That is the crux of the matter. When we consider what is being experienced in Birmingham and other parts of the midlands, it is clear that many problems are being caused by the 1976 legislation. It was interesting to note that Tony Cross, a trading standards officer in Birmingham, recently said that he believed tht the only real way to work in the provinces was to have a one-tier system.

There is fear that my hon. Friend the Minister will begin to introduce a two-tier system for the licensing of black and minicabs in London. That would be a slippery slope. It would give minicabs an air of respectability that they have not had previously. Everything comes down to what the driver of a licensed black cab has to do. Many people do not understand that he has to put in an immense amount of effort to obtain a green or yellow badge, and in particular the green badge. He has to do the knowledge for two years. Then, once he has acquired his vehicle, it has to be inspected twice a year.

If the minicab is to be licensed and given that air of respectability, there will be not a level playing field, but a two-tier system, and slowly but surely we shall see the decline of the black cab. I shall explain how that will occur as a I develop my argument.

My second point, which is of paramount importance, is that one of the major problems in London, as elsewhere, is illegal touting by minicab drivers. Although that is illegal, there are only five enforcement officers in London, so touting continues unabated and unchecked. If the minicab driver is given a licence, and the air of respectability that goes with that, people will be even more confused.

Currently, the police appear unable to stop that plying for hire; nor can they stop the ranking that occurs, for example, outside clubs and theatres. There is continuous touting at large railway stations, especially at weekends. The problem was recently highlighted when the police decided to purge Victoria station, which resulted in a great number of convictions. However, usually there is not sufficient enforcement to prevent that practice.

If we go down the slippery slope of a two-tier licensing system, London will experience the problems currently being experienced in areas such as Birmingham, where there are taxi wars and violent disputes not only between minicab drivers and black-cab drivers, but among the various members of the minicab trade. That will happen in London, but at 100 times the level in the provinces. The 1976 Act has failed for a number of reasons. We need to create a system that will resolve the problems once and for all.

The black cab has been part of London's heritage since the days of the hansom cab. It has successfully competed throughout the century. It is part of the London scene and part of the heritage of this great city. Like the Tower of London, Buckingham palace and Westminster abbey, the black cab is part of the London scene and a great tourist attraction. It is also part of the integrated London transport system. What incentive will there be for black-cab drivers to continue buying a black cab and to do the knowledge? A purpose-built cab costs £24,000. One can easily buy an ordinary new car to use as a minicab for £8,000, or a second-hand vehicle for as little as £3,000 or £4,000. If there is no future for the black cab, that will be a sad day for London and for a trade which has given great service to the capital over many decades.

Another problem results from the evolution of the radio cab, which allows taxis to be booked by telephone —particularly for company contract work. That business might start to die because there would not be fair competition. Black cab fares are set by the Government, but minicabs charge whatever they like. One could soon see the demise of the contract sector, with all the consequences that would follow. If drivers were compelled to move away from radio-circuit work and had to ply for hire on the streets, that would add to the likelihood of cab wars of the kind seen in Birmingham and elsewhere.

The black cab also contributes significantly to helping the disabled, with their ability to accommodate wheelchairs. That facility is not generally available in minicabs. The demise of the black cab would bring problems for the disabled. It has long been Government policy to ensure that the disabled have an opportunity to use black cabs and that every black cab will be able to accommodate wheelcharis by the year 2000.

The provision of that facility has increased the price of the black cab, quite apart from the original cost of developing it. Sir Peter Baldwin of the Disabled Persons Transport Advisory Committee and Ann Fry have done immense work to help the disabled and are very much against the likely consequences of any diminution in the black cab. Dial-a-Ride and Taxicard users are opposed to a two-tier system.

One must consider also the disastrous effect on black-cab production. It is a British-produced vehicle. Given the erosion of our industrial base over the years, it would be sad to see yet another part of it lost. The LTI and Metrocab have worked unceasingly to ensure more success for the black cab. In the past two years, LTI production has fallen 50 per cent. My hon. Friend the Minister may argue that some of that was caused by the recession, but from speaking to black-cab drivers over the past few months, I know that much of it is the result of uncertainty about the future of the trade.

Drivers are not buying new black cabs because of that uncertainty. Half the work force at LTI have been made redundant over the past year and if black-cab production stopped altogether, the rest of the work force would be made redundant—as would large numbers of workers in the black-cab spare parts and service industries.

I appreciate that the Minister faces a great dilemma. I appreciate also the work of the Suzy Lamplugh Trust to improve ladies' safety. The black-cab trade believes that ladies who travel with them must be properly protected. Therefore, it would be disastrous if the black cab trade, as we know it, in London were to come to an end.

Diana Lamplugh and others have rightly pointed out to me that we must also consider the safety of drivers, whether they be minicab drivers or black-cab drivers. Many black-cab drivers have been shot, knifed or viciously attacked. We must, therefore, take account of their safety, too. The black cab provides safety for the driver. If one talks to black-cab drivers, one finds that the panel between driver and passenger is of paramount importance to them.

I urge the Minister to set up a commission to inquire into the problems faced by the black-cab trade and the minicab trade in London. If he did that, we could address immediately the issues relating to ladies' safety, as well as all the other issues. For far too long, we have tampered and tinkered with the problem.

In 1990, I argued during our proceedings on the London Local Government Bill that the black cab should be saved. The report of a working party on the safety of users of taxis and minicabs in London came to no firm conclusion. If the Minister sets up a commission, it should be given clear terms of reference and asked to consider how these problems should be dealt with.

I hope that the Minister will not put the cart before the horse by announcing that he intends to start a two-tier system. I hope that he will announce a full investigation which will satisfy the Suzy Lamplugh Trust and result in taxi drivers and the people of London feeling safe. If he does that, we shall preserve one of our finest trades—a trade which, for many generations, has provided a great service to Londoners.

2.52 pm

The Minister for Transport in London (Mr. Steve Norris): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, North (Mr. Bendall) on his customary assiduity in prosecuting the interests of the licensed trade. I welcome to the debate my hon. Friends the Members for Romford (Sir M. Neubert), for Wanstead and Woodford (Mr. Arbuthnot) and for Battersea (Mr. Bowis), all of whom I know take a close interest in these matters. I see on the Opposition Benches my hon. Friend—for such he is—the Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks), who is my shadow on transport matters, as well as the hon. Member for Lewisham, West (Mr. Dowd).

In 1991, my predecessor, the hon. Member for Derbyshire, West (Mr. McLoughlin), set up a working party, whose terms of reference were "to make recommendations on the framework needed to ensure that users of taxis and minicabs can travel in reasonable safety and security."

[Mr. Steve Norris]

Last July, I received the working party's report. It has been widely circulated and was duly deposited in the Library. Following on from it, I have considered carefully, with the assistance of many interested parties who have spoken or written to me, whether any changes to the structure of the London taxi and minicab trades should be made.

I had intended to make an announcement by the end of last year. For the record, I should say that, in an attempt to do full justice to the complex issues involved, my deliberations, and the work of my officials, have taken me beyond that original time scale. My hon. Friend and other hon. Members will agree that it is important that the solution is the right one and not a superficial answer simply for the sake of speed. I hope that I shall be in a position to make an announcement definitively by the middle of this year. My hon. Friend will appreciate that, having said that, I am not prepared to be drawn at this stage on speculation about my plans, whether in the Evening Standard, the taxi press or anywhere else.

In the meantime, it might be helpful if I set out the current position and described the principal factors that my review has addressed, involving potential solutions that have been put to me. Before I do that, I shall take this opportunity—as we are debating taxis—to make an important point on fares and fees. Taxi fares in London are strictly controlled by the Secretary of State for Transport. They are reviewed annually on the basis of an agreed formula which is in two parts: an average earnings index and a range of costs associated with operating a cab —classically, licence fees, spare parts, fuel and so on. Today, I can announce that all London taxi fares will rise by 20p for each journey from 24 April. That is an average increase of just over 4 per cent. and takes account of the increase in fuel duty in the Budget.

As I said, one element of the fares formula relates to fees paid to the Public Carriage Office for taxi and driver licensing. An increase from £81 to £87 in the fee for a London taxi driver's licence will take effect from 24 April and has, accordingly, been incorporated in the fares increase. Of course, a London taxi driver's licence lasts for three years. There is to be no immediate increase in the fees for licensing taxis.

My hon. Friend will know that the working party to which I referred recommended that regulation should be introduced to cover so-called minicab operations in London, but the diverse nature of the interests represented on the working party meant that it could not agree on what form the controls should take. The taxi trade in London, which is fairly well known for its strength of feeling on most issues, understandably had ideas about the future structure of the trade. Having spoken to many of its representatives, it is clear that they rightly feel a great sense of pride in their trade.

The debate to which my hon. Friend referred was—if my memory serves me—the last time that we debated the licensed trade. In that debate, I joined him in expressing appreciation for the great worth of the licensed trade to our city. I know that hon. Members on both sides of the House recognise that it is part of the attraction which London offers to tourists from around the world who, almost uniquely in London, can approach a taxi in the secure knowledge that they will be taken directly to the place that they wish to go—regardless of whether they have any idea of where it is—that they will be charged a fair fare and that they will be dealt with courteously and with respect. That is a unique advantage and one which I never fail to mention when I get the opportunity, as do hon. Members on both sides of the House. I have made it clear time and again that I have no intention of harming that London taxi trade when I address the problem identified by the working party.

The London Taxi Board has been energetic in promoting the concept of a one-tier licensing system, not least to right hon. and hon. Members of the House. Such a system would require both taxis and minicabs to be subject, essentially, to the same conditions of licensing. The argument is that that would give all users the same protection. After all, taxis and minicabs offer similar services with the widespread use of radio making it sometimes difficult to distinguish between the two.

Those who advocate a single-tier system refer to the safety aspects of taxis as opposed to minicabs. As I said earlier, taxi drivers are subject to stringent checks of their criminal background and medical fitness. They know the geography of London and their vehicles are comfortable and safe. One of the most important factors in favour of the black cab is its capacity to carry a disabled passenger in a wheelchair. Since 1 February 1989, all new taxis licensed to work in London have had a requirement to be wheelchair accessible. The whole fleet will conform to that specification by the year 2000. That is just another way in which transport in London for the disabled sets a standard to be followed in cities all over the world.

The issue of safety in minicabs is a serious and emotive one. We have seen reports in the media of women being assaulted by bogus minicab drivers or driven to an isolated spot, robbed and abandoned. We all know that we must take that issue extremely seriously. We are also all aware and may even have had experience of the touts who stand outside mainline railway stations, theatres and clubs touting improperly for work. They deny that work to the licensed trade, which has invested a great deal of its time and money to acquire the unique right to ply for hire. I am keenly aware of the problem that that represents for the police in enforcing the law. It is worth making that point absolutely clear.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, North will agree, the problem is that the touting law dates back to the days of horse-drawn carriages and makes it almost impossible for a conviction to be obtained without the corroboration of the often reluctant passenger who, after all, often simply wants to get home.

The safety problem is simply stated. Many companies that offer so-called minicab services are well managed and responsibly operated. Many minicab drivers are, of course, decent men. They have clean driving licences, they drive sensibly, they drive vehicles that have passed an MOT test, they are in perfectly good health, they have a perfectly adequate idea of where they are going and the area in which they work and they have no material criminal convictions.

However, unfortunately, while the law makes it an offence not to have a driving licence or to drive a vehicle not in a roadworthy condition, and while, arguably, a detailed topographical knowledge of London is not necessary on many journeys, the one thing that the law cannot guarantee in London, unlike in the rest of the country, is that the driver does not have a serious conviction for an offence that would disqualify him in the eyes of any sensible person from being allowed to take a single, vulnerable person in his car. The Suzy Lamplugh Trust has frequently drawn attention to that and I commend it for its assiduity in so doing. I recall a speech made by Baroness Hollis of Heigham, who speaks for the Opposition in another place. She accurately and movingly described the situation that a vulnerable person may face in the back of such a vehicle.

The availability of taxis and minicabs in London is another important factor in the wider debate. We might have the best taxi service in the world, but it is not always easy to get a taxi. Hon. Members can go outside to a particularly attractive spot at the Members' Entrance where we can attract a taxi at most times of the day and night. My hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, North and I represent adjacent and similar constituencies. In those parts of London, as, indeed, in many suburban areas, taxis are in short supply or in practice do not exist at all. It is in serving suburban passengers that the informal so-called minicab arrangement has come into its own. Offices outside railway and tube stations and the freephone services that I see occasionally at supermarkets are becoming an all-too-familiar sight.

Various options have been put to me to deal with the many issues that have been raised. As I said, many people in the taxi trade would bring minicabs up to the same standard as taxis. That would include introducing an abridged version of the knowledge, criminal record and medical checks for drivers and regular MOT checks for vehicles. The same system of fares regulation would apply. That would, arguably, give all users the same degree of safety.

However, can it be argued that all those stringent requirements are always necessary for many of the journeys that the minicab industry currently undertakes? I remind the House, and I know that there will be common agreement on this, that my most important responsibility is not to any individual interest group. It is not even ultimately to the licensed trade, which we all admire. My responsibility must ultimately be to the citizen as a consumer of services. I am not sure that consumers would necessarily thank me for denying them the opportunity of the cheaper travel in perfectly acceptable conditions which is currently on offer in many places.

Another option, which my hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, North mentioned, is a two-tier system with separate licensing for minicabs which broadly reflects the system outside London. Like my hon. Friend, I have reservations about how that would work in the capital, given the stringency of the controls that are applied to licensed taxis. There would be a danger that two-tier licensing would pose a significant threat to the viability of the present licensed trade and would thus damage the very part of the taxi business that is agreed not to be the cause of the problem.

The answer must be to endeavour to put the interests of the public, especially those of vulnerable passengers, at the centre of our attention in a way that does not impact adversely on the licensed trade, which, by virtue of the time and effort that it has devoted to obtaining its unique right to apply for hire, has shown a sense of responsibility and an awareness of the importance of its task which is to be much admired.

I have not the slightest doubt of the inevitable unpopularity that will accompany whatever announcement I make. Before the hon. Member for Newham, North-West leaves, he would do well to contemplate that, in the unlikely event of his transferring to this side of the Chamber, making unpopular announcements is likely to be a feature of this job for many years to come. But I have no doubt that, in the circumstances, he would discharge it with great distinction and good humour, as he always does.

I want to make it clear to my hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, North and to hon. Members who represent London constituencies that I will do my level best to incorporate the principles that I have outlined to ensure that the standards of the service in London are maintained.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at six minutes past Three o'clock.

Abortion

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the number of national health service funded agency abortions for each district health authority in England and Wales for the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Sackville: Information on abortions by district health authority (DHA) of operation is not released for reasons of confidentiality. Statistics showing the number of abortions performed under national health service agency agreements (that is, abortions to NHS patients performed in non-NHS premises) by DHA of usual residence are given in the table.

Central receipt of the notification of dates when agency agreements come into effect, and when they are dissolved, can be subject to delay, and therefore these figures should be interpreted with caution. For this reason such statistics are not, at present, routinely released at the DHA level. However, a more timely system for reporting of agency agreements is now in place, and these figures will be published annually from 1992 onwards.

Salmonella Poisoning

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information, in what form, other than purely statistical, has been published on salmonella poisoning outbreaks.

Mr. Sackville: The "Communicable Disease Report" produced by the Public Health Laboratory Service communicable disease surveillance centre, and the "PHLS/SVS Udate on Salmonella Infection", produced jointly by the Public Health Laboratory Service and the State Veterinary Service, provide background information on outbreaks of human Salmonellosis. Copies of both documents are available in the Library. Information may include, in the former publication, a detailed description of the outbreak and, in the latter, the type of premises where the food was prepared and the suspect vehicle of infection. Reports of outbreaks are also published in the scientific press, particularly if there is an aspect of the outbreak or the investigation that adds to the body of medical and/or scientific knowledge or where there are food hygiene lessons to be learned.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what constraints exist on the Chief Medical Officer relating to his publication of data relating to salmonella poisoning outbreaks;

(2) how many cases of salmonella relating to eggs and egg products have been reported since 1988; and if he will publish the reports of the Chief Medical Officer on those cases in such a form as to exclude the names of individual patients.

Mr. Sackville: Investigations of individual cases of human salmonellosis are not usually undertaken as in such isolated instances it is rarely possible to determine a suspect vehicle of infection. However, data on general outbreaks of human salmonellosis (where two or more persons in more than one household experience a similar illness after eating the same food and where epidemiological evidence implicates the food as the source of the illness) is published in the Public Health Laboratory Service State Veterinary Service (PHLS-SVS) "Update on Salmonella Infection". The table shows the number of general outbreaks for the period 1988 to 1991 where eggs or products containing eggs have been identified by local investigators as being the suspect vehicle of infection. The figure for 1992 has not yet been published. No additional data are available to the Chief Medical Officer.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether she will provide information to technical advisers to the United Kingdom Egg Producers Association on matters relating to the effectiveness of agencies in the investigation of salmonella poisoning outbreaks.

Mr. Sackville: We will consider any such request.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether the numbers of reported cases of salmonella poisoning from eggs from 1988 to 1991 is in need of revision in terms of statistics or data details.

Mr. Sackville: Eggs or products containing eggs were reported as the suspect vehicle of infection in a number of outbreaks of salmonella food poisoning between 1988 and 1991. The identification of the suspect vehicle was made by the outbreak investigators on the basis of evidence available at the time of the outbreak. This data is therefore not open to revision.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will instruct those agencies responsible for the collection of data on outbreaks of salmonella food poisoning to publish details of such incidents as soon as possible after notification and investigation.

Mr. Sackville: We are considering this matter.

Benzodiazepines

Mr. Kevin Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what specific initiatives her Department has taken to find alternatives to treatment with benzodiazepines in accordance with paragraph C21 of "The Health of the Nation"; and how self-help groups are being supported and encouraged to help reduce benzodiazepine dependency.

Dr. Mawhinney: Since 1982 there has been a steady reduction in the number of benzodiazepine prescriptions from 24·5 million to 15·7 million in 1991. Many services for people who wish to withdraw from tranquillisers are provided by locally-based self-help groups. The Government have funded the National Association of Mental Health (MIND), which runs self help groups throughout Great Britain for tranquilliser dependence, to compile a national directory of tranquilliser services.

Mr. Kevin Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps her Department is taking to ensure that, through the medical audit process, patients being treated with benzodiazepines for the first time are being prescribed these drugs for a maximum of two weeks.

Dr. Mawhinney: Detailed advice on the prescribing of benzodiazepines by the committee on the safety of medicines is given in the British National Formulary which is issued free to all doctors.

General practitioners, in conjunction with the medical audit advisory groups (MAAGs) which have been set up by family health service authorities, are being encouraged to address the issue of medical audit in regard to many aspects relating to their work, of which prescribing is one. The particular areas of prescribing to be identified are best left to individual MAAGs who can tailor medical audit to meet particular local needs or areas of concern.

Mental Health Services

Mr. Kevin Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will list the measures that her Department has taken to ensure that information on mental health services is provided to people whose main language is not English.

Mr. Yeo: The Department allocates £500,000 each year to develop projects to improve access to health services for the black and ethnic minority community. The Department has funded a number of projects in different black and ethnic minority languages including projects in the mental health field.

Horton Hospital (Patient Death)

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what steps her Department has taken on the issues raised by the case of Dr. Kypros Loucas;

(2) what action her Department has taken following its receipt of the internal inquiry by Riverside health authority into the death of a patient at Horton hospital in 1990.

Mr. Yeo: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave her and the hon. Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett) on 10 December 1992 at columns 781-82. It would not be appropriate to comment further pending any consideration of these matters by the General Medical Council.

Social Services (Discharge Arrangements)

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what measures were taken to evaluate the feasibility of the joint discharge arrangements made by each social services department with its health authorities;

(2) what assessment she has made of the extent of consultation between each social services department and its local health authorities on integrating arrangements for discharge from hospital into community care; and what plans she has to monitor the effective implementation of these arrangements.

Mr. Yeo: To receive a special transitional grant for community care all local authorities were required to agree with the relevant health authorities arrangements for integrating assessment and hospital discharge arrangements and to submit a copy of the agreement under joint signatures to the Department. All 109 local authorities did so. Each agreement reflects local circumstances. The operation of joint discharge arrangements will be one area covered in the overall monitoring of the community care reforms.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what arrangements have been made for public access to the written submissions on the integration of joint discharge arrangements between health authorities and social service departments.

Mr. Yeo: We have made it clear that authorities should publish details of these agreements in their community care plans.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what advice has been given to primary care and hospital staff about the joint discharge arrangements between social services departments and health authorities.

Mr. Yeo: Agreements have been reached locally and will reflect local circumstances. It is for the health and local authorities concerned to communicate these agreements to the staff who need to know about them.

Merit Awards

Ms Armstrong: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the Government's policy regarding recommendations for the new merit awards for 1993-94 resulting in pay rises of above 1·5 per cent.; and if she will make a statement.

Dr. Mawhinney: Existing performance pay arrangements, including the merit or distinction award scheme for consultant medical and dental staff, will continue in the normal way. The value of distinction awards will increase by 1·5 per cent. from 1 April 1993.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister announced in his reply to the hon. Member for Poole (Mr. Ward) on 12 February at column 838 that the Government had accepted the recommendation of the Doctors and Dentists Review Body for an increase in the number of distinction awards. We have now agreed with the medical and dental professions that there should be 178 new awards in 1993-94. As recommended by the review body this figure takes account of the increase in consultant numbers and of the agreement reached last year that postgraduate deans should be eligible to receive awards.

Domiciliary Care

Mrs. Wise: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will introduce regulations to require the providers of private domiciliary care to register with social services departments and to meet appropriate minimum requirements as to ensure protection for users of such provisions.

Mr. Yeo: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave to the hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) on 22 October 1992 at column 371.

Nursing Homes

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what guidance has been given to local authorities to ensure that an individual's right to choose to be placed in residential or nursing home care is observed when assessed for community care needs.

Mr. Yeo: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health has issued a statutory direction requiring local authorities to place someone to whom it decides to offer residential care in the accommodation of their choice, subject to practical conditions such as cost, availability and suitability. We have also made it clear that authorities should use their discretion in a way which respects users' and carers' wishes when arranging the provision of any community care service.

GP Remuneration

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she has reached a decision on general medical practitioner remuneration for 1993-94; and if she will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: As part of his autumn statement, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced that public sector pay settlements for the coming year will be restricted to no more than 1·5 per cent. In line with this, the intended average net income for general medical practitioners will be increased from £40,010 per GP in 1992-93 to £40,610 per GP on 1 April.

I announced in reply to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington (Mr. Dicks) on 3 December 1992 at column 319 that the health departments were to pursue other issues concerned with general medical practitioners' remuneration in 1993-94 directly with the profession. The two parties have now agreed the relevant factual evidence, and the profession has set out its views on all the outstanding issues. After giving careful consideration to the profession's views, Health Ministers have reached the following conclusions:

first, the level of practice expenses to be incorporated in fees and allowances for the average GP for 1993-94 should be £22,190. This includes an adjustment to take account of evidence that practice expenses in 1990-91, the first year of the new GP Contract, were substantially higher than the Doctors' and Dentists' Review Body (DDRB) had forecast.

secondly, that the normal rules applied by the DDRB when correcting for previous over or underpayments of remuneration should be applied as usual in 1993-94. We have noted that significantly more money was paid to the profession in 1990-91 and 1991-92 than was provided for by DDRB. We are committed to further discussions with the profession in the Autumn of 1993 on how these overpayments might be handled. Pending these discussions, we consider it only right and proper to begin some recovery in 1993-94 of the amounts outstanding.

thirdly, we have asked officials to pursue with the profession their request for a substantial increase in the payment made to trainee general practitioners in respect of "out of hours" work, with a view to putting a joint submission to DDRB in the next pay round.

fourthly, after taking account of the modest overdelivery of remuneration predicted for 1992-93, the decision to apply the normal recovery rules, and the 1·5 per cent. increase in the intended average net income, an increase in fees and allowances averaging 3·3 per cent. will be required to deliver the amount due to the profession in 1993-94. We have accepted the profession's proposal that this increase should be spread evenly across all fees and allowances.

My officials are today writing to Dr. Bogle, chairman of the general medical services committee of the British Medical Association, with the details of the decisions. A copy of that letter will be placed in the Library.

Medical Advisers

Sir Michael Grylls: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what measures are being taken to monitor the effect of family health service authority medical advisers; and on what criteria their performance is determined.

Dr. Mawhinney: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave him on 10 March at column 619.

Stomacare Nurses

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what representations she has received on the means used by Messrs Danzac to influence stomacare nurses in the use of their applicances;

(2) if she will set up an investigation into the methods used by Messrs Danzac to influence nurses to advise on the use of their products by ostomists.

Mr. Yeo: We have recently received representations from the Campaign for Impartial Stomacare (CIS) and AMCARE, a supplier of stomacare products. We have no evidence that sponsorship of national health service stomacare nurses has affected the exercise of their clinical judgment in prescribing suitable products. I have assured CIS that I will investigate any such allegations in individual cases.

Limited List

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many representations she has received in respect of the extension of the limited list for medicines; how many were favourable to the proposed changes; and how many were unfavourable.

Dr. Mawhinney: We have received a number of representations about the extension of the selected list scheme, most of which have registered concern about various aspects of the new arrangements. In response, we have made it clear that the resources available to the national health service must be used as effectively as possible and that the select list scheme has already shown that it can exert downward pressure on the drugs bill without jeopardising patient care.

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what discussions she has had with the Family Planning Association in respect of the limited list affecting contraceptives; and if she will make a statement;

(2) what discussions she has had with the British Association of Dermatologists in respect of the limited list affecting skin products; and if she will make a statement.

Dr. Mawhinney: None. Decisions on which drugs may no longer be prescribed under the national health service will be based on advice from the advisory committee on NHS drugs, which is free to seek any advice that it considers necessary for its review.

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will make a statement on the future of the limited list for medicines.

Dr. Mawhinney: The selective list scheme is to continue and as announced in November its scope is being extended to drugs in 10 additional therapeutic categories.

Waiting Times

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what additional resources will be made available to health authorities to allow them to ensure that no patients are kept waiting for treatment until the new financial year if they are in priority need.

Mr. Sackville: The Government have invested an additional £2·5 billion in the national health service this year and patients who require urgent treatment will be given proper priority. The Government also plan to invest a further £1 billion for 1993-94 which is equivalent to a further 190,000 more in patients and day patients and 1 million extra patient contacts by community nurses.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment she has made of the extent to which district health authorities have exhausted resources to fund other non-emergency treatment and operations for patients from non-fund holding practices for the remainder of the current financial year; and what effect she forecasts this will have upon waiting lists and other objectives of the patients charter.

Mr. Sackville: Regional health authorities are responsible for monitoring district health authorities. Where hospitals have completed their routine contracted work before the end of the financial year patients have been treated earlier than they would otherwise have been. Emergencies are not affected and urgent cases are given proper priority. Waiting times and patients charter guarantees remain unchanged.

Leishmaniasis

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action she takes to safeguard against Leishmaniasis contamination in blood donations from service personnel who have served overseas.

Mr. Sackville: All service personnel returning home after the war in the Gulf, where the condition is endemic, were deferred from donating blood for 12 months. All donors are routinely questioned about foreign travels and any illnesses following that travel. Blood is not taken from potential donors with a history of clinically proven Leishmaniasis. This provides an adequate safeguard against the extremely low risk of transmitting the disease through a donor and there is no known case of its having been transmitted through blood transfusion in this country.

Oncologists

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the number of NHS consultant oncologist posts in England and Wales.

Dr. Mawhinney: At 30 September 1991 there were 31 whole-time equivalent oncologist posts in England and Wales.

Breast Cancer

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the number of consultant radiotherapists dedicated to treating women with breast cancer within the NHS in England and Wales.

Mr. Sackville: The number of consultant radiotherapists dedicated to treating women with breast cancer within the national health service in England and Wales is not known. This is because most consultant radiotherapists treat the full range of cancers. At 30 September 1991 the total number of consultant radiotherapists treating all cancers in the NHS in England and Wales was 212 whole-time equivalents.

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many women with breast cancer are treated by cancer specialists in England and Wales per year; and what comparable figures she has for France, Germany, Italy and the United States of America.

Mr. Sackville: This information is not held centrally. In 1987, the total number of newly diagnosed cases of malignant neoplasm of the female breast in England and Wales of all ages was 23,740. The treatment of breast cancer may require contributions from specialists in a number of medical fields, not all of whom would be cancer specialists.

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many women with breast cancer in England and Wales are treated by general physicians and radiotherapists and not referred to cancer specialists.

Mr. Sackville: This information is not held centrally. It is a matter for employing authorities to choose the optimum distribution between specialties of consultants in their hospitals in order to provide an appropriate service to their local population. The choice of treatment for individual patients is a matter for clinical judgment.

Community Care

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what role is envisaged for public sector community care provision after 1 April.

Mr. Yeo: The Government are committed to a mixed economy of care, with statutory authorities working alongside an expanding independent sector.

Dental Remuneration

Mr. Clapham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the time scale for her response to the Bloomfield report on dental remuneration.

Dr. Mawhinney: Consultation on the Bloomfield report will continue at a determined and realistic pace. We will announce our proposals in due course.

Dental Treatment

Mr. Clapham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the average cost to the patient of a course of dental treatment in 1979; and what is the cost in 1993 expressed as a proportion of the average adult income for both years.

Dr. Mawhinney: The average cost to a fee-paying patient of a course of dental treatment in 1979 was £6·37. The average cost to a fee-paying patient of a course of treatment in 1991-92, the latest year for which figures are available, was £21·15.

The cost of a course of dental treatment expressed as a proportion of the average adult yearly gross earnings was 0.001397 in 1979 and 0.001335 in 1992.

Care for the Elderly

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what guidance she has given to district health authorities regarding the contracting out of continuing elderly care; and if she will make a statement;

(2) how many health authorities have contracted out the provision of continuing elderly care in the last year; and if she will list them, stating the number of patients affected.

Mr. Yeo: In purchasing continuing care, health authorities are expected to consider the whole range of available services, including those in the independent sector. The extent of such provision, including any purchased from independent providers, is a matter for individual health authorities to determine in the light of local needs and priorities.

Hospital Catering

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the weekly average budget allocation per patient in hospital for breakfast, lunch, tea and supper on 1 January 1973, 1 January 1983 and 1 January 1993.

Mr. Sackville [holding answer 16 February 1993]: Information in the precise form requested is not collected centrally. However, provisional data derived from the annual financial returns of health authorities in England for 1991-92 (the latest year available) indicate the average provisions cost per patient day as £2·04 and the average total daily cost of meals per patient as £5·01. The latter figure includes the costs of provisions, staff and energy.

Equivalent average costs in 1982-83 were £1·24 and £2·55, respectively. Information for 1972-73 is not available.

NHS Staff

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many (a) consultants, (b) other medical staff, (c) nurses, (d) ancillary staff, (e) administrators and (f) accountants were employed within the South East Thames region in each of the years from 1987 to 1992; and how many are estimated to be employed in the region in 1993, 1994 and 1995.

Dr. Mawhinney [pursuant to his replies, 27 October 1992, column 618 and 28 January 1993, column 814:] The number of administrative and clerical staff in the South East Thames region at 30 September 1991 was 10,800. The figure previously supplied was incorrect as it excluded those staff employed in national health service trusts.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Standing Committees

Mr. Steen: To ask the Chairman of the Catering Committee if he will make a tea trolley available on the Committee Corridor for hon. Members serving on Standing Committees sitting in the afternoon and evening.

Mr. Colin Shepherd: The existing trolley service on the Committee corridor is to be replaced during the forthcoming Easter recess by a permanent coffee station sited in the Upper Waiting Hall. The hours of operation of this service have yet to be determined by the Director of Catering Services, but will undoubtedly take account of expected levels of demand throughout the day. The existing vending machine in the Upper Waiting Hall is due to be replaced by another machine offering fresh brew coffee.

World Development Movement (Exhibition)

Mr. Wells: To ask the Chairman of the Administration Committee if he has considered an application for an exhibition relating to the World Development Movement to be displayed in the Upper Waiting Hall.

Mr. Michael J. Martin: I understand that, under procedures agreed by the Administration Committee arrangements have been made for the exhibition to be held in the Upper Waiting Hall from 17 to 21 May 1993.

Forests Forever (Exhibition)

Mrs. Peacock: To ask the Chairman of the Administration Committee if he has considered an application for an exhibition relating to Forests Forever to be displayed in the Upper Waiting Hall.

Mr. Michael J. Martin: I understand that, under procedures agreed by the Administration Committee arrangements have been made for the exhibition to be held in the Upper Waiting Hall from 24 to 28 May 1993.

Deprivation and Dementia (Exhibition)

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Chairman of the Administration Committee if he has considered an application for an exhibition relating to deprivation and dementia to be displayed in the Upper Waiting Hall.

Mr. Michael J. Martin: I understand that under procedures agreed by the Administration Committee arrangements have been made for the exhibition to be held in the Upper Waiting Hall from 26 to 30 April 1993.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Brazil

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what meetings Ministers or officials of his Department's Overseas Development Administration had with representatives of the Brazilian Grupo de Trabalho Amazonico (GTA) and other representatives from Brazilian rubber tapper groups during their recent visit to London.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The chief natural resources adviser and officials of the Environment and Latin America departments of the Overseas Development Administration met Juan Carlos Carrasco Pueda, executive secretary of GTA, and Atanagildo Matos-Gatao, president of the Rubber Tappers Union, on Monday 8 March.

Chlorofluorocarbons

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the United Kingdom's outstanding contribution to the multilateral fund of the Montreal protocol set up to help developing countries phase out CFCs and other ozone-depleting chemicals; and when it will be paid.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The United Kingdom's full share of the multilateral fund is US $13·8 million. We have paid the equivalent of US $4·4 million to date. The balance of US $9·4 million will be paid up to financial year 1995-96 against a disbursement profile provided by the fund managers.

Cambodia

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how much financial support he has committed to the United Nations appeal for Cambodia since the appeal in Tokyo in June 1992; and to which sectors it has been committed.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd [holding answer 11 March 1993]: In June 1992 we announced that our total aid pledge for Cambodia had been increased to some US $30 million, including all bilateral support since November 1991. Since June 1992 some US $13 million of this pledge has been allocated, mainly to the areas of humanitarian aid, food aid, repatriation, human rights, demining, health, English language teaching and urban and rural water supply.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Central Asia

Mr. Elletson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about the effect on United Kingdom interests of Turkish diplomatic and commercial activity in central Asia.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We are aware of the high level of Turkish commercial activity in central Asia. British companies are also looking at investment opportunities in the region. Some British companies are considering the merits of forming joint ventures with Turkish companies, as John Laing already has with the Turkish contracting company, Alarko, in the redevelopment of Ashkabad airport. We welcome the diplomatic influence that Turkey can bring to bear in central Asia in helping those states to develop free market democracy.

Pakistan

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information has been received from the Pakistani authorities by the High Commission in Islamabad concerning the murder of Mohammed Afzal in Juarah village, Pakistan, on 4 October 1992.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The British high commission has still not received a report from the Pakistan authorities. The high commission will continue to press the Ministry of Foreign Affairs for a full report.

Moscow Airport (Transit Passengers)

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has on the numbers of transit passengers from Britain via Moscow airport being made to go through customs; how many representations he has received from passengers about this practice; and what representations he has made to the Confederation of Independent States or the ambassador of the Russian Federation.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We have no information on numbers of British transit passengers being made to go through customs at Moscow airport, nor have we received any representations about this. Any serious complaint would be taken up with the Russian authorities by our embassy in Moscow.

Kurile Islands

Mr. Elletson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the effect of the dispute between Russia and Japan over the Kurile islands on Japanese participation in western arrangements for aid and investment for Russia.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We hope the dispute over the islands can be resolved quickly and to the satisfaction of both parties but it has not prevented Japan from taking a close interest in the progress of economic reform in Russia along with other G7 partners. Japan hosted the Tokyo conference on assistance to the former Soviet Union in October last year. As G7 chair this year, Japan is considering with other colleagues what more the west can do to support reform in Russia and invited the Russian Deputy Prime Minister for talks with senior G7 officials in Hong Kong over the weekend.

Hong Kong

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he expects the Democratic Reform Bill for Hong Kong to be published; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad: The Governor of Hong Kong, with the advice of his Executive Council and our full report, published the draft legislation on electoral arrangements in Hong Kong on 12 March.

We have made clear since September last year that we are willing to hold talks with the Chinese side without preconditions. That remains our position.

Despite our best endeavours, it has not so far proved possible to resolve our differences with the Chinese side over the arrangements for talks. We particularly regret this, as we consider that these differences could and should have been resolved quickly.

We told the Chinese side that we were prepared to talk on the basis of the Joint Declaration, the principle of convergence with the Basic Law, and the relevant understandings and agreements reached between Britain and China. We consider the Governor's proposals to be wholly compatible with these.

We also made plain that in any talks the British team would include the necessary Hong Kong officials with the relevant knowledge and experience on the same basis as other officials taking part in the talks. Hong Kong officials have participated in past discussions with the Chinese side as members of the British team, including during the negotiations on the Joint Declaration and in the joint liaison group.

We have also said to the Chinese side that Sir Robin McLaren, the British ambassador to China, would be the British representative, supported by a team consisting of Mr. Michael Sze, the secretary for constitutional affairs, Mr. William Ehrman, the political adviser, Mr. Peter Lai, the deputy secretary for constitutional affairs, and Mr. Peter Ricketts, head of the Hong Kong department in the Foreign and Commonwealth Office. There would be no distinction between members of the team from Hong Kong and from London.

Having received a positive response from the Chinese side in early February on the principle of talks, we and the Governor, with the advice of the Hong Kong Executive Council, decided to postpone the Hong Kong Government's original plan to publish the legislation on 12 February. But we made it clear to the Chinese side that there could not be an indefinite delay, given the practical need to press ahead with legislation so that the 1994-95 elections can take place on schedule. We proposed an early starting date for the talks.

Despite the absence of a solution to the remaining difficulties, we and the Governor with Exco's advice decided to delay gazettal for a second time on 19 February, for a third time on 26 February, and for a fourth time on 5 March.

The Governor explained to the Legislative Council in Hong Kong on 5 March that we wished to go the extra mile and give the Chinese side every opportunity to respond.

Unfortunately, by 12 March the outstanding differences had not been resolved and we still had no date for talks. We had not even been able to obtain agreement that an announcement about talks could be made early the following week. Having deferred gazettal on four occasions, we and the Governor therefore decided with the advice of Exco to gazette the draft legislation on 12 March. We shall have to judge, in the light of subsequent developments, when to introduce the draft legislation into the Legislative Council.

We remain ready to hold talks with the Chinese side without preconditions. The remaining issues are matters which, given the will, could be solved quickly. We still hope that they can be.

Yugoslavia

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions have taken place with his counterparts in other member states of the European Community concerning the effectiveness of the embargo on trade with Serbia and Montenegro in relation to regulation No. 1432/90 and decision 92/285/ECSC; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Garel-Jones: Sanctions are essential pressure on Serbia and Montenegro to co-operate with the peace process. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State discusses regularly with his EC colleagues the effectiveness of these EC measures to implement United Nations Security Council resolution 757. He did so most recently at the Foreign Affairs Council on 8 March.

Baltic States

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he is making to the Commonwealth of Independent States to encourage the acceleration of repatriation of former Soviet troops from the Baltic states.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We have pressed the Russian Government repeatedly at the highest level on this issue. We welcome the Lithuanian-Russian agreement of September 1992 on a withdrawal timetable, and we look to Russia to agree and implement similar timetables with Estonia and Latvia without delay and without linkage to other issues. We are pleased that withdrawals are continuing despite the Russian announcement in October 1992 temporarily suspending them.

EDUCATION

National Curriculum

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what considerations underlay the withdrawal of health education and personal and social education from the national curriculum core subjects; and what steps he is taking to monitor the practice of teaching this subject.

Mr. Forth: Health education and personal and social education have never been core or foundation subjects of the national curriculum. Aspects of these topics are, however, included in several core and foundation subjects, and must be studied by all pupils. My right hon. Friend will look to the Office for Standards in Education to provide him with information and advice about all aspects of education provision in schools.

Dyslexic Students

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what provision is made for dyslexic students in guidance given for public examinations, and for the national standard tests.

Mr. Forth: Examining boards for GCSE and A-level examinations advise schools and colleges that candidates suffering from dyslexia may be given up to 25 per cent. extra time to enable them to read the paper, to plan and to correct their answers. Additional facilities, such as the use of a reader, amanuensis or a word processor, are also available.

The School Examinations and Assessment Council (SEAC) has advised schools through their school assessment folders that similar arrangements may also be made, at the discretion of the head teacher, for national curriculum tests. If the pupil does not have a statement of special needs, approval must also be sought from the LEA or, in the case of non-LEA maintained schools, from SEAC.

The main vocational awarding bodies have special arrangements for dyslexic students and are continually monitoring the situation both with centres and individual students.

Funding Councils

Mr. Eastham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what appeals procedures are available to institutions to challenge the decisions of the new funding councils.

Mr. Boswell: Any institution which is dissatisfied with a decision of the Higher Education Funding Council for England or the Further Education Funding Council is free to make representations to that council.

Blind Students

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what percentage of further and higher education funding is allocated to equipment and resources for blind students.

Mr. Boswell: From 1 April the Further Education Funding Council and the Higher Education Funding Council for England will be responsible for distributing public funds for further and higher education to individual institutions. Neither earmarks funds specifically for blind students. However, they are both taking forward initiatives to improve access to further and higher education for students with learning difficulties and disabilities. It is for institutions themselves to decide how to provide appropriate facilities for students from within the total resources available.

Teachers' Salaries

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what percentage of each education authority's budget is spent on teachers' salaries.

Mr. Forth: The information for 1990-91, the latest year for which information on actual spending is available, is given in the table.

2. The table shows for each authority teachers salaries as a percentage of the authority's net recurrent expenditure on education.

Pupil-Teacher Ratio

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what measures his Department will take to reduce the number of classes of over 30 per teacher; and what pupil to teacher ratio his Department has as a policy objective.

Mr. Forth: Our policy is to provide greater autonomy for schools so that they can make their own decisions on the deployment of resources. It would run counter to that policy to seek to impose a view on what the pupil to teacher ratio should be, or to introduce measures based on some arbitrarily determined maximum class size.

Teachers' Salaries

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will set out the scale of basic salaries for classroom teachers and the range of incentive allowances and incremental enhancements available.

Mr. Forth: Qualified teachers other than head teachers or deputy head teachers are paid on a 10 point standard scale:

Scale point	Annual salary £
3	12,366
4	12,954
5	13,839
6	14,721
7	15,606
8	16,488
10	18,837

A teacher not at the top of the scale can have the value of his or her incremental point enhanced by £294, £591, £885, or £1,173, provided that the next scale point is not exceeded by more than £3.

Discretionary scale points may be added to the top of the standard scale up to a maximum of £3,225 and awarded in the light of a teacher's performance.

Incentive allowances may be awarded at one of the following rates:

Rate	Annual amount (£)
A	1,296
B	2,097
C	4,194
E	7,692

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what is the maximum salary payable to a classroom teacher inclusive of incentive allowances and incremental enhancements.

Mr. Forth: The maximum salary payable to a classroom teacher at the top of the standard scale—excluding London allowances—is £29,754. This includes an incentive allowance at rate E and discretionary scale points worth £3,225.

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what percentage of education funding goes towards teachers' salaries.

Mr. Forth: The great bulk of central Government support for local authorities is through unhypothecated revenue support grant. It is therefore not possible to say how much of this support is for teachers' salaries. Decisions about how much to spend on teachers' pay are for local authorities and, under local management and grant maintained status, individual schools. Teachers' salaries represented about 55 per cent. of LEAs' total net recurrent spending in 1990-91, the latest year for which outturn information is available.

Text Books

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what was the amount spent on textbooks per pupil in primary and secondary schools for each year since 1982, in real terms.

Mr. Forth: The available information on expenditure per pupil on books and equipment for years up to 1990-91, the latest year for which information on actual spending is available, is given in the table.

Per pupil expenditure on books and equipment at 1992-93 prices

	Nursery and primary (£)	Secondary (£)	Combined nursery, primary and secondary (£)
1982-83	36	63	50
1983-84	38	65	51
1984-85	37	67	52
1985-86	37	67	52
1986-87	41	83	61
1987-88	42	86	62
1988-89	41	90	62
1989-90	46	95	67
1990-91	46	89	64

Notes to table:

1. Real terms figures are at 1992-93 prices, repriced using the GDP (market prices) deflator index.
2. Figures are derived from local education authorities' returns of their spending to the Department of the Environment, and of their pupil numbers to the Department of Education. The table shows combined figures for books and equipment because not all authorities' returns identify separately spending on books from that on equipment.
3. Expenditure on nursery and primary schools was not collected separately for years after 1986-87. A comparable combined nursery and primary figure is therefore given for each year.

Dance, Drama and Music

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Education whether he will provide a number of fully funded places for the most talented students from England, Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland to study dance, drama and music in the United Kingdom on an annual basis; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Forth: Under the Government's music and ballet scheme help is already being made available to more than 550 talented children at the Royal Ballet school, four specialist music schools in England and, under slightly different arrangements, one in Scotland. Mandatory student awards and student loans are available for full-time first degree and comparable level courses in dance, drama and music. The Government also contribute significant amounts of taxpayers' money towards local authority expenditure on education. Local education authorities may also make discretionary awards for lower level courses. It is, however for each authority to determine its own policies on such support.

Questions about funding students in Scotland and Northern Ireland are matters for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland and my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

School Hours

Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Education how many hours per week secondary school students are required to work in Britain; and what are the equivalent figures for the United States of America, France, Germany and Japan.

Mr. Forth: The readily available information on teaching hours per week and the length of the school year are shown in the table.

Secondary schools

	Teaching hours per week	Length of school year
England[1]	24	38 weeks
Wales[2]	24	38 weeks
Scotland[3]	27·5	38 to 40 weeks
Northern Ireland[4]	22·5	37 weeks

[2] Average teaching time per week.
[3] Timetabled week in education authority schools.
[4] Minimum teaching hours.
[5] Represents 21 hours core curriculum time plus three hours of sport.
[6] Represents an average miminum and may vary according to the providing authorities (Länder).
[7] Average minimum number of hours in class over a five day week.

Portakabin Classrooms

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Education how many Portakabin classrooms are currently in use; how many there were in 1979, 1985 and 1990; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Forth: The Department holds no records on how many Portakabin classrooms are currently in use or how many were in use at any time in the past.

On temporary accommodation generally, "A Study of School Building" published by the Department and the Welsh Office in 1977 showed that 10 per cent. of primary and 7 per cent. of secondary school places were provided in temporary accommodation, both fixed and mobile. The "Survey of School Buildings" published by the Department in 1987 showed a reduction in these proportions to 7 per cent. of primary school accommodation and 6 per cent. of secondary school accommodation in England only.

Information on the position in 1990 could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Retired Teachers

Mr. O'Hara: To ask the Secretary of State for Education how many male teachers retired from the profession at age 60, 61, 62, 63 and 64 years during each of the financial years 1989-90 to date.

Mr. Forth: The table shows the number of male teachers who retired from the profession at age 60, 61, 62, 63 and 64 years during each of the financial years 1989-90 to date.

Year to March	Age 60	Age 61	Age 62	Age 63	Age 64

PRIME MINISTER

Poland

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make a statement on the matters dicussed during the recent visit of the Prime Minister of Poland and the outcome of those discussions.

The Prime Minister: I had valuable discussions with Ms Suchocka on a wide range of issues.

Ms Suchoka briefed me on the Polish economic reform programme. We discussed Poland's wish to become a full member of the European Community, and ways in which the United Kingdom could help Poland towards this goal. We agreed on the need to develop trade and investment. Ms Suchocka stressed the importance to Poland of the restoration of ECGD cover. I agreed to review the position.

Military Equipment

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Prime Minister if he will publish in the Official Report his correspondence to date with the hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent since 24 November 1992 on the involvement of United Kingdom companies in supplying Iraq with military equipment, the sales of United Kingdom origin military equipment to Yugoslavia and United Kingdom compliance with the nuclear non-proliferation treaty.

The Prime Minister: No. It is not my normal practice to do so.

China (Human Rights)

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Prime Minister when he now expects to receive the final report on the outcome of the visit to China of the delegation led by Lord Howe to discuss human rights last December; and if he will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply which I gave him on 17 December 1992 at column 352. Work on the report by my right hon. noble and learned Friend, Lord Howe, is well advanced. As soon as it is available we propose to place copies in the Library of the House and to make it available to the public. We continue to raise the issue of human rights in China, most recently in Geneva at the UN Commission on Human Rights, and with Chinese embassy officials here on 4 March.

Liverpool

Mr. Parry: To ask the Prime Minister what plans he has to visit Liverpool; and if he will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

Polish Prime Minister

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Prime Minister what matters in regard to (a) PHARE, (b) environmental technology transfer and (c) export controls on military or dual-use equipment were discussed during his recent meeting with his Polish counterpart in London.

The Prime Minister: These matters were not raised in my discussions with the Polish Prime Minister.

Kashmir

Mr. Madden: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his letter of January to the hon. Member for Bradford West, what information he has received about the detention of Kashmiri leaders, Shabir Shah and Yasin Malik in Delhi; and if he will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: We have asked the Indian Government through our High Commission in New Delhi for information about Shabir Shah and Yasin Malik and are awaiting a reply.

Public Bodies

Dr. Wright: To ask the Prime Minister what percentage of total Government spending is accounted for by the bodies listed in "Public Bodies 1992".

The Prime Minister: Gross expenditure by executive non-departmental public bodies was 8·2 per cent. of general Government expenditure in 1978-79 and 5·8 per cent. in 1991-92.

Dr. Wright: To ask the Prime Minister how many non-departmental public bodies there were in (a) 1979 and (b) the last year for which figures are available.

The Prime Minister: There were 2,167 non-departmental public bodies in 1979 consisting of 492 executive bodies, 1,485 advisory bodies, 70 tribunals and 120 boards of visitors; and 1,412 in 1992 consisting of 369 executive bodies, 846 advisory bodies, 66 tribunals and 131 boards of visitors.

Dr. Wright: To ask the Prime Minister how many appointments to public bodies and positions he is able to make; and if he will list the bodies and positions.

The Prime Minister: The information requested could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Dr. Wright: To ask the Prime Minister what was the total budget of all non-departmental public bodies in (a) 1979 and (b) the latest year for which figures are available.

The Prime Minister: Total expenditure by executive non-departmental public bodies was £6,150 million in 1979 and £13,750 million in 1992.

Scott Inquiry

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Prime Minister how many of additional topics have been referred to Lord Justice Scott since his terms of reference were established; and when he will now report.

The Prime Minister: The wide terms of reference of Lord Justice Scott's inquiry enable him to examine whatever topics he considers relevant to the issues of his inquiry. Lord Justice Scott has not yet announced when he expects to publish his report.

Water Privatisation, Scotland

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his oral answer to the hon. Member for Angus East, of 9 March, Official Report, column 783, what plans the Scottish Office now has to announce the conclusions of its consultative process on the privatisation of the water industry in Scotland; and if he will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland is considering the responses to the Government's consultation paper on the future of water and sewerage in Scotland. An announcement will be made when that consideration is complete.

Ghazanfer Ali

Mr. Madden: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his letter of 21 October concerning Ghazanfer Ali, in prison in Pakistan, what further information he has received about the progress of the case; and if he will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: Mr. Ghazanfer Ali is facing two murder charges. They were due to be heard on 13 and 14 March 1993. We shall continue to watch developments.

Prerogative Powers

Mr. Allen: To ask the Prime Minister what prerogative powers pertain to public borrowing.

The Prime Minister [holding answer 9 March 1993]: Central Government borrowing to raise money for general purposes is undertaken under the National Loans Act of 1968 and not under the prerogative. Public borrowing to raise money for various specific functions is generally undertaken under statutory powers.

Maastricht Treaty

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Prime Minister when he last communicated with his counterparts in other EC countries over the proposed ratification of the Maastricht treaty by the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

The Prime Minister [holding answer 12 March 1993]: I last discussed ratification of the Maastricht treaty with my European Community colleagues collectively at the Edinburgh European Council on 11 and 12 December 1992. I have since reaffirmed to our partners our commitment to ratify the treaty, most recently in my meeting with the Prime Minister of Denmark on 9 March.

Scottish Water Privatisation

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his oral answers to the hon. Member for Angus, East (Mr. Welsh) and for Edinburgh, Leith (Mr. Chisholm), of 9 March, Official Report, column 783-4, whether a decision has now been taken to proceed with the privatisation of Scottish water.

The Prime Minister [holding answer 12 March 1993]: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland has consulted widely on the future of the water and sewerage services in Scotland. We will announce our conclusions after the responses have been carefully considered. No decision has been taken.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Tinnitus

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (1) if he will list all projects currently being undertaken by the Medical Research Council specifically targeted at the problems of tinnitus; and how much money has been allocated to each project;

(2) if he will list all projects currently being undertaken by the Institute of Hearing Research specifically targeted at the problems of tinnitus; and how much money has been allocated to each project;

(3) what plans he has to fund medical research projects specifically targeted at the relief of tinnitus; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. William Waldegrave: The main Government agency for the funding of medical research is the Medical Research Council (MRC). The MRC's Institute of Hearing Research in Nottingham is conducting research into the epidemiology, diagnosis and treatment of tinnitus and the rehabilitation of tinnitus sufferers. There is one project directly relevant to this condition entitled "Clinical and Psychoacoustical Studies of Tinnitus". Elements of other projects being undertaken at the Institute of Hearing Research are also applicable to the problem of tinnitus. In the last financial year, 1991-92, the expenditure figure for research specifically targeted at the problem of tinnitus was £129,000. In addition, the council supports a considerable number of projects in hearing research, many of which may have implications for the understanding of this condition. The council's total expenditure on hearing research in 1991-92 was £2·6 million.

The council is always willing to consider soundly based scientific proposals in competition with other applications.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Maastricht Treaty

Mr. Hain: To ask the Attorney-General what would be the impact upon the United Kingdom's ability to ratify the Maastricht treaty of making amendment 119 to the European Communities (Amendment) Bill; and if he will give an explanatory opinion.

The Attorney-General: I will advise the House, as necessary in relation to any particular point, if and when such a point arises during the Committee's consideration of the Bill.

NATIONAL HERITAGE

Hotel Industry

Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what steps the Government have taken since the publication in 1985 of the White Paper, "Lifting the Burden", to reduce the regulation of the United Kingdom hotel industry.

Mr. Key: Since the 1985 White Paper was published many deregulatory gains of benefit to hotels and other types of business have been made. These include measures to speed up planning appeals, removal of the requirement for small firms to file full accounts, and the introduction of experimental schemes liberalising road signs for hotels. The hotel sector has welcomed the proposal by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment to abolish the remaining wages councils.

My right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade recently announced the creation of seven task forces of business people to examine the scope for further deregulation in various sectors, which will add to the work going on across Whitehall. One of the task forces will cover retailing and tourism, including hotels.

Mr. John Birt

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage, pursuant to the answer from the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster on 8 March, Official Report, column 396, what general direction he gave when consulted about the appointment of Mr. John Birt as director-general of the BBC on a consultancy contract arrangement.

Mr. Brooke: I gave no general direction; nor was I consulted on this matter. The appointment of senior BBC staff and how they are remunerated are matters for the corporation's board of governors.

Olympic Symbol

Sir Thomas Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if he will make a statement on the outcome of the consultation about legislating to protect the Olympic symbol in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Brooke: My Department together with the Department of Trade and Industry has consulted widely with those who have an interest in the Olympic symbol, motto and related terms. I am pleased to report that there is overwhelming support for the proposal to legislate to confer the United Kingdom rights to the Olympic symbol, motto and related terms on the British Olympic Association, with suitable safeguards for holders of existing rights. Such a measure would bring substantial benefits to British Olympic teams as well as satisfying the IOC's requirements of countries bidding to host the Olympic Games. It underlines once again the seriousness of the Government's commitment to supporting the British bid to host the Olympic Games in Manchester in the year 2000. Legislation will be introduced as soon as the parliamentary timetable allows it.

Monuments

Mr. Martlew: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how many scheduled monuments have been destroyed in each of the last five years in England; what were the causes of the damage or destruction; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: I am advised by English Heritage that, according to its records, no scheduled monuments were completely destroyed during the past five years. However, there were a number of cases of reported damage, due to a variety of causes, and the numbers are as follows: 1988-89—74; 1989-90—53; 1990-91—72; 1991-92—28; 1992-93—46.

It is an offence under the provisions of the Ancient Monuments and Archaeological Areas Act 1979 to carry out any works to a scheduled monument without obtaining prior consent or unless the works are permitted under the Ancient Monuments (Class Consents) Order 1981. In appropriate cases offenders are prosecuted.

Sites of Archaeological Interest

Mr. Martlew: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how many inspectors have been employed to carry out the scheduling of sites of archaeological interest in England in each year since 1985; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: Prior to 1988 there were 15 English Heritage inspectors dealing with all matters concerning ancient monuments in England; none of these was concerned specifically with the scheduling of monuments. English Heritage subsequently embarked on its monuments protection programme (MPP) and in 1988 three inspectors were appointed with specific responsibility for managing the MPP and supervising field workers who now prepare scheduling recommendations. The complement of field workers has risen from four in 1989-90 to eight in 1990-91, 13 in 1991-92, and 16 in 1992-93.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Prostitution

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) men and (b) women were charged in courts in the Greater London area for soliciting for prostitution in each of the last three years.

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) men and (b) women were charged in the courts in the Greater London area for living on the immoral earnings of prostitution in each of the last three years.

Mr. Jack: Information for the Metropolitan police district (including the City of London) is given in the table; 1992 information will not be available until the autumn.

Number of persons convicted in the Metropolitan Police District (including the City of London) for certain offences by sex 1989, 1990 and 1991

Animal Experimentation

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make it his policy to increase the representation of animal welfare organisations on the Animal Procedures Committee.

Mr. Charles Wardle: In making appointments to the Animal Procedures Committee my right hon. and learned Friend is required by section 19 of the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986 to have regard to the disirability of ensuring that the interests of animal welfare are adequately represented. The current composition of the committee is in line with that requirement.

Firearms

Mr. Nigel Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what checks are made on the people to whom firearm licences are awarded.

Mr. Charles Wardle: Under the Firearms Act 1968, firearms certificates are issued by chief officers of police. Before granting or renewing a certificate, that chief police officer must be satisfied that an applicant has a good reason for requiring the firearm and can be permitted to have it without danger to public safety or to the peace. A certificate must not be granted to any person whom the chief officer has reason to believe to be prohibited by the Act from possessing a firearm, or to be of intemperate habits or unsound mind, or to be for any reason unfitted to be entrusted with a firearm.

Prison Service Industries

Mr. Mike O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the receipts from prison service industries in each of the last five years; and what is the estimate for the current financial year.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The total receipts of prison service industries and farms in the past five years and the estimate for the current financial year are as follows:

Year	£ million
1988-89	5·7
1989-90	5·5
1990-91	5·5
1991-92	5·3
1992-93	5·0

Accommodation Charges

Mr. Mike O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what has been the total estimated cost for 1992-93 for bridging loans and other accommodation charges met from public funds in respect of transfers of staff within (a) the prison service, (b) the police service and (c) employees of his Department.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Information is not available in the specific form requested. The estimated cost for 1992-93 of all expenditure in respect of the transfer of staff (which includes travel-related costs as well as bridging loans and accommodation-related charges) is £39,229,000 for the prison service and £4,736,000 for the rest of the Home Office. The question of costs arising from staff transfers within the police forces is a matter for individual chief officers of police.

International Crime

Mr. Mike O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects a report from the Trevi ad hoc working party on Europol; and what co-operation exists between that working party and the EC ad hoc working group on international organised crime.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The ad hoc working group of Europol reports to Trevi Ministers once during each EC presidency. It will next report at the Trevi ministerial meeting in Copenhagen on 1 and 2 June.

Mr. Mike O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects a report from the EC ad hoc working group on international organised crime set up in September 1992; whether that report will be published; and what consideration is being given in the report to dealing with the organisation and structures of international crime organisations.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The ad hoc working group on international organised crime is expected to report to Ministers of the Interior and Justice during the Danish presidency. It will be for these Ministers to decide whether the report should be published.

The ad hoc working group on Europol and the ad hoc working group on organised crime have some common membership.

Police Cells

Mr. Mike O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the total estimated cost of keeping prisoners in police cells for 1992-93.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The estimated cost of keeping prisoners in police cells in 1992-93 is £92·2 million. Some further claims are being processed and the final figure for the year may be slightly higher.

Drug Trafficking

Mr. Mike O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what has been the cost to his Department of participation in CELAD since 1989; what practical proposals have come from this committee; and what is his analysis of its effectiveness in combating international drugs trafficking.

Mr. Jack: The full cost of Home Office participation in CELAD is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. The travel and subsistence cost of Home Office officials' attendance at the 29 CELAD meetings since 1989 is in the region of £28,000. The cost of hosting the three CELAD meetings in London during the United Kingdom presidency was £135,595.

The practical proposals made by CELAD since its inception include the preparation and implementation of an EC-wide action plan on measures to combat drug misuse, the establishment of a European drugs monitoring centre and the European Drugs Prevention Week (16 to 22 November 1992).

CELAD has not been directly involved in developing measures to combat international drug trafficking. Within the European Community, this is mainly the responsibility of the Trevi group, the customs mutual assistance group and the enforcement agencies of member states. CELAD has, however, helped to develop a coherent Community strategy to combat drug misuse, which has included proposals to combat trafficking.

Common European Time

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what is the minimum notice for introducing common European time;

(2) what legislation is needed to introduce common European time.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The adoption of central European time by the United Kingdom would require primary legislation. Subject to any necessary future consultation, our understanding is that transport operators would be the sector requiring the longest period of notice, of between 12 to 18 months, in which to prepare for such a move.

Witness Intimidation

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many proceedings have been brought for witness intimidation in each of the last five years for which figures are available.

Mr. Jack: It is not possible from the information held centrally to identify offences of interference with witness from other common law offences of "attempting to pervert the course of public justice".

The table shows the number of prosecutions in England and Wales from 1987 to 1991 for attempting to pervert the course of public justice; 1992 data will not be available until autumn 1993.

Number of prosecutions at magistrates' courts for the offence of attempting to pervert the course of public justice[1] under common law for the years 1987 to 1991 (England and Wales)

Year	Prosecutions
1988	864
1989	1,139
1991	1,565

[1] Under common law the offence of "attempting to pervert the course of public justice" includes fabrication of false evidence, causing person to be wrongly convicted and interference with witness etc.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information he has on the number of cases of violence against the person which collapsed because of witness intimidation in each of the last five years.

Mr. Jack: I regret that this information is not available.

Unitary Fine System

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many representations have been received about the unitary fine system operating in magistrates courts; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jack: The provisions in the Criminal Justice Act 1991 relating to unit fines were implemented on 1 October 1992. Between that date and 28 February 1993 some 77 letters have been received from right hon. and hon. Members specifically about the sentencing provisions of the Act; 52 of these letters were concerned either in whole or in part with the unit fines scheme. Figures on the number of letters received from members of the public about the scheme are not readily available from correspondence records and could be compiled only at disproportionate costs.

The new sentencing framework, including the unit fine scheme, is being carefully monitored, and we will consider fully any representations made about it.

Coroners

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what power he has to investigate the proper conduct of coroners' courts and to discipline coroners.

Mr. Charles Wardle: Under section 3(4) of the Coroners Act 1988, the Lord Chancellor alone has the power to dismiss a coroner. By agreement between the Lord Chancellor's Department and the Home Office, inquiries into complaints against coroners are carried out by the Home Office, with the Lord Chancellor's Department becoming involved only where there is a clear instance of grounds for dismissal. In carrying out its investigative role, the Home Office acts on a non-statutory basis. It has no disciplinary powers.

Criminal Justice Act 1991

Mr. Brandreth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representions he has received from law societies in the north-west on the effects of the Criminal Justice Act 1991.

Mr. Jack: We have not been able to identify any such representations.

Secure Units

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his oral statement of 2 March, Official Report, column 139, (1) what plans he has for the reintegration of young people into family and community after a period in his proposed secure units;

(2) who will have operational oversight of the proposed secure units.

Mr. Jack: As my right hon. and learned Friend indicated in his statement on 2 March, Official Report, columns 139-42, we are now working up detailed plans for the introduction of a new secure training order for persistent juvenile offenders between the ages of 12 and 15. At this stage, before the completion of discussions with those who will be involved, it is not possible to provide details of the aftercare provision which will be necessary as an integral part of the secure training order. It is similarly premature to go into detail about such matters as operational oversight of the custodial part of the new order, but as my right hon. and learned Friend indicated in his statement, it is intended that there should be independent inspection of both the care and social work activities and the educational provision that will be part of the regime provided to an offender made subject to such an order.

Juvenile Crime

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what research has taken place into the connection between food additives and juvenile crime; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jack: We are not aware of any reliable British research on the relationship between food additives and juvenile offending. The Department's research and planning unit is currently considering the possibility of funding a small-scale study on links between diet and crime as part of a wider programme of research on juvenile offending.

Special Constables, Dorset

Mr. Paice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether an interim evaluation has been made of the pilot bounty payment scheme for special constables in Dorset which started in October 1991 and is due to finish in October 1993; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Charles Wardle: When this pilot scheme was set up, it was decided that two years was a sensible period over which to assess its usefulness. A full evaluation will be made when the scheme ends next autumn.

Notifiable Offences

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will state the percentage change in the total number of notifiable offences recorded by the police between 1979 and the latest available year.

Mr. Jack: The number of notifiable offences recorded by the police in England and Wales increased by 108 per cent. between 1979 and 1991.

Greyhound Racing

Sir John Wheeler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has for consulting interested parties about the deregulatory proposals put forward by the greyhound racing industry.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have today issued two consultation documents which seek views on a number of deregulatory measures suggested by the greyhound industry.

The first covers possible changes to section 19 of the Betting, Gaming and Lotteries Act 1963 which currently prevents track owners from having an interest in the bookmaking at their own tracks.

The second covers a number of proposals for change: inter-track betting, advance betting, changes to ticket restrictions, changes to pool display, restrictions and abolition of the requirement for public auditors to attend tracks whilst racing is taking place.

I have arranged for copies of the consultation documents to be placed in the Library of the House. Respondents are asked to reply by the end of April.

Racehorses (Drugs)

Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what is the Government's policy on the illegal administering of drugs to thoroughbred racehorses;

(2) if he or his Department will meet representatives of the Jockey Club to discuss the problem of the illegal doping of racehorses;

(3) when he was informed about the circumstances surrounding the illegal doping of the thoroughbred racehorse Flash of Steel; when the doping took place; when it was made public; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd [holding answer 4 March 1993]: The administration of horseracing, including security measures to prevent doping, is a matter for the horseracing authorities. I understand that the Jockey Club has recently introduced additional security measures.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Planning Appeals

Mr. Clifford Forsythe: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) how many planning service decisions were reversed on appeal in 1990-91 and 1991-92 in each planning division in Northern Ireland;

(2) how many planning service decisions rejected by district councils were subsequently reversed on appeal in 1990-91 and 1991-92 in each planning division in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Atkins: Planning decisions in Northern Ireland are taken by the Department of the Environment for Northern Ireland after consultation with district councils.

The information requested is set out in the table:

Year and Division	Number of decisions reversed on appeal	Number of decisions where District Councils disagreed with Department's decision which was subsequently reversed on appeal
1990-91
Londonderry	21	5
Ballymena	38	19
Omagh	6	3
Craigavon	9	3
Downpatrick	36	5
Belfast	34	3
Total	144	38
1991-92
Londonderry	16	3
Ballymena	15	6
Omagh	8	5
Craigavon	5	3
Downpatrick	17	7
Belfast	22	1
Total	83	25

Minority Languages

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what representations he has received regarding the European charter for regional or minority languages.

Mr. Hanley: The chairman of the Community Relations Council, Dr. James Hawthorne, wrote to the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland on 25 June 1992 to convey the council's desire that the Government ratify the convention in due course.

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what discussions he has had with the Government of the Irish Republic regarding the European charter for regional or minority languages.

Mr. Hanley: None.

Race Relations

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what representations he has received from the Fair Employment Commission regarding future race relations legislation in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Hanley: None.

Roads

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what measures will be taken to increase the budgetary allocation to the roads infrastructure; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Atkins: Expenditure allocations for roads in 1993-94 have now been determined and in real terms will be maintained at much the same levels as in 1992-93 with increased emphasis being given to minor works and bridge strengthening schemes. Every effort will be made to ensure that future expenditure levels for roads are sufficient to meet identified needs, taking into account the many competing demands on public expenditure in Northern Ireland.

Hospital Budgets

Dr. Hendron: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what degree of flexibility there is for a hospital if, during the financial year, that hospital has overspent its budget.

Mr. Hanley: Under the rules of Government accounting, HPSS boards must contain expenditure within the allocation made to them for any year, and a board has the primary responsibility to ensure that units of management within the board also live within their budgets.

Boards, individual units and hospitals within units have freedom to take management decisions to curtail expenditure in order to achieve this.

A certain amount of flexibility is available to a unit of management in that, with the approval of its board, it may transfer funds from capital to revenue to cover a temporary overspend. In addition a board can make use of underspendings in other budget heads to cover overspendings within a unit of management.

Dr. Hendron: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland to what extent the budget available for any hospital in any coming year is based on the number of deaths and discharges from the previous year.

Mr. Hanley: The budget available for a hospital in any year will be based on its anticipated income which will be earned from contracts to provide health and personal social services. These contracts will be made with boards, and GP fundholders and will be related to agreed activity levels measuring in-patient, day-patient and out-patient activity. Previous years activity levels do form a baseline for contract negotiations.

Royal Victoria Hospital

Dr. Hendron: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what percentage of the total amount of moneys spent at the Royal Victoria hospital during each of the last five years was spent on administrative duties.

Mr. Hanley: The information is not available in the form requested. Total revenue expenditure at the Royal Victoria hospital for the last five years was as follows:

Year	£ million
1988-89	42·4
1989-90	43·3
1991-92	49·5

The Royal Victoria hospital is part of the Royal group of hospitals unit of management within the Eastern health and social services board, and the cost of administration is gathered on a unit of management basis. The Royal group of hospitals unit of management was created on 1 April 1990, and the following table shows the percentage of the total revenue expenditure spent on administration duties during 1990-91 and 1991-92.

The Royal Group of Hospitals Unit of Management

	Total revenue expenditure £ million	Unit of management administration £ million	Percentage

The increase in administration expenditure during 1991-92 was partly caused by the recharge to units of management of certain finance and supplies administration costs formerly absorbed in board headquarters administration.

Dr. Hendron: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what percentage of the total amount of moneys spent at the Royal Victoria hospital during each of the last five years was spent directly on patient care.

Mr. Hanley: The information requested is as follows:

Royal Victoria hospital

	Total net revenue expenditure £ million	Expenditure on Direct treatment £ million	Percentage
1987-88	39·4	25·6	64·97
1988-89	42·4	29·4	69·34
1989-90	43·3	30·7	70·90
1990-91	47·5	34·2	72·00
1991-92	49·5	35·9	72·53

Direct patient care is taken as direct treatment and ancillary departments' revenue expenditure, together with specialists remuneration and expenses.

Dr. Hendron: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how much money was spent at the Royal Victoria site in 1992 on (a) administration and (b) patient care.

Mr. Hanley: The information is not available in the form requested.

Expenditure figures are not produced for calendar years, the latest figures available being those for the financial year ended 31 March 1992.

The following figures relate to the Royal group of hospitals unit of management, and patient care is taken as direct treatment and ancillary departments revenue expenditure, together with specialists remuneration and expenses.

Royal group of hospitals unit of management

	Revenue expenditure on direct treatment of patients £ million	Unit of management administration £ million
1991-92	65·6	3·4

Electricity

Mr. Stott: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what progress he is making in establishing the electricity interconnector between Scotland and Northern Ireland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Atkins: This is a matter for Northern Ireland Electricity plc. I understand from the chairman of NIE plc that satisfactory progress is being made in planning the project.

Mr. Stott: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what study his Department has made of the disparity in the price of electricity between Northern Ireland and the rest of the United Kingdom; what plans he has to bring prices in Northern Ireland into line with electricity prices in the rest of the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Atkins: Domestic, agricultural and small business electricity prices are lower than some parts of the United Kingdom, although there is a disparity for consumers with a peak demand in excess of 1MW. Since the price of electricity for industrial consumers in Great Britain is governed by commercially confidential contracts it is not possible to undertake such a study.

Mr. Stott: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what plans he has to re-establish an electricity interconnector between the south and the north of Ireland; what study his Department has made of the effect of such an interconnector on electricity prices in the north; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Atkins: The question of restoration of the interconnector with the Republic of Ireland is kept under regular review.

Re-establishment of the interconnector with the Republic of Ireland would have a beneficial effect on energy prices in both Northern Ireland and the Republic of Ireland.

Actively-Seeking-Work Test

Ms Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what benefit penalties can be applied to unemployed claimants who are found not to be actively seeking work; what procedures are followed before those penalties are applied; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley: Responsibility for the subject in question has been delegated to the Social Security Agency under its chief executive, Mr. Alec Wylie. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Mr. A. Wylie to Ms Clare Short, dated 12 March 1993:

As I am responsible for Social Security operational matters your recent Parliamentary Question on the benefit penalties applied to unemployed claimants who are found not to be actively seeking work and the procedures which are followed before the penalties are applied has been passed to me for reply.

The position on penalties is that if an unemployed claimant is found not to be actively seeking work, any Unemployment Benefit or Income Support that is in payment can be withdrawn for the period in question up to a maximum of two weeks.

The procedures operated before the penalty is applied are that, at the initial claim stage, unemployed claimants are fully advised about the actively seeking work conditions and that failure to meet them could result in the withdrawal of benefits. If, subsequently, the Adjudication Officer decides that sufficient efforts have not been made to find work then the Unemployment Benefit and any Income Support in payment are withdrawn.

However, in some cases where the claimant's job search has been considered inadequate but the person genuinely did not understand what was required, a warning letter would be issued and an interview arranged to ensure that the person was taking adequate steps to seek employment.

I hope you find this information helpful. A copy of this reply will appear in the Official Report and copies will be placed in the Library.

Income Support Claimants

Ms Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what plans he has to change the 21 hour rule enabling unemployed income support claimants to take up part time education courses; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley: Regulations governing social security are maintained on a United Kingdom-wide basis.

English Language Teaching

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on provision of teaching of English as a foreign language in primary schools and post-primary schools in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Hanley: There is no provision for teaching English as a foreign language in either primary or post-primary schools in Northern Ireland.

In the case of pupils whose mother tongue is not English and who have little command of English, schools are often able to make additional remedial provision from within their existing resources to meet their needs. Where needs are so significant that they cannot be met from within the school's existing resources, education and library boards can provide extra help, either in terms of additional tuition, for example through their peripatetic remedial service, or by the provision of additional resources.

Community Care

Ms Rachel Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what form his proposed alterations to existing legislation will take to enable community care trusts to be formed.

Mr. Hanley [holding answer 11 March 1993]: The Government intend to publish a proposal for a draft Order in Council later this year to enable boards to delegate certain statutory functions to health and social services trusts. The precise form and content of the order are still being considered.

Health Service

Ms Rachel Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what assessment he has made of the Eastern health and social services board's acute services proposals in relation to the criterion of clinical effectiveness for providing and purchasing acute services.

Mr. Hanley [holding answer 11 March 1993]: In formulating its proposals for purchasing acute services the Eastern health and social services board used clinical effectiveness as one of its fundamental criteria. In doing so the board was guided by the Department of Health and Social Service's regional strategy for 1992-1997, which emphasised the importance of clinical effectiveness. The board also took account of a number of reports from various professional bodies in the United Kingdom on the provision of acute hospital care.

Community Care Trusts

Mr. William O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps he intends to take to review Government policy on the creation of community care trusts in Northern Ireland from 1 April 1994; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley [holding answer 9 March 1993]: The Government have no plans to review their policy on the creation of health and social services trusts, which it sees as the natural organisation model for all provider units in the health and personal social services in Northern Ireland, offering significant benefits to patients and clients and also to staff.

My noble Friend Lord Arran has already approved 10 applications for trust status, including four from community units and recently invited three further units which had expressed an interest to submit applications.

Radioactive Material

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what measures have been taken to protect the people of east Antrim and Northern Ireland in the event of an accident in the north channel involving shipments of radioactive material.

Mr. Norris: I have been asked to reply.

Nuclear fuel flasks are designed to international standards to withstand severe accidents. The transporters of radioactive material have in place appropriate plans in the case of marine accidents for the recovery of flasks.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Sellafield

Mr. Cohen: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on the role and function of building B203 at British Nuclear Fuels Ltd. Sellafield; when it was first declared operational; and what is the expected cost of decommissioning it.

Mr. Eggar: This is a matter for the company.

Gas-powered Electricity Generation

Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list all the gas-powered stations that are operational, under construction and that have been planned, giving the capacity of each station in megawatts and the date when it is expected to start generating electricity.

Mr. Eggar: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy) on 10 November 1992, Official Report, columns 734-36. The following information reflects the change in status of a number of projects since then.

Station	Proposer	Status
Killingholme (2nd unit)	PowerGen plc	Commissioned
Charterhouse Street	Citigen Ltd.	Under construction
Deeside	Deeside Power Development Co. Ltd.	Under construction
Little Barford	National Power plc	Under construction
Medway	Medway Power Ltd.	Under construction
Spondon	Derwent Cogeneration	Under construction

There are 13 applications made under section 36 of the Electricity Act 1989 for gas-fired generating stations with a capacity greater than 50MW which have not yet been determined.

The dates when these stations are planned to come into operation are a commercial matter for the companies concerned.

Power stations in Scotland and Northern Ireland are matters for my right hon. Friends the Secretary of State for Scotland and the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland respectively.

Utilities (Pension Schemes)

Ms Estelle Morris: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what was the surplus in the pension schemes of (a) British Telecom, (b) British Gas and (c) electricity boards in the three years prior to privatisation.

Mr. Leigh: British Telecom did not have an independent pension scheme prior to privatisation in 1984. Employee contributions were made into the Post Office staff superannuation scheme. It is not possible to attribute surpluses or deficits separately to British Telecom employees and former employees within this scheme, but the overall Post Office staff superannuation scheme did not show a surplus in this period.

Valuations of the electricity supply pension scheme are normally carried out once every three years. The last valuation prior to privatisation took place on 31 March 1989 and revealed a surplus of £89 million.

There was no surplus in the British Gas staff pension schemes in the three years prior to privatisation.

Radio Amateurs

Mr. Redmond: To ask the President of the Board of Trade (1) what consideration he has given to allowing radio amateurs to use a "for sale" facility on pocket radio; and if he will make a statement;

(2) when the radio investigation service last carried out a site inspection of GB3NA and GB3SY at Barnsley; what abuse was found; and what action he is taking;

(3) how many repeaters used by amateur radio operators have on-air remote control providing for immediate shutdown;

(4) what plans he has to change the repeater franchise scheme presently held by the Radio Society of Great Britain; and if he will make a statement;

(5) what consideration he has given to the introduction of a no-code high frequency licence for licensed radio amateurs;

(6) how many amateur radio licences have been revoked or modified in the last 12 months;

(7) what action he is taking to prevent yachtsmen using pirate call signs on 14313 MHz and conducting illegal phone-patch traffic back to the United Kingdom;

(8) what consideration he has given to abolishing the requirement for log-keeping by amateur radio operators using low-power FM;

(9) how many inspections of repeater sets in respect of radio operators have been carried out in the last 12 months; how many licence violations were found; what was the most common violation; and what action he is taking to reduce violations;

(10) what representations he has received regarding the abuse of repeaters by amateur radio operators in London;

(11) what regulations govern the fees for amateur radio licences;

(12) how many people have been prosecuted for amateur radio related offences in each of the last five years; what has been the budget of the radio investigation service in each of the last five years; and what assessment he has made of the effectiveness of the monitoring and enforcement activities of the service.

Mr. Leigh: These questions concern operational matters which are the responsibility of the Radiocommunications Agency. I have asked the chief executive to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Mr. B. Maxwell to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 12 March 1993:

You recently tabled a series of questions concerning the regulation of amateur radio. As you know, the Chief Executive of the Agency has been asked to write to you with the information requested as the questions relate to operational matters for which this Agency is responsible. I am replying in his absence. The questions and the information are as follows.

Question 172 tabled on 9 March 1993: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, what consideration he has given to allowing radio amateurs to use a for sale facility on pocket radio; and if he will make a statement.

Packet messages should reflect the purpose of the amateur licence, that is self-training in wireless telegraphy. It is not felt that advertising of goods fits into such a category. Packet radio provides both in the UK and, indeed, throughout the world an immensely useful tool for the dissemination of information, the seeking of help and advice and the publication of radio related news. The Amateur Radio Licence was compiled with this in mind and hence advertising is not currently allowed. In addition, there are already numerous outlets available for buying and selling of amateur equipment, for example through amateur radio magazines and amateur radio rallies.

Question 175 tabled on 9 March 1993: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, when the RIS last carried out a site inspection of GB3NA and GB3SY at Barnsley; what abuse was found; and what action he is taking.

GB3NA was last inspected on 13 September 1990. No contraventions were found. No inspections have been carried out of GB3SY.

Question 176 tabled on 9 March 1993: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, how many repeaters used by amateur radio operators have on-air remote control providing for immediate shut-down.

The Agency is prepared to consider representations from any repeater group requesting on-air remote control. One application has been granted to date and one application is under consideration.

Question 177 tabled on 9 March 1993: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, what plans he has to change the repeater franchise scheme presently held by the Radio Society of Great Britain; and if he will make a statement.

A decision has been made in principle to change the present arrrangement. From 1 April 1993, authority for these stations to operate will be granted by the issue of Notices of Variation to the repeater keeper's personal Amateur Radio Licence. Further details will be announced shortly.

Question 178 tabled on 9 March 1993: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, what consideration he has given to the introduction of a no-code high frequency licence for licensed radio amateurs.

The International Radio Regulations require that a licence to operate on frequencies below 30 MHz can be granted only to radio amateurs who have proved their ability to send and receive Morse code signals. The Agency is consulting widely on this issue and initial responses indicate that there are strong opinions both for and against this requirement.

Question 182 tabled on 9 March 1993: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, how many amateur licences have been revoked or modified in the last 12 months.

One amateur radio licence has been revoked and two re-applications have been refused during the last 12 months. During this period one amateur radio licence has been modified by the issue of a Notice of Variation.

Question 183 tabled on 9 March 1993: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, what action he is taking to prevent yachtsmen using pirate call signs on 14313 MHz and conducting illegal phone-patch traffic back to the United Kingdom.

Where complaints have alleged licence contraventions by United Kingdom amateurs, the Agency has an arrangement to pass details to the Radio Society of Great Britain's Amateur Radio Observation Society (AROS) to inquire into the matter in the first instance. AROS will decide in the light of its findings, whether to report the matter to the Agency for possible further investigation.

Question 186, tabled on 9 March 1993: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, what consideration he has given to abolishing the requirement for log-keeping by amateur radio operators using low power FM.

A radio amateur is required to keep a permanent record (a log) of all transmissions with the exception of transmissions from low power devices as defined in sub-clause 2(4)(b) of the amateur radio licence.

Question 187 tabled on 9 March 1993: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, how many inspections of repeater sets in respect of radio operators have been carried out in the last 12 months; how many licence violations were found; what was the most common violation; and what action he is taking to reduce violations.

There have been 27 inspections of amateur repeaters in the current financial year to the end of February. These revealed

5 licence contraventions. There were two instances each of removal of attenuators and unauthorised unattended operation and one instance of spurious emissions.

The Agency's priorities are set by Ministers. Top priority is given to tackling interference which could endanger lives and to helping those whose business operations are disrupted as a result of interference. Other complaints, including those relating to hobby radio, are dealt with after higher priorities have been met. Within this limitation, the Agency has devoted considerable effort to tackling repeater abuse. In addition to the programme of site inspections, actions taken in response to complaints have included imposing restrictions on individuals' use of repeaters, requiring attenuators to be fitted to reduce coverage, limiting the hours in which repeaters operate and, where necessary and justified in the public interest, prosecuting. Prosecution usually requires extensive monitoring to obtain supporting evidence.

Question 188 tabled on 9 March 1993: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, what representations he has received regarding the abuse of repeaters by amateur radio operators in London.

Since the beginning of 1992, the Agency has received a total of 8 representations from 3 individuals complaining about abuse of repeaters in London and one letter objecting that measures taken by the Agency to combat the abuse were excessive.

Question 189 tabled on 9 March 1993: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, what regulations govern the fees for amateur radio licences.

The current amateur radio licence fee is set by the Wireless Telegraphy (Licence Charges) Regulations 1991 (S.I. 1991/542) as amended by the Wireless Telegraphy (Licence Charges) (Amendment) Regulations 1992 (S.I. 1992/362). These Regulations are made under Sections 1 and 2 of the Wireless Telegraphy Act 1949 and the fees are set out within the limitations set out in Part V of the Schedule 1 and Part 1 of Schedule 2 to the Department of Trade and Industry (Fees) Order 1988 (S.I. 1988/93).

Question 192 tabled on 9 March 1993: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, how many people have been prosecuted for amateur radio related offences in each of the last five years; what has been the budget of the Radio Investigation Service in each of the last five years; and what assessment he has made of the effectiveness of the monitoring and enforcement activities of the services.

Statistics on prosecutions are published annually in the Agency's report. I am enclosing a copy for your attention. The figures for the last five financial years are 3 (1987-88), 7 (1988-89), 3 (1989-90), 5 (1990-91), and 4 (1991-92). All resulted in convictions.

Total expenditure by the Radio Investigation Service (RIS) since the Agency was created was £5·51 million in financial year 1990-91 and £5·99 million in financial year 1991-92. These figures are net of receipts and do not include overheads. Comparable figures for previous years could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Effectiveness of the Agency's monitoring and enforcement activities is assessed against the enforcement quality of service targets set by Ministers and published in the Agency's annual report. In 1991-92, the targets were to handle 100% of safety of life complaints within 24 hours, to handle 95% of business complaints within 5 working days and to handle 95% of domestic complaints within 1 month. The RIS succeeded in meeting or surpassing all these targets, which have been made even more demanding for the current financial year. Performance figures will be published in the Agency's next annual report.

I enclose a full set of the Agency's amateur radio information sheets for your information and hope this is all helpful.

Air-cooled Diesel Engines

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what developments he has funded in the industrial research and production of air-cooled diesel engines optimised for emission minimisation.

Mr. Eggar: My Department has not funded research and development specifically of air-cooled diesel engines, although considerable funds have been given to encourage research into cleaner diesel engines generally.

Plastic

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what communications he has received from the European Centre for Plastics in the Environment concerning its work on eco-balance analysis of plastic production and recycling.

Mr. Eggar: Officials in my Department's Environment Division have had frequent contact and correspondence with the centre over several years on plastics recycling issues, including a number of major reports on plastics waste management to which the centre has contributed.

Petrol Stations

Mrs. Lait: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what estimate has been made of the costs of implementing stage 2 of draft EC directive 8348/92 for (a) urban petrol stations, (b) rural petrol stations, (c) independently owned petrol stations and (d) petrol stations owned or franchised by the oil companies.

Mr. Eggar: The Commission has yet to make a proposal on stage 2 VOCs controls during car refuelling.

Mrs. Lait: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what estimate has been made of the cost of implementation of draft EC directive 8348/92, stage 1, to petrol stations in rural areas.

Mr. Eggar: The costs of implementation of stage 1 VOCs emissions controls at rural petrol stations is currently being reviewed with industry.

Offshore Oil and Gas Industry

Dr. Godman: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many (a) males and (b) females have been employed in the offshore oil and gas installations, rigs and vessels in each of the past 10 years.

Mr. Eggar: An annual survey carried out by the Inland Revenue estimated that the total employed in offshore oil and gas installations, rigs and vessels in 1992 was some 29,500. These surveys do not distinguish between male and female. Estimates from previous surveys are given in my Department's reports to Parliament, the "Development of the Oil and Gas Resources of the United Kingdom" (the Brown Book), copies of which are available in the Library. The 1993 edition of the Brown Book will be available by the end of April.

Trawsfynydd Power Station

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement regarding the discovery of broken rods in Trawsfynydd nuclear power station's reactor 2.

Mr. Eggar: Nuclear Electric discovered in 1992, during routine inspection work of reactor 2's core restraint system, that two tie rods had failed. A similar inspection of reactor 1 revealed no failures. The company subsequently carried out a structural analysis of the reactors' core restraint systems. This is currently being evaluated by the Health and Safety Executive's nuclear installations inspectorate as part of its assessment of the case for the return to service of the Trawsfynydd reactors.

Biofuels

Mr. Flynn: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what plans he has to encourage an increase in the production of biofuels in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave on 1 February 1993, Official Report, column 57.

Coal Industry

Mr. Lester: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what plans he has to publish the report he commissioned on 23 December from John T. Boyd on the 10 collieries.

Mr. Heseltine: I announced on 23 December that I had appointed John T. Boyd to report on the 10 pits proposed for closure last October and currently subject to a consultation process between British Coal and the mining unions. I asked Boyds to consider in particular whether British Coal's criteria for closure (loss making and no prospect of viability in the foreseeable future) were met in relation to all or any of them. I also asked Boyds to report on whether the fabric of those pits was being preserved in accordance with assurances that British Coal had given.

Boyds sent its draft report to British Coal, the mining unions and my Department for comment on 22 February in accordance with the terms of reference, and were required to take account of comments received in finalising their report. As I indicated to British Coal and the unions on 3 March, my Department, as a matter of policy, did not comment on the draft report.

Boyds's final report has been sent to British Coal, the mining unions and myself today. I have placed copies in the Library, and I am arranging for the report to be made available to the public shortly.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Contracting Out

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list all those services or functions that have been contracted out from his Department since November 1991 without market testing an in-house bid against external competition, with, in each instance the successful contractor and the reasons for the decision to exclude an in-house bid.

Mr. Curry: There have been no decisions to exclude in-house bids in any market tests of existing departmental services or functions.

Set-aside Land

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has had about the application of the EC set-aside policy to the United Kingdom in comparison with its application to other EC members.

Mr. Curry: I receive requests from time to time for information about levels of uptake in the United Kingdom and other EC member states under the various EC set-aside arrangements. I have also received a number of representations about the possible impact of a GATT settlement on the set-aside requirement for the arable area payments scheme.

Archaeological Monuments

Mr. Martlew: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if it is his policy to refuse grant aid if the payment will result in damage to archaeological monuments; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Curry: In England it is a condition of grant under the farm and conservation grant scheme, which provides capital grants to farmers on a range of investments of benefit to conservation and the environment, that English Heritage is consulted on any work to be submitted for grant aid which might affect a scheduled ancient monument or listed building. Similar arrangements apply elsewhere in the United Kingdom. It is most unlikely that grant would be paid on any work to which English Heritage or its equivalents had objected.

Paper Sludge Recycling

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment the Agricultural Development Advisory Service has made of the safety of the recycling of paper sludge on agricultural land.

Mr. Gummer: ADAS have carried out work in this area on a commercial basis. The matter is therefore one in which ADAS have delegated responsibility and I have asked the ADAS chief executive to reply direct.

Letter from Dr. J. M. Walsh to Mr. Nicholas Winterton, dated 15 March 1993:

I am responding on behalf of the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, to your Parliamentary question regarding assessments made by ADAS of the safety of the recycling of paper sludge on agricultural land.

1. ADAS have been commissioned by a number of paper producers to investigate the application of paper sludge waste to land. All of these materials originate from different paper manufacturing processes. This means that the chemical and physical characteristics of the waste derived from each source is different.
2. All of the paper wastes investigated by ADAS have been analysed chemically and microbiologically for the presence of plant nutrients and toxic materials. Plant growth studies and field experiments have also been undertaken to assess their suitability for recycling to land as a beneficial material.
3. The safety of the recycling of paper sludge on agricultural land is dependant on the nature of the material and the way in which it is used. Generalised comments relating to the safety of any material cannot be given without qualification.
4. In each of the above cases, the material was found to be suitable for recycling to land for the purpose of fertilising or otherwise beneficially conditioning. Recommendations have been given to ensure that the wastes are applied to land according to all relevant Acts of Parliament and Codes of Practice.
5. ADAS have been engaged as consultants to undertake on-going monitoring of field recycling operations for one particular client. Each field to receive the sludge is investigated and the soil analysed prior to the deposit. The material is not re-cycled to unsuitable fields. Those fields which receive the waste are re-visited, to ensure that the material has been applied according to a specified Codes of Practice, formulated by ADAS.

Haddock

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what efforts he is making to restrict the landing of North sea haddock to avoid early closure of the fishery;

(2) if he will ensure that the organisations responsible for the management of quotas act to reduce the present glut of haddock.

Mr. Curry [pursuant to his reply, 19 February 1993, c. 370-71]: We have now written to producers organisations (POs) about measures to improve the management of annual quotas with particular reference to the cod, haddock and whiting fisheries in areas IV and VI. In our discussions with POs we had proposed a system of quarterly catch limits for cod, haddock and whiting and the periodic closures of individual fisheries to PO vessels where a PO had exceeded a quarterly catch limit by more than 10 per cent. in any quarter during the year.

In response, POs made it clear that they would prefer to be allowed to manage their sectoral allocations according to their particular circumstances and the needs of their members. After very careful consideration we have agreed that POs should continue to manage their sectoral allocations for cod, haddock and whiting without imposing the tighter discipline of quarterly catch limits, but I must emphasise that in retaining flexibility to manage sectoral allocations POs must take full responsibility for the actions of their members and the impact on markets. It is in the best interests of POs and their members that fishing activity and landings should be organised so as to provide for orderly marketing and to avoid any repeat of the early closures of fisheries which occured in 1992.

Archaelogical Monuments

Mr. Martlew: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food from which grant schemes his Ministry provides payments for the management and protection of archaeological monuments; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Curry: Farmers participating in the environmentally sensitive areas (ESAs) scheme must ensure that their farming practices do not damage any archaeological monuments or other historic features on their land. Under recent revisions of the scheme I have introduced additional payments for particular works to protect archaeological monuments and other historic features.

Biofuels

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has to increase the area of set-aside land that is used for producing raw materials for biofuels.

Mr. Curry: Any set-aside land can be used for producing suitable raw materials for biofuels, provided the grower has a contract with a processor and complies with the Community rules on the scheme.

We are continuing to press the Commission to introduce rules for non-rotational set-aside this year. This will allow perennial crops to be grown for biofuels on set-aside land.

Coppicing

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has to extend the total area of land now used for coppicing.

Sir Hector Monro: I have been asked to reply.

The Forestry Commission's woodland grant scheme provides grants for the establishment of new areas of coppice and was recently extended to include short-rotation coppice.

WALES

Care Programmes

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the health authorities and local authorities in Wales who do not provide care programmes for those people in their area and living in the community who are under the care of a consultant psychiatrist.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: None.

Committee of the Regions

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will place a copy in the Library of his note to Plaid Cymru specifying the minimum of Welsh representatives in the United Kingdom delegation of the Committee of the European Regions; what consultations he has had and what undertakings he has given in relation to separate party political affiliation in the Welsh representation; what mechanism he proposes for selection or election of such separate party political representation; and when he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: No.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what consultations he has had in relation to the setting up of a forum for interchange of views with those representing Wales on the Committee of the European Regions; what provisions he envisages for frequency of its meetings, for funding for its secretariat and other support services; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: I am considering a range of representations.

Radon Levels

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he expects to announce the results of the Radiological Protection Board survey of Wales.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The results of the next phase of the survey of radon levels in Wales are expected in spring 1994.

Dental Services

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many private and how many national health dental practices there are in Welshpool; how many there were in 1989; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Information received from Powys FHSA indicates that there are two dental practices in Welshpool treating NHS patients at the present time and that there were two in 1989. No information is available centrally on the number of private dental practices.

Temporary Classrooms

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many Portakabin classrooms there are in Wales; how many there were in 1979, 1985 and 1990; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Wyn Roberts: Statutory responsibility for the provision of school buildings rests with local education authorities, and this information is not held centrally.

Nuclear Fuel (Transport by Sea)

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what assessment he has made of the demands that would arise from local authorities and other public and environmental protection services of a ship being grounded on the Welsh coast while transporting spent nuclear fuel; if he will list the organisations he has consulted regarding such an event; and what plans he has to require and inter-agency exercise involving his Department and all other relevant organisations in Wales to identify and plan for such an event.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Within the United Kingdom, the Department of Transport is responsible for the regulations governing, and for assessing the safety of, all radioactive material transports. Stringent safety requirements mean that the flasks containing spent nuclear fuel are designed and tested to such a standard that it is extremely unlikely they would be damaged if a ship carrying them ran aground. The carriers of such flasks also have comprehensive contingency plans, regularly tested in exercises, for all stages of a ship's journey; and these include the safe recovery of flasks in any marine accident.

In the unlikely event of a ship carrying radioactive cargo running aground off the Welsh coast, the Department of Transport would inform the Welsh Office and other relevant Departments. Other local interests would be informed and involved as appropriate; and established civil emergency arrangements brought into action as required.

Anglesey Mining

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if the offer of regional selective assistance to Anglesey Mining is still outstanding; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: I announced an offer of regional selective assistance to Anglesey Mining plc in October 1991. Further details about the project are commercially confidential.

Environmentally Sensitive Areas

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when the orders establishing the environmentally sensitive areas announced in June will be laid before the House.

Mr. David Hunt: The orders relating to the proposed Anglesey and Radnor environmentally sensitive areas will be laid before the House shortly. I plan to lay the orders relating to the proposed Preseli and Clwydian Range environmentally sensitive areas later this year.

Biofuels

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what plans he has to encourage the expansion of the total of jobs in Wales in the production of biofuels.

Mr. David Hunt: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply given to the hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North (Mr. Dafis) on 1 February at column 57, by my hon. Friend the Minister for Energy.

Energy Forestry

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what plans he has to encourage an increase in the area of land in Wales used for short rotation coppicing and other energy forestry uses.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The group which I have set up to promote the future development of forestry in Wales will consider short-rotation coppicing and other energy forestry uses in the course of their work. In the meantime, the Forestry Commission's woodland grant scheme already provides grants for the establishment of new areas of coppice.

Nature Reserve

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what funding and legal procedures he proposes for mitigation and compensation measures at Redwick and Goldcliff in the county of Gwent for the possible loss of inter-tidal feeding grounds at Cardiff Bay; what consultations he has had with the Cardiff Bay development corporation and the Countryside Council for Wales in relation to the capital and revenue funding for this proposed national nature reserve at these two sites on the Gwent Levels; what consultation procedures he proposes with the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds and other local wildlife interests; what comparable measures of compensation and mitigation he proposes for the loss of coastal fisheries, arising from the proposed barrage; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: My officials have held a series of consultations with the Countryside Council for Wales, Royal Society for the Protection of Birds and Cardiff Bay development corporation about the funding and acquisition of the proposed reserve. All three bodies, together with my Department, are represented on the steering group which oversaw the feasibility study. The steering group will continue in existence to consider details of design, planning permission and acquisition of the sites.

A range of local wildlife interests were consulted during the feasibility study, and this consultation will continue as the process of design continues. Fishing piers on the seaward side of the barrage will compensate for the loss of existing sea angling sites within Cardiff bay.

Welsh Development Agency

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what consultations he has had with the Welsh Development Agency in relation to the Touche Ross report on regularity and propriety of financial arrangements in the agency.

Mr. David Hunt: None.

Yale Sixth Form College

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make it his policy to assist in the relocation of Yale sixth form college to the Grove Park school/War Memorial hospital site in Wrexham.

Sir Wyn Roberts: Under the Further and Higher Education Act 1992 responsibility for securing the provision of further education, including provision in sixth form colleges, will pass from the local education authorities to the Further Education Funding Council for Wales (FEFCW) on 1 April.

The FEFCW has established a group to consider, and to provide it with advice about, further education requirements in Wrexham and what accommodation arrangements are needed. The group, which includes representatives from Yale sixth form college, the North East Wales Institute of Higher Education and the North East Wales training and enterprise council will consider all options including the relocation of the college to the Grove Park school/War Memorial hospital site.

EMPLOYMENT

Offshore Oil and Gas Industry

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many officially recorded warnings have been issued by Health and Safety Executive officials to those employers and/or managers deemed to have transgressed either national or European Community legislation and regulations which relate to the safety and safe-working practices of persons employed in the offshore oil and gas industries; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Since assuming responsibility for enforcement of offshore safety on 1 April 1991, the Health and Safety Executive (HSE) has served 17 improvement notices and seven prohibition notices on owners and operators of offshore installations operating in United Kingdom waters under existing offshore health and safety legislation. In addition it is usual practice for HSE to write following an inspection confirming any remedial action agreed to by employers during the visit; the number of such letters sent is not routinely recorded, and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what plans she has to alter or modify the offshore survival course and qualifications required of those seeking to obtain employment in the offshore oil and gas fields; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: None. Employers have a duty under the Health and Safety at Work, etc. Act 1974 to provide adequate training to ensure the health and safety of their employees. I understand that the guidelines issued by the United Kingdom Offshore Operators' Association (UKOOA) recommending minimum standards for survival courses are currently being reviewed by it. The Offshore Petroleum Industry Training Organisation (OPITO) develops and monitors course standards within these guidelines.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many persons successfully completed the offshore survival course required of all those seeking employment in the offshore oil and gas fields in each of the last seven years; and which educational and training institutions are officially approved in this regard.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The Offshore Petroleum Industry Training Organisation (OPITO) maintains a database providing details of survival and other training courses attended by all personnel seeking employment in the United Kingdom offshore oil and gas industry. OPITO's records indicate that since 1 July 1989, 58,711 persons successfully completed offshore survival courses and 40,979 completed survival refresher courses. Information prior to July 1989 is not readily obtainable and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

OPITO is responsible for approving training establishments providing survival and other offshore training courses. The following establishments have been approved by OPITO to provide offshore survival courses:

Blackpool and the Fylde College Fleetwood Offshore Survival Centre
Humberside Offshore Training Association
PETANS Ltd.
RGIT Survival Centre Ltd.
Southampton Institute of Higher Education
South Tyneside College

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what recent discussions have been held with her counterparts in other member states of the European Community and with the representatives of the Norwegian Government concerning the implementation of EC legislation relating to the safety and safe working practices of those employed in the offshore oil and gas industries; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: My right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State attended the Social Affairs Council on 30 April 1992 when the directive concerning the minimum requirements for improving the safety and health protection of workers in the mineral-extracting industries through drilling (the Extractive Industries Directive) reached common position. My noble Friend, the Baroness Denton of Wakefield was present at the Council of Consumer Protection and Information when this directive was adopted on 3 November 1992. I have had no other discussions on these matters with colleagues in other member states in the European Community, or with members of the Norwegian Government.

Officials of the Health and Safety Executive however, regularly meet with their counterparts in other EC member states and in Norway to discuss relevant offshore health and safety issues, including the implementation of EC health and safety legislation offshore.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many prosecutions have been sought in each of the past four years by the Health and Safety Executive in (a) the Scottish courts and (b) the English courts in respect of breaches of national and European Community legislation and regulations which relate to the safety of those employed in the offshore oil and gas fields; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Since assuming responsibility for enforcement of offshore safety on 1 April 1991, the Health and Safety Executive has recommended prosecution action for breaches of offshore safety legislation in respect of 14 cases in the Scottish courts and five cases in the English courts.

In addition, three convictions in the Scottish courts after 1 April 1991 resulted from recommendations made prior to that date. The then Secretary of State for Energy was responsible for offshore safety matters prior to 1 April 1991.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if she will list the European Community legislation which relates to the safety and working practices of (a) production platform and rig personnel, (b) officers and crews of emergency/standby vessels and (c) helicopter crews and passengers in the offshore oil and gas fields; and what means of monitoring this legislation are employed by her officials.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The following regulations were made under the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974 in response to EC health and safety directives. They apply to offshore installations and activities in connection with them as defined in the Application Outside Great Britain Order 1989:

Control of Lead at Work Regulations 1980
Ionising Radiation Regulations 1985
Control of Asbestos at Work Regulations 1987
Control of Asbestos at Work (Amendment) Regulations 1992
Asbestos (Prohibitions) Regulations 1992
Management of Health and Safety at Work Regulations 1992
Provision and Use of Work Equipment Regulations 1992
Manual Handling Operations Regulations 1992
Personal Protective Equipment at Work Regulations 1992
Health and Safety (Display Screen Equipment) Regulations 1992
Genetically Modified Organisms (Contained Use) Regulations 1992

It is the responsibility of dutyholders under the regulations to comply with them. Health and Safety Executive inspectors will monitor compliance as part of their planned programme of inspections.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what plans she has to modify or change the training and qualifications of the officers and crews of emergency/standby vessels operating in the offshore oil and gas industries; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The joint Health and Safety Executive (HSE) and Department of Transport code on the assessment of the suitability of standby vessels attending offshore installations outlines the training required by standby vessel crew to ensure compliance with the code. At the request of HSE, the Offshore Petroleum Industry Training Organisation has been developing standards for this training. This process is now almost complete and work is in hand to validate the courses offered by training establishments. There are no plans to modify or change the training requirements in the code, which reflect Lord Cullen's concerns that the crew of standby vessels must be fully trained to undertake their emergency duties.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether all emergency/standby vessels operating in the off-shore oil and gas fields now conform to the revised code of suitability of emergency/standby vessels; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: All standby vessels attending offshore installations are fully certificated as complying with the code. This has been the case since 1 January 1993 when the code came fully into effect.

Self-employment

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many people were registered as self-employed in Suffolk and Norfolk for each of the last 10 years.

Mr. McLoughlin: Estimates of self-employed people by county are available only from the census of population for April 1991 which shows 39,915 self-employed people in Suffolk and 51,331 in Norfolk.

Quarterly estimates from spring 1992 and annual estimates from spring 1983 are available from the "Labour Force Survey" for the East Anglia region as a whole which covers Suffolk, Norfolk, and Cambridgeshire.

Self-employed people in East Anglia

	Number
Spring 1983	98,000
Spring 1984	116,000
Spring 1985	118,000
Spring 1986	109,000
Spring 1987	130,000
Spring 1988	147,000
Spring 1989	158,000
Spring 1990	151,000
Spring 1991	138,000
Spring 1992	143,000
Summer 1992	134,000

Source: Labour Force Survey (not seasonally adjusted).

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if she will make a statement about what steps she is taking further to increase the numbers of the self-employed.

Mr. McLoughlin: The purpose of the Department's business start-up (formerly enterprise allowance) scheme is specifically to help unemployed people to set up their own business. Over 600,000 people had entered the scheme by April 1992. Over 40,000 entrants are expected this year (1992-93).

The Department also contributes funds to support the work of the Prince's youth business trust and the Prince's Scottish youth business trust in making loans available to disadvantaged 18-25 year olds who have not been able to raise funds for their business ideas from other sources. Some 15,000 businesses have been supported by the two trusts since 1986.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Paice: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what labour market-related statistics are available for individual training and enterprise council areas; and if she will provide such information as is available on a quarterly basis for the claimant unemployment figures for 1990 to 1992 for the Bedfordshire, Cambridgeshire, Essex, Hertfordshire, Norfolk and Waveney, Greater Peterborough and Suffolk training and enterprise council areas.

Mr. McLoughlin: Wherever possible, labour market statistics are available for training and enterprise council areas: for example, employment data from the census of employment, population data, vacancy data and data on the levels of claimant unemployment. All these data are available from the NOMIS database in the Library and more information on the coverage of the statistics available can be obtained from the NOMIS reference manuals.

Earnings

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if she will provide a table showing the average gross weekly earnings of full-time workers in (a) each region and (b) each county in each year since 1979 as a percentage of the Great Britain averages.

Mr. McLoughlin: The information requested can be found in tables 110 and 113 of Part E of the "New Earnings Survey" for each of the years concerned. Copies of the survey are available in the Library.

Youth Training

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many youth training places were available through the Leeds training and enterprise council in (a) 1991-92, (b) 1992-93 and (c) 1993-94.

Mr. McLoughlin: The information is not available in the form requested.

At present there are 2,813 young people on youth training in Leeds. The figure at March 1992 and April 1991 was 2,885 and 3,400 respectively. These figures reflect the demographic downturn in school leavers.

The Leeds TEC is confident that the Government's guarantee of a training place to eligible young people will be met.

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many young people are waiting for a place on a youth training scheme; and what proportion of those waiting (a) have special needs and (b) are from ethnic minorities.

Mr. McLoughlin: There are currently fewer than 6,750 young people in England covered by the YT guarantee who have been waiting for a YT place for eight or more weeks. Information is not available on how many of these are young people with special needs or from ethnic minorities.

Underpayment

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment on how many occasions illegal underpayment was detected in (a) England, (b) Yorkshire and Humberside and (c) West Yorkshire, in the last five years for which figures are available; and how many prosecutions were undertaken in these areas.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: In 1992, the wages inspectorate found 5,165 establishments in England paying one or more of their workers less than statutory minimum remuneration. The comparable figure for Yorkshire and Humberside was 875. I regret that there are no separate statistics for West Yorkshire. The inspectorate carried out a total of 27,193 checks on establishments in England and 3,173 in Yorkshire and Humberside. In England, some 97 per cent. of the workers covered were paid at least the statutory minimum remuneration.

The policy of the inspectorate under all Governments has been to seek compliance with wages council orders by persuasion and advice. Prosecution is usually considered only where an offence is deliberate or repeated. In 1992 there were eight prosecutions for underpayment in England, five of which were in Yorkshire and Humberside.

Anglesey Mining

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment on what date the regional selective assistance offer by the Welsh Office to Anglesey Mining was published in the "Employment Gazette"; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. McLoughlin: No information on payments to this company has been published in "Employment Gazette".

Leaflet Storage, West Yorkshire

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if she will arrange for the tender for leaflet storage and distribution in West Yorkshire to be reconsidered; if she will instruct officials to enter discussions with the consortium of local authorities concerned to find ways of safeguarding employment within ISCO5; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. McLoughlin: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service Agency under its chief executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from M. E. G. Fogden to Mr. Max Madden, dated 15 March 1993.

As the Employment Service is an Executive Agency, the Secretary of State has asked me to write to you direct to respond to your Parliamentary Question about the tender for leaflet storage and distribution in West Yorkshire. This is something which falls within the responsibilities delegated to me as Chief Executive of the Agency.

Several companies including another Sheltered Workshop were invited to tender for the warehousing and distribution contract. As a Sheltered Workshop ISCO5 was given consideration under the Priority Suppliers Scheme for Government contracts. This included the "offer back" facility, allowing them an opportunity to submit a revised bid. In the end, however, the contract has been awarded elsewhere on the basis of quality, value for money and fair and open competition.

The Employment Service through the Sheltered Employment Procurement and Consultancy Service (SEPACS) will give every support to ISCO5 in mitigating the effects of the loss of this contract and will continue to do all it can to assist in the development of future business. Should any redundancies occur among the disabled workers, we will offer help in finding alternative opportunities through our local offices and special advisory services.

As decided by the Administration Committee of the House of Commons, Chief Executive replies to written Parliamentary Questions will now be published in the Official Report. I will also place a copy of this letter in the Library of the House.

Skill Centres

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment, pursuant to her answers of 19 November 1992, Official Report, column 337, and 4 March 1993, Official Report, columns 272-73, what happened to the skill centres in Cardiff, Deptford, Edinburgh RO, Enfield (annex), Ipswich, Manchester RO and Swindon.

Mr. McLoughlin: The skill centres at Cardiff, Deptford, Swindon and Enfield were taken over by Astra Training

Services Limited (Astra) in May 1990. The Department's freehold interest in Enfield was transferred to Astra. Astra occupied the Cardiff, Deptford and Swindon sites on short term lease arrangements, whilst the Department put the sites on the open market. Astra relocated its training business at Swindon in July 1992.

The skill centre at Ipswich was initially taken over by the Training for Industry and Commerce Company (TICC) Ltd. and subsequently by Portals Engineering Limited under short term lease arrangements. The Department put the site on the open market when the training business was relocated in September 1992.

The Manchester RO and Edinburgh RO were Skills Training Agency (STA) regional offices (ROs), not training centres. Both sites were disposed of by the Department following the privatisation of the STA in May 1990.

Executive Agencies

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what plans she has for the creation of further executive agencies.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: None. However, in line with other Government Departments, the Employment Department continues to review its activities to identify possible agency candidates.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Legal Aid

42. Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what proposals he has to amend his plans for reforms to the legal aid regime.

Mr. John M. Taylor: I will shortly be laying statutory instruments before the House to implement the changes to legal aid eligibility and to make other changes in relation to fees and payments made to lawyers in criminal legal aid cases.

Magistrates Courts

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will publish a list of the magistrates courts in Greater London in order of the proportion of debtors gaoled in the last available year; and what was the number and percentage of debtors gaoled in each case.

Mr. John M. Taylor: The information requested is not recorded centrally, and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

I understand, however, that, in 1990, 2,791 debtors of all kinds were received into prison establishments in England and Wales. Imprisonment will occur only when there has been wilful refusal to pay or culpable neglect to do so.

Community Charge

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what monitoring he undertakes of magistrates's decisions to ensure consistency in the conduct of committal proceedings for non-payment of community charge; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John M. Taylor: None; it is not for the Government to seek to intervene in the judicial discretion of the courts.

Witnesses

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many applications there have been for witnesses in criminal cases to remain anonymous in each of the last five years for which figures are available.

Mr. John M. Taylor: No figures are kept for such applications.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many applications there have been under section 23(3)(b) of the Criminal Justice Act 1988.

Mr. John M. Taylor: No figures are kept for such applications.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many applications there have been for the use of screens during trials, excluding sexual offences and juvenile cases, during each of the last five years for which figures are available.

Mr. John M. Taylor: No figures for the use of screens during trials are kept; however, my Department has very recently started to collect information on the ways in which child witnesses under 17 years of age give evidence in the Crown court. This survey will include the use of screens for all types of offences, including non-sexual offences, and will supplement the information already collated on the use of the live TV link equipment.

Domestic Violence

Mrs. Helen Jackson: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many cases relating to domestic violence have been referred to the legal services ombudsman since the position was formed.

Mr. John M. Taylor: These statistics are not available in the form requested.

Benzodiazepines

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will list (a) the total sum of moneys paid out by the Legal Aid Board in connection with the pursuit of compensation cases for addiction to benzodiazepines and (b) the way in which the money has been spent.

Mr. John M. Taylor: The final cost to the Legal Aid Fund in respect of litigation relating to benzodiazepine drugs cannot be quantified until work done under the legal aid certificates has been concluded and all solicitors' bills have been paid. The generic expenditure on all the benzodiazepine drugs cases in litigation is estimated so far to amount to approximately £3 million, though further, as yet unquantified, costs have also been incurred. The money has been spent to enable the individual claims to be progressed in accord with directions laid down by the court.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many applications for legal aid are outstanding in cases involving the pursuit of compensation against Roche Products; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John M. Taylor: No applications for legal aid are outstanding in cases involving the pursuit of compensation for addiction to benzodiazepine drugs manufactured by Roche. A total of 6,270 legal aid certificates have been issued in recent years relating to benzodiazepine drugs manufactured by Roche. In the light of the statutory criteria under the Legal Aid Act 1988, legally aided Roche claimants have been sent letters informing them that their legal aid certificates may be discharged and inviting them to show cause why they should not be. There is a right of appeal against discharge.

DEFENCE

Aldermaston

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 29 January, Official Report, column 900, what is the estimated cost of decommissioning the Herald reactor at AWE Aldermaston; and what is the current timetable for this decommissioning.

Mr Aitken: The current timetable for decommissioning the Herald reactor at AWE Aldermaston in accordance with the International Atomic Energy Authority's guidelines is (a) stage 1—storage with surveillance, which is expected to be completed in January 1995; (b) stage 2—restricted site release, which is expected to take place during 1997-98; and (c) stage 3—unrestricted site release. There will be a gap of at least 50 years before stage 3 can begin, during which time the remaining structure will be kept under periodic surveillance and maintenace. The estimated cost of this decommissioning is some £8 million.

Vanguard Submarines

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether the Vanguard class submarines will be capable of receiving extremely low frequency radio signals.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: We do not currently plan that the Vanguard class will have such a capability.

Princess Mary Hospital, Halton

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list for each of the last five years (a) the number of patients treated at Princess Mary hospital, Halton, (b) the number of patients treated each year in each specialty and (c) the number of patients each year who were (i) service personnel, (ii) retired RAF personnel and (iii) local residents; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Information is not held centrally in the form requested. Available figures are:

(a) Total service and NHS[1] patients[2] treated at the Princess Mary's RAF hospital, Halton, 1987-88 to 1991-92

	Service	NHS	Total

Vulcan Bomber

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Upminster (Sir N. Bonsor) of 26 October 1992, Official Report, column 507, if he will make a statement on the position with respect to preserving the last flying Vulcan bomber XH 558.

Mr. Aitken: I hope to make an announcement about the future of the Vulcan shortly.

Nuclear Weapons (Transport)

Ms Gordon: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what steps he is taking to comply with EC directive 89/618/Euratom by initiating a public information campaign on matters of nuclear safety connected with the movement of military convoys carrying nuclear weapons around the country, in case of accident.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: None. The EC directive 89/618/EURATOM has been enacted in Great Britain by means of the Public Information for Radiation Emergency Regulations 1992, which came into force on 1 January 1993. These regulations require prior information to be given to the public only when it is reasonably foreseeable that a radiation emergency would affect the public in an identifiable area. Given the stringent safety standards we apply, we do not believe that military convoys carrying nuclear weapons can give rise to such a radiation emergency.

Submarine Sales

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what steps his Department and the Defence Export Sales Organisation are taking to promote the sale of United Kingdom submarines to Taiwan.

Mr. Aitken: None.

Archaeological Monuments

Mr. Martlew: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what action his Department takes to ensure that all archaeological monuments on military land are (a) protected from damage and destruction (b) effectively managed; how many scheduled monuments are contained on land owned by his Department; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: My Department is very conscious of its responsibilities for the stewardship of archaeological monuments. The majority are located on military training areas and, where necessary, restrictions are imposed on the types of training which can be undertaken. On the largest training area, Salisbury Plain, we have recently completed a management agreement for the major archaeological site groups in conjunction with English Heritage; elsewhere monuments are cared for by the defence land agent in close consultation with the relevant national and county archaeological bodies. The exact number of archaeological monuments on the defence estate could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Leishmaniasis

Mr. Hinchcliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what investigations he has undertaken to identify potential Leishmaniasis contamination among personnel serving during the Gulf crisis;

(2) what studies he has undertaken to ensure that military personnel returning from the Gulf are not contaminated with Leishmaniasis.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: All military personnel are subject to regular medical examination. Clinical surveillance of military personnel exposed to the risk of tropical disease, including Leishmaniasis, was maintained during the Gulf crisis and continues to be maintained.

Mr. Hinchcliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what information he has on the incidence of Leishmaniasis in military personnel serving during the Gulf war.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: No cases of Leishmaniasis have been found among British military personnel who served in the Gulf during the Gulf crisis.

RAF Support Management Group

Mr. Robert Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many visiting officials were involved, and over what period, in the consideration being given to the use of the Army apprentices college for the RAF support management group, Harrogate.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Use of the Pennypot site occupied by the Army apprentices school was considered in 1992 as part of the original options studied for the location of the RAF support management group. Early this year a further appraisal was put in train to take account of the possible availability of the whole site. Seven officers and officials have visited Pennypot in this connection.

RAF Wyton

Mr. Robert Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the latest estimated cost of relocating staff to the proposed logistics organisation at RAF Wyton.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: About £14 million.

Mr. Robert Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what indications he has received from civilian employees at the RAF support management group in Harrogate as to their willingness to transfer to RAF Wyton.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: A first preference exercise was conducted late last year. The form set out a range of possible future locations. Some 40 per cent. of civilian mobile grades and 30 per cent. of non-mobile grades expressed a preference which included moving to Brampton or Wyton.

Mr. Robert Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will set out the numbers and types of personnel currently employed at RAF Wyton.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: There are around 188 service and 200 civilian personnel at RAF Wyton. They include air crew, engineers, administrators and supporting staff.

Mr. Robert Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many civilian and military personnel are scheduled to move from RAF Wyton in the foreseeable future; and what are the projected costs.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I hope to make a further announcement about the future of RAF Wyton shortly.

Mr. Robert Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his present budget for redundancy payments to civilian staff at the RAF support management group in Harrogate arising from his proposals to relocate to RAF Wyton.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: We assumed a redundancy liability of around £7 million in assessing the relocation at RAF Wyton of the RAF support management group and related units. This is a worst case scenario: we would hope in practice to do better.

Mr. Robert Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what are the projected costs for training new members of staff in civilian grades resulting from the proposed amalgamation of units under Logistics Command at RAF Wyton.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The direct additional training costs are put at about £600,000. In addition, some £2·5 million has been estimated to cover various transitional costs, including dual manning during initial training of new staff.

Mr. Robert Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to make available the figures and evaluations of the use of the Army Apprentices College, Harrogate, for the RAF support management group in Harrogate with or without other units.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I expect the current appraisal of the site for possible use by RAF Logistic Command to be completed shortly. My intention would be to make the relevant material available then, subject to the usual constraints of commercial sensitivity and confidentiality.

RFA Argus

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the capacity of the troop accommodation on RFA Argus; and how many troops are currently being carried on the vessel.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: In addition to her normal ship's complement, RFA Argus's design provides for accommodation for a further 120 personnel. For limited periods, however, a much greater number can be accommodated, as has recently been required in the Adriatic. Circumstances have now allowed us to return the majority of those personnel to the United Kingdom. About 50 troops remain aboard, however, to help maintain the embarked equipment.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when the RFA Argus first came into service.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: In 1988.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the normal complement of officers and men on RFA Argus.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The normal complement of RFA Argus is four officers, 13 senior ratings and 33 junior ratings (RN) and 25 officers, 12 senior ratings and 43 junior ratings (RFA).

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many baths, showers, lavatories and urinals there are on RFA Argus; and how many portable lavatories are in use on the vessel.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: RFA Argus has 43 showers and 45 lavatories. Like most commercially-designed vessels, she does not have baths or urinals. Recently, additional portable showers and toilets were required because a substantial force of troops was embarked in the Adriatic. However, since the majority of the additonal personel have now returned to the United Kingdom, these facilities are no longer required.

Chlorofluorocarbons

Mr. Liam Fox: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what proposals he has to support his Department's critical applications of substances controlled under the Montreal protocol; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The Montreal protocol and EC Regulations 3592/92 will shortly require the cessation of production and supply of ozone depleting substances. The Ministry of Defence as a major user of the substances has recognised the significant role it has to play in contributing to the United Kingdom's overall programme of compliance.

My Department has a small number of critical applications where continued use of the controlled substances is considered essential when assessed against internationally agreed criteria.

We have decided, in accordance with good environmental practice, to support these essential uses by a conservation policy involving the banking and recycling of the substances. This will ensure that personnel and assets are protected during the transitional period between the end of production and the arrival on the market of replacements or alternatives.

It is our intention to establish a bank of Montreal protocol substances at RAF Cardington, Bedfordshire, subject to local planning consent. RAF Cardington is a natural site for the bank and it is the tri-service centre for compressed gases.

CHURCH COMMISSIONERS

Investment Policy

34. Mr. Bowden: To ask the right hon. Member for Selby, as representing the Church Commissioners, what weight the Church Commissioners give to the competitive record of companies in which they invest.

Mr. Alison: The commissioners invest in a company only after careful assessment of a number of factors relating to the company's financial and corporate health, including its competitive record.

Stipends

35. Mr. Flynn: To ask the right hon. Member for Selby, as representing the Church Commissioners, what plans the Church Commissioners have to improve the level of stipends of clergymen.

Mr. Alison: The commissioners' policy, as central stipends authority, is for stipends levels to rise at least in line with the cost of living. Incumbents' average stipends have improved by 29 per cent. against the retail prices index over the last 10 years. Because of the change in local taxation arrangements and their method of payment, largely unaltered stipend levels will, from April, represent an effective increase of about 4 per cent.

Land (Auctions)

36. Dr. Spink: To ask the right hon. Member for Selby, as representing the Church Commissioners in what circumstances it is the commissioners' practice to withdraw land known to be of high conservation value from public auction and negotiate direct with a prospective purchaser.

Mr. Alison: The commissioners' obligations to their beneficiaries require them to test the market properly when disposing of any land and to consider the best method of disposal in the circumstances. In the case of land subject to an SSSI designation which is of high conservation value, the commissioners operate an informal early warning system with English Nature. This is to allow local nature conservation bodies a reasonable time to raise funds so that they may be in a position to submit an offer when the land is put on the market.

Ordination of Women

37. Mr. Fabricant: To ask the right hon. Member for Selby, as representing the Church Commissioners what progress has been made by the Church Commissioners in making provision for the financial consequences of the ordination of women.

Mr. Alison: The financial provision for those resigning the ministry on this account is a statutory charge on the commissioners' general fund and, to the extent that such costs are incurred, will mean less is available for other things.

38. Mrs. Gorman: To ask the right hon. Member for Selby, as representing the Church Commissioners what estimate he has made of the financial effects for the commissioners of the ordination of women to the priesthood.

Mr. Alison: I refer the hon. Lady to the oral answer that I gave to the hon. Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall) earlier today.

ENVIRONMENT

Urban Regeneration

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will list each grant or fund not referrable to a local authority or to a travel-to-work area that exists to assist private sector interests in respect of urban regeneration schemes;

(2) if he will list each grant or fund not referrable to a local authority or to a travel-to-work area that exists to assist private sector interests in respect of urban regeneration schemes;

(3) if he will list each fund available to an urban programme authority for urban regeneration from 1993 onwards excluding city challenge and any funds due to be dealt with by the urban regeneration agency;

(4) if he will list each fund available to a non-urban programme authority for urban regeneration from 1993 onwards excluding city challenge and any funds due to be dealt with by the urban regeneration agency.

Mr. Robin Squire: The Government provide valuable support to the private sector through a wide range of programmes, including those of the Department of Trade and Industry, Employment Department and the Department of the Environment. Under my Department's urban group of programmes, the private sector receives specific help towards urban regeneration through the urban development corporations, city grant and private sector derelict land grant. This is in addition to assistance available through other urban group programmes such as city challenge, urban programme, task forces and city action teams.

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list each fund available to (a) a non-urban programme authority and (b) an urban programme authority for urban regeneration at present; where the rules, criteria, application details and other background papers for each fund may be found; and if he will list each fund available from 1993, in each case, together with any funds to be dealt with by the urban regeneration agency.

Mr. Robin Squire: My Department's urban group of programmes are targeted mainly on the 57 urban priority areas except derelict land grant and the special grants programme which also operate outside those areas. Programmes currently operating and continuing in 1993 are:

Programme
City challenge[1]
Urban programme[1]
City grants[1]
Derelict land grant[1] [2]
UDCs[3]
Task forces
City action teams
Special grants programme

[1] Programmes operated through local authorities.
[2] Both programmes to be transferred to the Urban Regeneration Agency.
[3] Trafford Park UDC covers a small area outside the UPA.

In addition, my Department's housing programmes, including housing renewal and estate action, also contribute to urban regeneration.

Further details of these and other programmes, including the relevant criteria, are in my Department's 1993 annual report. Relevant programme guidance is available on request from my Department.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to appoint the chief executive of the urban regeneration agency; and if he will make a statement on progress made in making the appointment.

Mr. Robin Squire: In accordance with the provisions of the Housing and Urban Development Bill, and subject to its enactment, the chief executive will be appointed by the agency when established. In consultation with Lord Walker, my Department advertised the post in February with a closing date for applications of 12 March. Lord Walker will play a leading role in the selection process.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many representations he has received (a) in favour of and (b) against the appointment of democratically elected representatives from local government to the board of the urban regeneration agency.

Mr. Robin Squire: The Department received more than 300 responses to the consultation paper on the urban regeneration agency which was issued in July 1992. Of these, 32 stated that at least one of the members of the agency's board should represent local government. There were no responses specifically opposed to the appointment of local authority representatives.

Tenants' Choice Legislation

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the key steps which need to be undertaken by tenants who seek to take advantage of the tenants' choice legislation, and the anticipated maximum and minimum periods of time required to undertake each step.

Mr. Baldry: Tenants who wish to take advantage of the tenants' choice legislation should contact the Housing Corporation to discuss possible alternative landlords.

Once an alternative landlord has been chosen, the Housing Corporation will assess the level of tenant support. If there is sufficient support in principle for the proposed transfer, and the applicant landlord has met the corporation's requirements for approval, a formal tenants' choice application can be made to the local authority.

The legislation sets out a timetable for each of the statutory procedures which the parties are expected to observe.

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many tenants' organisations have (a) obtained grants from his Department or from the Housing Corporation to assist in the investigation of tenants' choice, (b) sought such grants, but had their applications turned down, (c) sought such grants, but not had their applications determined and (d) achieved a management transfer under the tenants' choice legislation; and what is the average lapse of time between (a) and (d)

Mr. Baldry: My Department does not make grants directly to organisations to assist with tenants' choice. This is the responsibility of the Housing Corporation and I have therefore asked the corporation to reply to the hon. Member direct.

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what powers he has to pay grants to organisations providing advice for local authority tenants; and if he will list the amount paid in grant under each power in the last year for which information is available.

Mr. Baldry: The Secretary of State has powers under section 429A of the Housing Act 1985 (as amended by section 16 of the Housing and Planning Act 1986) to offer financial assistance to persons managing public sector or former public sector housing and to persons seeking to facilitate or encourage improvements in, or providing services in connection with, the management of such housing.

Within this broad discretionary power the Department makes grants available to organisations which provide advice to local authority tenants on the range of options available to them for increased participation in the management of their housing.

Grants paid under this power during 1992-93 have totalled £5,318,730.

The Secretary of State also has prerogative power to make non-statutory grants to organisations providing advice to local authority tenants through the Department's special grants programme. No such schemes have been funded in this way in 1992-93.

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the working of the tenants' choice legislation listing the types of new tenure or management available to local authority tenants, and the number of estates which have been transferred to each type of new tenure or management; and what plans he has to develop this policy.

Mr. Baldry: Tenants' choice gives local authority tenants who wish to continue renting their homes the opportunity to change their landlord. All applicant landlords must be approved by the Housing Corporation and can be a housing association, a tenant-controlled body or a commercial organisation.

There have been two transfers to date. In one the new landlord is a tenant-controlled housing association, which employs an existing housing association as a managing agent. In the other, the new landlord is an existing housing association.

The operation of the policy is kept under regular review.

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list those organisations that most frequently apply on behalf of tenants' organisations for grants to assist in the investigation of tenants' choice, those organisations which are paid to undertake such investigation or assist therewith; and how much has been paid to each such organisation in total for these and allied purposes, for the most recent period for which figures are available.

Mr. Baldry: This is a matter for the Housing Corporation rather than for my Department. I have therefore asked the corporation to reply to the hon. Member direct.

Matlock-Hexham Bridleway

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what objections have been received to the Matlock to Hexham bridleway; if he will place copies in the Library; and when he expects the Matlock to Hexham bridleway to open.

Mr. Maclean: My Department has received over 300 representations about the Countryside Commission's proposal for the Pennine bridleway, the majority in favour of the route. Those who object do so mainly out of concern for conservation, wildlife and farming interests, and the impact on isolated rural areas. It is not proposed to put copies of this correspondence in the Library. The Secretary of State is now awaiting a further submission from the commission, having asked in May 1992 for further information on these and other points, before deciding whether to approve the proposal.

Government Service (Cars)

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many Government employees are provided with (a) a car, (b) a driver; and if he will list them.

Mr. Baldry: This information is not available centrally and would have to be provided by individual Departments. In respect of the Government car service, cars and drivers are made available, as requested, to first permanent secretaries and certain chief executives, normally at permanent secretary level.

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the total cost of the Government car service for the last year for which figures are available; and what was the cost in 1979.

Mr. Baldry: The total cost of the Government car service in 1991-92 was £7·1 million. The Government car service financial records in 1979 are no longer available.

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many members of the Government are provided with a car and driver service; and if he will list them.

Mr. Baldry: All members of the Government are entitled to the use of an official car and driver. The majority of Government Ministers use the facilities of the Government car service.

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many (a) cars and (b) drivers are currently employed in the Government car service.

Mr. Baldry: The Government car service currently has a fleet of 184 vehicles and 152 drivers.

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment during what periods of time, and for how many hours a week, a car and driver service is provided for Ministers.

Mr. Baldry: The Government car service provides cars and drivers in accordance with Ministers' requirements.

Leighton Hospital Incinerator

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what measurement he has made of the prevailing direction of wind over the proposed site for the Leighton hospital incinerator in Crewe; and over which areas emissions would pass being carried by such winds;

(2) if he will list the waste incinerators of comparable size and emission content to the proposed incinerator at Leighton hospital in Crewe;

(3) what measures are planned for the safe storage and maintenance of incoming waste in the event of temporary closure of the proposed incinerator at Leighton hospital in Crewe;

(4) what will be the average pH of the emissions entering the atmosphere from the proposed incinerator at Leighton hospital in Crewe.

Mr. Maclean: I have had no measurements made of wind directions at the proposed site of the Leighton hospital incinerator. The environmental impact of releases and the operation of the proposed plant would be controlled by an authorisation under the Environmental Protection Act 1990 (EPA 90).

When Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution has received an application under the EPA 90 for the operation of the proposed incinerator at Leighton hospital it will consider all relevant issues, including those raised by the hon. Member, in determining the application and issuing any authorisation.

As Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution at this stage has no firm information as to the design and releases from the proposed plant, it is not possible to provide a list of waste incinerators of comparable size and emission content.

Smokestack Emissions

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what criteria are used to establish minimum safe levels for (a) dioxin and (b) benzene emissions from smokestacks.

Mr. Maclean: Those industrial processes with the greatest potential for pollution are controlled by either Her majesty's inspectorate of pollution or by local authorities under part I of the Enyironmental Protection Act 1990. All such processes require an authorisation to operate and, in deciding whether to issue an authorisation or what conditions to include, the enforcing authority must have regard to guidance notes issued by either the Secretary of State or the chief inspector of Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution. Where appropriate, and to accord with the requirements of the Act, these notes contain release limits for dioxins and benzene together with other controls to ensure that the best available techniques not entailing excessive cost are used to prevent, minimise and render harmless all releases.

Copies of all guidance notes have been placed in the House Library.

Housing Associations

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his answer of 5 February, Official Report, column 385, how many properties have been acquired in the Ealing, North constituency; what information he has about locations and costs; and if he will make a statement on the criteria used for deciding which properties to buy.

Mr. Baldry: The information requested is not available by Parliamentary constituency. By Friday 5 March, the Housing Corporation had approved the purchase of 218 properties under the housing market package in the London borough of Ealing at a total cost of £11·48 million in housing association grant (HAG). Of these, 143 purchases had been completed at a cost of £7·6 million in HAG.

Details of the location and cost of individual properties are a matter for the Housing Corporation.

In giving guidance to housing associations about the eligibility of properties for funding under the package, the Housing Corporation stipulated that:

(1) purchase must be completed by 31 March 1993;
(2) properties must be vacant on completion and suitable for letting immediately to those in housing need;
(3) properties should represent good value for money for the area in which they are situated, taking account of the Housing Corporation's current cost criteria;
(4) if newly built, properties should have been actively marketed before 12 November 1992;
(5) if repossessed, the possession order must have been granted before 12 November 1992;
(6) properties should be selected, so far as possible, to take account of specific housing needs identified by the local authority for the area.

Thermal Oxide Reprocessing Plant

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many representations he has received from Northern Ireland on the new Sellafield thermal oxide reprocessing plant.

Mr. Maclean: My Department has received approximately 80,000 responses regarding the thermal oxide reprocessing plant. However, I am unable to give detailed figures on responses from specific areas of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his answer of 20 January to the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field), Official Report, columns 265-66, what consideration is given to issues related to the transport of nuclear material in the decision whether to licence the thermal oxide reprocessing plant at Sellafield.

Mr. Maclean: All relevant considerations will be taken into account. Conditions applying to the transport of nuclear material will not however form part of the authorisations under the Radioactive Substances Act 1960 to dispose of radioactive waste from Sellafield. The transport of nuclear material is controlled under a separate regulatory regime which is the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport.

Enterprise Zones

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will estimate the total cost of the enterprise zone scheme in terms of rate relief and capital allowances in each year since 1981.

Mr. Robin Squire: Approximate costs are as follows:

Year	Capital allowances[1] £ million	Rates relief[2] £ million
1981-82	35	9
1982-83	35	18
1983-84	25	23
1984-85	45	31
1985-86	80	40
1986-87	115	55
1987-88	90	69
1988-89	190	78
1989-90	150	101
1990-91	160	85

[1] The method of calculating capital allowance costs is currently being reviewed by Inland Revenue and final estimates will not be available until the summer. The estimated costs incurred in 1991-92 are not yet known.

[2] The cost of rate relief in 1990-91 and 1991-92 has been estimated, following the introduction of the uniform business rate.

Nuclear Waste

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what assessment he has made of the report by his radioactive waste management advisory committee on UK Nirex Ltd's proposals for a rock characterisation facility in connection with the disposal of nuclear waste, published on 9 February.

Mr. Maclean: The radioactive waste management advisory committee's comments on UK Nirex's consultative document on a rock characterisation facility are a useful contribution to the development of this proposal.

Information Guide

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what contribution his Department made to the Environment information guide published in 1992 by the British Library.

Mr. Maclean: The authors of the guide consulted officials from the Department's library, in particular on the sections relating to Government Departments.

Mr. Alison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what methods and factors are adopted to place value for rating purposes on coal extracted for sale from the Selby coal field in relation to the operation of the uniform business rate.

Mr. Robin Squire: Rateable value is defined in paragraph 2(1) of schedule 6 to the Local Government Finance Act 1988. Paragraph 2(7)(c) makes the quantity of minerals or other substances in or extracted from the hereditament a relevant matter where the rateable value is determined with a view to making an alteration to the list. Regulations provide that half of the value of any mineral extracted is taken into the rateable value assessment.

In common with other mineral hereditaments, the Selby mine complex assessment is reviewed annually having regard to the annual rate of production and the rateable value is amended accordingly. The assessment also takes into account the land, buildings, rateable plant and machinery and the rights to win and work the mineral.

Mr. Alison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what transitional relief was allowed against British Coal's assessment for rating for its activities in the Selby district in relation to the operation of the uniform business rate; and how such relief was calculated.

Mr. Robin Squire: The table shows the full liability without transitional relief, the amount payable with transitional relief and the amount saved, for the Selby coalfield.

Year	Full Liability without Transition £	Amount paid £	Amount saved £
1990-91	3,288,245·62	1,069,514·48	2,218,731·14
1991-92	3,532,710·99	1,289,248·03	2,243,462·96
1992-93	5,606,509·48	3,265,792·20	2,340,717·28
Total	12, 427,466·09	5,624,554·71	6,802,911·38

The information needed to explain how this relief was calculated and the information relating to Kellingley coalfield is not available at the present time.

Waste Recovery

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what volumes of (a) ferrous and (b) non-ferrous metals are involved annually in waste recovery in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Maclean: The following figures are for 1991, being the most recent year for which we have data.

	Tonnes
Ferrous metal recovered	7,700,700
Non-ferrous:
Aluminium	180,000
Copper	282,000
Lead	200,000

Rent Deposit Schemes

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many councils in England are presently operating rent deposit schemes; and what plans the Government have to support such schemes.

Mr. Baldry: The Department does not hold information about rent deposit schemes operated by local authorities in England and Wales. As part of the rough sleepers initiative in central London we are funding the Notting Hill housing trust to operate a 15-month pilot project for a rent deposit fund. This scheme is due to end in June 1993, and we are currently making arrangements to evaluate it. That will enable us to consider whether there is scope for extending this or similar schemes elsewhere.

Environmental Grants

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the grants being made by his Department to voluntary organisations under the environmental action fund for 1993-94, with the amount in each case indicating the amount awarded to each of these organisations under (a) the special grants programme, (b) United Kingdom 2000, or (c) the environmental grant fund, in 1991-92 and 1992-93; and if he will indicate which organisations have hitherto received funding but will not do so for the forthcoming financial year.

Mr. Maclean: The information requested is in the table.

Dog Wardens

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make it his policy to introduce a United Kingdom-wide dog warden scheme.

Mr. Maclean: No. The Government have already secured the necessary legislation for the introduction of a dog warden service. Under section 149 (1) of the Environmental Protection Act 1990, which was implemented 1 April last year, local authorities in England and Wales have a duty to appoint officers to deal with stray dogs in their area.

Night Noise

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether the targets for night-time noise contained in the EC fifth action programme relate to individuals living in existing noise-sensitive property; and what assessment he has made of the capability of current noise policy measures to attain those targets by 2000.

Mr. Maclean The EC fifth environment action programme states that the targets for night-time noise should include the phasing out of exposure of the population to night-time noise levels in excess of 65dB(A). My Department's noise research programme includes projects to improve the measuring and monitoring of noise from various sources and to establish new methods of reducing noise at noise-sensitive premises.

Urban Programme

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the outturn public expenditure on the urban programme in each standard region of Great Britain in (a) cash prices and (b) 1992-93 prices.

Mr Robin Squire: The 1991-92 outturn figures for the English regions are as follows.

Region	1991-92 Prices £ million	1992-93 Prices £ million
Northern	40·3	42·0
North West	73·8	77·0
West Midlands	40·7	42·4
East Midlands	11·1	11·6
Yorkshire & Humberside	33·9	35·3
London	46·6	48·6
South West	3·0	3·1

Corresponding figures for Scotland and Wales are the responsibility of my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Scotland and for Wales respectively.

Housing Revenue Account

Mr. Hinchcliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will list local authorities with a negative housing subsidy entitlement;

(2) which local authorities have a negative housing entitlement for housing revenue account subsidy purposes in the latest financial year; and if he will list the cash value of this negative entitlement.

Mr. Baldry: I have placed in the Library of the House a copy of the table showing the information requested by the hon. Member.

Mr. Hinchcliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment in how many housing authorities he expects rents to rise as a direct result of changes in housing revenue account subsidy; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Baldry: The effect of the ring-fencing of the housing revenue account (HRA) is that, as a general rule, to maintain the same level of services-housing authorities have to increase actual rents in response to annual increases in the Government's HRA subsidy guideline rents. For 1993-94, guideline rents are set to increase by a minimum of £1.50 and a maximum of £3.00 per week. Decisions about the actual level of rents and services remain ones for housing authorities.

Chlorofluorocarbons

Mr. Elletson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to consider essential uses of CFCs under the terms of the Montreal protocol and European Community regulation 3952/92.

Mr. Maclean: The Government are today issuing a consultation paper which asks for nominations for potential candidates for "essential use" status for continued production of CFCs, carbon tetrachloride and 1,1,1 trichloroethane under the Montreal protocol on substances that deplete the ozone layer and European Community regulation 3952/92.

To be considered for "essential use" status, all applications must meet stringent criteria which have been agreed by parties to the protocol. The use must be necessary for the health and safety of society or critical for its functioning. There must be no technically and economically feasible alternatives available which are acceptable on health and environmental grounds. There must also be insufficient recycled material available for the proposed use, whether with regard to the quantity or quality of the material. "Essential uses" must be agreed by all parties.

Nominations have to be with the Montreal protocol secretariat by 30 September 1993. We do not yet know whether the EC timetable will be different, but it must take the protocol date into account. Closing date for the Government's consultation exercise is 30 April. All applications will be considered, but the Government are committed to keeping "essential uses" to a minimum. A list will be published of those candidates, if any, which the Government intend to nominate to the protocol and European Community processes.

Copies of the consultation paper have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

Countryside (Access)

Mr. Martlew: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has discussed with recreational, landowning, farming or statutory organisations proposals for the creation of new opportunities for access to the countryside involving payment by the public; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maclean [holding answer 2 March 1993]: I welcome the additional opportunities for recreation and access which farmers and landowners can provide, and which may generate a small additional income. I recently discussed opportunities for the provision of horse-riding facilities in particular with the British Horse Society and commended co-operation on the provision of new "toll-rides". I also hope to discuss similar issues with the Country Landowners Association.

Dangerous Wild Animals

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the number, the purpose and the location of each application for a licence under the Dangerous Wild Animals Act 1976 during 1992.

Mr. Maclean [holding answer 9 March 1993]: Responsibility for the issue of licences under the Dangerous Wild Animals Act 1976 rests with local authorities. Information on the number, purpose and location of such applications is not held centrally.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Nigel Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what percentage of English local authority income was represented by central Government support, including the transfer of non-domestic rates in 1990 and the switch from local taxation to VAT in 1991, for each financial year since 1979-80; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Robin Squire [holding answer 12 March 1993]: The available information is as follows:

Local authority income expressed as a percentage of total income

Per cent

TRANSPORT

Marine Employers (Safety)

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the maximum fine for marine employers who breach health and safety legislation.

Mr. Norris: The maximum fine for marine employers who breach health and safety legislation is currently £2,000.

"Ships of Shame"

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what consideration his Department has given to examining the Australian Government report entitled "Ships of Shame"; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Norris: The informative and comprehensive report "Ships of Shame", produced by the Australian Parliament's House of Representatives Standing Committee on Transport, Communication and Infrastructure, has been considered by my Department. The report serves to reinforce our determination to drive sub-standard shipping from the seas. Our commitment is demonstrated by the continuing high priority we accord to inspections of ships visiting our ports; and our backing for appropriate action at the International Maritime Organisation (IMO). There, our work includes support for the fitting of hull stress monitoring systems on certain ship types, which has, in turn, led to an initial recommendation to IMO's Maritime Safety Committee that such systems be fitted on solid bulk carriers of 20,000 tonnes deadweight and over. We are also playing a full role in the IMO sub-committee on the flag state implementation of IMO instruments.

Sellafield

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what are the estimated (a) frequency and (b) volume of radioactive material shipments past the Northern Ireland coast likely to be if the Sellafield thermal oxide reprocessing plant opens.

Mr. Norris: During the first 10 years of operation of the Sellafield thermal oxide reprocessing plant about five to 10 shipments a year would pass through the eastern side of the Irish sea, each of approximately 20 tonnes of spent fuel.

London Underground

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he proposes to sell (a) the Docklands light railway and (b) London Underground as a vertically controlled system.

Mr. Norris: I have no plans at present to sell London Underground Limited, either on a vertically controlled or any other basis; its position would not be affected by the proposals in the Railways Bill. The Docklands light railway is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment.

Thameslink

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects the Thameslink trains to stop at London Bridge station in the rush hours; and what is the length of duplicate rail track needed at Borough market for this.

Mr. Norris: Detailed time-tabling is a matter for British Rail. However, I understand that there is currently insufficient track capacity to allow Thameslink trains to be routed via London Bridge at peak times. BR has proposals for rectifying this. They would entail about 600m of new viaduct and trackwork between London Bridge and Metropolitan junction, excluding works at London Bridge station itself.

Rail Lines (Tree Felling)

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans British Rail has for the cutting down of trees in a concerted manner along certain lines in Network SouthEast; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: I understand that British Rail has no further plans for concerted clearance of vegetation in the foreseeable future.

Rail Closure Procedures

Mr. Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what categories of public sector rail operators, other than London Underground, is he considering exempting from the closure procedures proposed in the Railways Bill.

Mr. Freeman: We propose to exempt from the new closure procedure proposed in the railways Bill all railway operators, other than British Rail, whose enabling legislation make their services subject to the existing closure procedure set out in the Transport Act 1962. Current operators within this category include, in addition to London Underground, the Tyne and Wear and Manchester metros.

I have tabled an amendment to the Bill which sets out an alternative closure procedure, closely modelled on the existing 1962 Act procedure, and which may be applied to designated exempt services. I propose to apply these alternative procedures to the above exempted services. As a result, these services will be subject to procedures which are very close to the existing ones.

We will also exempt, without applying the alternative procedures, services, such as those provided by preserved railways, which are not subject to the existing 1962 Act closure procedure.

Rose Grove Station

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to require British Rail to safeguard the stop at Rose Grove on the Roses rail link service to maintain connecting services.

Mr. Freeman: The timetabling and routing of services, including the maintenance of connections, is entirely a matter for the local management of British Rail.

Thames Road Bridges

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what proposals he has for building new road bridges across the Thames.

Mr. Norris: The national trunk road programme contains two schemes. These are the A102 third crossing at Blackwall—where tunnel and bridge proposals are being considered—and the A406 East London river crossing.

Rail Privatisation

Mr. Keith Hill: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he has now withdrawn option (ii) of paragraph 37 of his consultation document "Railway Pensions After Privatisation: The Government's Proposals."

Mr. Freeman: Decisions have not yet been taken. We are consulting interested parties and evaluating the written responses to our consultation paper.

Railway Investment

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment he has made of the implications of railway privatisation in seeking grant aid from the European regional development fund for railway investment projects; if the eligibility for grant depends on the extent of privatisation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: ERDF grants are for infrastructure investment. Since Railtrack, which will be responsible for such investment, will remain in the public sector for the foreseeable future, there need be no fundamental change to the present arrangements.

Dial-a-ride Services

Mr. Forman: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what arrangements have been made to fund the London dial-a-ride services.

Mr. Norris: I am pleased to announce that the Government grant to London Transport in 1993-94 for the dial-a-ride services will be £12 million, compared with £10·5 million in 1992-93. This will allow for further improvements in the services, and for the total number of dial-a-ride trips to increase from 770,000 in the present year to some 910,000 next year, a rise of 18 per cent. London Transport's settlement provides for grant for dial-a-ride to rise again to £13·5 million in 1994-95 and £15·2 million in 1995-96. Funding for the scheme over the next three years is therefore planned to be almost 29 per cent. higher in real terms than over the last three years.

This record level of funding will enable dial-a-ride to build on the improvements which will flow from regionalisation. On Wednesday this week, I shall attend the launch of West London dial-a-ride, the first fully regionalised service, at it's new Perivale base. The service will offer seven-day-a-week booking facilities, faster response to telephone inquiries, deal with more trip requests and make more effective use of the vehicles.

Network SouthEast (Ticket Sales)

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he will estimate the current losses of revenue on the Chelmsford/Liverpool Street line since the introduction of the penalty fare system;

(2) what assessments are being made of the effectiveness of the new policy of inspecting tickets on the Chelmsford/Liverpool Street line in terms of revenue losses to Network SouthEast;

(3) how many people have been (a) apprehended, (b) prosecuted and (c) cautioned on the Liverpool Street/Chelmsford line since the introduction of the penalty fare system;

(4) if he will introduce into the BR passengers charter measures compelling Network SouthEast to provide ticket collectors at stations;

(5) if he will estimate how much revenue was lost on the Chelmsford/Liverpool Street line in the year prior to the introduction of penalty fares.

Mr. Freeman: The estimated revenue loss through fare evasion on the Chelmsford to Liverpool Street line for the year prior to the introduction of the penalty fares scheme in October 1992 was £1·9 million. BR estimates that for the first full year after introduction this figure will fall to £0·36 million.

Regular checks are carried out to ensure that the scheme is being implemented as effectively as possible. A new monitoring system is currently being tested.

Penalty fares is a civil matter; prosecution is used only as a last resort. A total of 16,089 penalty fare notices have been issued on the Great Eastern division of Network SouthEast which includes the Chelmsford to Liverpool Street line. A total of 777 of these were referred for civil action to secure payment. Around half of the referrals led to a summons being issued.

The deployment of staff is for British Rail to determine. However, the success of the penalty fares scheme in reducing ticketless travel would tend to suggest that the deterrent effect of penalty fares is more efficient in reducing fare evasion than traditional ticket inspection at stations.

Offshore Emergency Vessels

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many emergency/standby vessels operating in the offshore oil and gas fields were assessed by his officials as failing to comply with the revised code of suitability; of these, how many were withdrawn from service by their owners; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Norris: The number of vessels assessed by officials as failing to comply with the revised code of suitability is not retained by the Department.

Many of the vessels currently operating required some modification in order to comply with the revised code requirements.

Details of the number of vessels withdrawn from service by their owners are not available to the Department.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the emergency/standby vessels currently operating in the offshore oil and gas fields by (a) name, (b) port of register and (c) the year of construction of the vessel.

Mr. Norris: The vessels showing the port of registry and the year of construction is listed:

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether emergency/standby vessels operating in the offshore oil and gas fields may transport (a) personnel and (b) cargo from (i) shore to platform or rig and (ii) from platform to platform or rig; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Norris: Vessels operating as emergency/standby vessels may transport personnel and cargo from ship to platform or rig and from platform to platform or rig.

However no such vessel can be considered to be a standby vessel when carrying out such functions. The standby vessel role take precedence over any other function.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the average size crew of emergency/standby vessels operating in the offshore oil and gas fields; and what is the ratio of deck crew to engine room personnel.

Mr. Norris: The minimum size crew of emergency/standby vessels, operating in the offshore oil and gas fields, is 12. There is a ratio of 10:2 between deck crew and engine room personnel. The majority of such vessels sail with the minimum crew number.

Nuclear Fuel

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment he has made of the problems that would arise in the event of a ship being grounded while transporting spent nuclear fuel for re-processing.

Mr. Norris: A grounded ship would present problems of rescue and salvage but the presence of spent nuclear fuel flasks would present no special problems. If it became necessary to salvage flasks, this would be done by the transporters in conjunction with the salvors, and the operation would be co-ordinated by HM Coastguard.

Rail Track and Signalling

Mr. Matthew Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to allow British Rail to spend current and existing resources on track and signalling improvements.

Mr. Freeman: It is for BR to allocate its resources between programmes. For the Government's part, we have made more than £2 billion available to BR for 1992-93. Last year's autumn statement also added an extra £239 million to BR's finances over the next two financial years. Currently, the main bulk of track and resignalling work is taking place on Network SouthEast. Overall, some £225 million is being spent on a wide range of these projects on NSE this year including the Thames line (as part of a £175 million total modernisation scheme), the Great Eastern line (over £70 million), the London, Tilbury and Southend line (£40 million contract let for main construction work) and part of the Kent coast line (as part of £100 million project related to channel tunnel).

Railway Rolling Stock

Mr. Matthew Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what progress is being made by British Rail to sell rolling stock to private sector companies for refurbishment; what plans British Rail has to lease the newly refurbished rolling stock back to realise capital for other investment; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: The Government recently issued a consultation document, "Railway Privatisation: Passenger Rolling Stock", which set out a number of options, including the formation of leasing companies. This is now being discussed with industry, financiers and other interested parties. I hope to make a statement on the results of these discussions after Easter.

Mr. Matthew Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what action he is taking to ensure any leasing arrangement made by British Rail for rolling stock does not count against its external financing limit.

Mr. Freeman: I can confirm that for rolling stock ordered under the £150 million leasing arrangement announced by the Chancellor at the time of the autumn statement, only the lease rental payments will count against British Rail's external finance limit. The full capital cost will not be scored up front as would be the case if British Rail purchased the stock.

Sir Keith Speed: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what recent discussions have taken place between his Department and British Rail over the spending on new rolling stock of the £150 million available for lease finance announced in the autumn statement by the Chancellor of the Exchequer; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: I have asked BR to make proposals to me, by Easter, for the rolling stock that it wishes to order using these leasing facilities.

Rail Privatisation

Mr. Matthew Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received on the consultation document, "Gaining Access to the Railway Network—The Government's Proposals;" and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: "Gaining Access to the Railway Network", published last month, was an outline of the Government's policy on access and charging arrangements for the reorganised railway industry. The Government have received a number of comments on their proposals. As the document made clear, further detailed work needs to be done in the coming months.

Freight Facilities Grant Scheme

Mr. Matthew Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what responses he has received from private freight operators since his announcement to extend the freight facilities grant scheme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: The reaction has been entirely favourable. The changes can be implemented only after enactment of the Railways Bill.

Railway Lines (Access Control)

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what was the budget from fencing and other safety measures, controlling access to railway lines, in the last three financial years.

Mr. Freeman: These are financial matters for British Rail. The Department does not hold this type of information.

London Travelcard Scheme

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his oral answer of 8 March, Official Report, column 652, what suggestions for additions to the facilities offered by the present London travelcard scheme have been made; and if he will make a statement concerning their costs, benefits and practicability.

Mr. Norris: The Government are currently discussing potential developments in joint period ticketing with London public transport operators. A number of proposals reflecting the needs of their passengers have been put forward in these discussions. Detailed assessment of such proposals is in the first instance a commercial matter for the operators concerned.

Overhead Railway Cables

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the incidence of accidents resulting from electrical arcing from overhead railway cables; and what action he will take to improve safety measures in this respect in built-up areas.

Mr. Freeman: The latest information available in the recently-published annual report on railway safety during 1991-92, shows that two people were killed, 13 received serious injuries and one minor injury from objects that they were holding, coming into contact with, or being in close proximity to, overhead electric traction lines.

Of this total, one of those killed and one with serious injury were members of staff. The remainder were either careless, trespassing on the railway or were interfering with the overhead equipment.

British Rail has a statutory duty to operate safely; this includes an obligation to maintain fences. Where railways are newly-electrified, the parapets of bridges are raised and lineside fencing improved. Visits are made by BR staff and the British Transport police to schools in the neighbourhood to warn of the dangers of trespassing.

There is no danger to the public provided that persons and their belongings remain in a public area and they do not trespass beyond the railway boundary fence.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Personal Equity Plans

Sir David Steel: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the error in the drafting of the recent changes to personal equity plans; and what representations he has received concerning the retrospective application of regulations to existing portfolios and the time scale of these changes.

Mr. Lamont: I assume the right hon. Member has in mind the change announced on 17 December requiring "non-qualifying" unit and investment trusts in personal equity plans to hold at least half their investments in shares. This change corrects an error in regulations made in 1990. It is not retrospective but will take effect from 6 April 1993. We have received a very small number of representations about this change.

Mr. John Birt

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) pursuant to the answer from the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster on 8 March, Official Report, column 396, whether he consented to the appointment of Mr. John Birt as deputy director-general of the BBC on a consultancy contract arrangement;

(2) pursuant to the answer from the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster on 8 March, Official Report, column 396, whether he consented to the appointment of Mr. John Birt as director-general of the BBC on a consultancy contract arrangement.

Mr. Portillo: No. In general, the terms and conditions of employment of a chief executive of a public body are subject to Treasury consent, but not in the case of the BBC.

New Businesses

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many new businesses registered for VAT in (i) Pendle and (ii) the north-west in each year since 1987.

Sir John Cope: Customs do not have information conerning the number of businesses registered in the Pendle constituency. The local VAT office at Accrington covers, in addition, the towns of Blackburn, Bolton, Burnley and Clitheroe. Figures for the north-west cover Cheshire, Lancashire, Greater Manchester and Merseyside. The numbers of new businesses registered for VAt since 1987 are as follows:

Year	New registrations at Acrington LVO	New registrations in the north west
1987	2,065	19,209
1988	2,595	22,805
1989	2,807	25,417
1990	2,680	24,426
1991	2,298	21,380
1992	2,114	19,827

Animal Skins

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the amount of fraud perpetrated by failure to declare earnings from the sale of skins of animals caught by hunting; what plans he has to ensure that all such unpaid tax will be collected from the individuals concerned; and what investigations have been carried out in this area by the Inland Revenue.

Mr. Dorrell: Failure to declare earnings may constitute neglect rather than fraud. But the Inland Revenue is committed to ensuring, wherever possible, that tax due in law is properly paid. This includes tax on income from the sale of animal skins, and inquiries are presently being made in some individual cases.

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what evidence he has received from the League against Cruel Sports on tax frauds in connection with the sale of animal skins.

Mr. Dorrell: The Inland Revenue has recently received information from the League against Cruel Sports about the possible failure by members of hunts to declare income from the sale of animal skins. Inquiries are being made as appropriate but it is not yet clear whether, in individual cases, any fraudulent or negligent conduct is involved.

Market Testing

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of how market testing in the Inland Revenue will affect employment levels in the service.

Mr. Dorrell: The Inland Revenue's current market testing programme covers approximately 3,350 posts. The effect of the programme on the numbers of staff in the Department will depend very much on the result of individual market tests.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he expects to publish the Inland Revenue's main aims and objectives in relation to further market testing.

Mr. Dorrell: The main aims and objectives of further market testing in the Inland Revenue will be to ensure best value for money and a high standard of service for taxpayers.

Local Offices

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans are being made to reorganise the Inland Revenue's network of local offices; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: The Inland Revenue announced on 23 February plans for the first stage of a long term programme to restructure its network of local tax and collection offices. In the period to March 1994, the intention is to begin work on 20 reorganisation schemes involving over 100 existing offices, and to complete 15 schemes. The programme will extend over several years.

Inland Revenue

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what evidence he has on the level of public satisfaction with the present arrangements made by the Inland Revenue; and what plans he has to monitor how well the Revenue is meeting taxpayers' needs.

Mr. Dorrell: A survey carried out in June 1992 by Research International on behalf of the Inland Revenue found that 65 per cent. of employed and self-employed taxpayers were satisfied with the service they received from the Inland Revenue.

The Inland Revenue plans to survey other taxpaying groups to establish their present satisfaction levels and service preferences. Their intention is to repeat the surveys at appropriate intervals as an aid to monitoring performance in meeting taxpayers' service needs.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the amount of unpaid taxes written off by the Inland Revenue for the last five years for which figures are available.

Mr. Dorrell: The total amounts of unpaid taxes written off by the Inland Revenue for the last five years were:

1987	333,294
1988	629,219
1989	530,901
1990	568,827
1991	883,923

Pension Funds

Mr. Dowd: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans the Government have to take over parts of the pension funds of nationalised industries or services intended for privatisation.

Mr. Dorrell: The Government have proposed two alternative methods for providing pensions for British Rail pensioners and deferred pensioners after privatisation in a consultation paper published on 20 January. We have sought the views of pensioners and trustees; and await the completion of the consultation process before coming to a decision on which proposal to adopt.

The arrangements made for the pension funds of other nationalised industries or services intended for privatisation will depend upon the particular circumstances of each privatisation.

Inward Investment

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the level of inward investment in the first half of 1992 expressed as a percentage of the level in the first half of 1991 in each of the OECD nations.

Mr. Nelson: The latest comprehensive information on the amount of inward direct investment in each of the major OECD nations is contained in the OECD publication "Economic Outlook" volume 51 (June 1992), a copy of which is available in the Library. It relates to 1991 and earlier years. The data show that the United Kingdom is the second largest recipient of inward direct investment after the United States of America. In 1991, inward direct investment in the United Kingdom accounted for 31 per cent. of the total inward investment in the seven major OECD countries.

GDP

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what percentage of gross domestic product was taken by (a) private consumption and (b) fixed investment in the United Kingdom in each year from 1979; and what were the average figures for the OECD.

Mr. Nelson: The requested information in respect of the United Kingdom and the OECD can be derived, on a consistent basis to 1991, from data contained in the OECD publication "National Accounts Main Aggregates Volume I 1960-1991" on pages 77 and 17.

Copies of this publication are available in the House of Commons Library.

Self-employment Schemes

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will consider extending the 714 or similar self-employment scheme to enable more unemployed people to become temporarily and/or seasonally self-employed with less bureaucracy; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: The special 714 scheme for the construction industry does not itself confer self-employed status. Its purpose is to prevent tax evasion. There are no plans to extend the scheme.

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make it a condition of a successful bid for contracts for market-tested jobs in his Department that they comply with existing conditions which guarantee equal opportunities for women.

Mr. Nelson [holding answer 12 March 1993]: Equal opportunities legislation applies to all employers. It is therefore not necessary to write any specific conditions related to equal opportunities for women into any contracts with private sector service suppliers, whether the contract is let as a result of a market testing exercise or otherwise.

Surplus Food

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what has been (a) the amount and (b) the kind of European Community surplus food-stuffs distributed in (i) Inverclyde, (ii) Strathclyde and (iii) Scotland as a whole in each of the past five years.

Sir Hector Monro: The distribution of butter and beef in Strathclyde, and in Scotland as a whole, under the European Community surplus food scheme over the last two years is shown in the table. Amounts distributed by area are not available for earlier years.

Strathclyde	306·90	211·99	336·90	204·76

It is not possible to identify separately the amount of produce distributed in Inverclyde.

National Galleries

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he last met the trustees of the National Galleries of Scotland to discuss (a) the commissioning and (b) the likely location of a new national gallery; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Hector Monro: Following a meeting with the chairman of the board of trustees in April 1991 my right hon. Friend provided funds to enable the National Galleries to commission a comprehensive option appraisal in relation to their new gallery proposal, but gave no commitment to provide funding for the project. That remains the position.

My right hon. Friend has had no further meetings with the chairman or the trustees on this particular matter.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how much grant in aid has been given to the National Galleries of Scotland in each of the past 10 years.

Sir Hector Monro: The information is as follows:

Notes:
1. Building programme grant-in-aid has been directly allocated to the National Galleries of Scotland from 1 April 1989.
2. The figure shown for 1992-93 is the estimated outturn.

Nursery Schools

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what percentage of children aged under five years in (a) Inverclyde, (b) Strathclyde and (c) Seotland as a whole attend local authority-funded nursery schools.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information requested, for pupils attending education authority nursery schools at September 1991, is shown in the table:

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information requested is given in the table:

Hospital Waiting Lists

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give the number of patients on the in-patient waiting lists by health board areas on 30 April 1989, 1990, 1991 and 1992; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stewart: Waiting times and waiting lists information is collected on a quarterly basis as at 31 March, 30 June, 30 September and 31 December. A year-on-year comparison at 31 March by health board area may be found at table 1 of the March 1992 edition of the "NHS Patient Treatment and Waiting Time Bulletin," copies of which have been placed in the Library of the House.

Nurses

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what information he has concerning the number of nurses currently leaving nurse training courses who wish to serve in the national health service but have not as yet secured such employment; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stewart: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Leith (Mr. Chisholm) on 25 February 1993 at column 723.

Social Workers

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many (a) women and (b) men were employed full time as qualified social workers in each of the past 10 years.

Mr. Stewart: Centrally held information does not distinguish between women and men employed as social workers. Nor is information held centrally about staff employed in the independent sector. The table sets out the number of qualfied social workers employed by local authorites in Scotland in each of the past 10 years.

Numbers of social workers holding certificate of qualification in social work, certificate in social service or other social work qualification, October 1982 to October 1991

	Senior Social Workers	Main Grade Social Workers	Total
October 1982	515	1,887	2,402
October 1983	570	1,931	2,501
October 1984	534	1,959	2,493
October 1985	582	2,068	2,650
October 1986	622	2,191	2,813
October 1987	623	2,296	2,919
October 1988	633	2,457	3,090
October 1989	671	2,571	3,242
October 1990	666	2,572	3,238
October 1991	693	2,805	3,498

Figures relate to full and part time staff as they cannot be separated; In 1991, 96 per cent. of all senior social workers and 83 per cent. of all main grade social workers worked full-time.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to change the training and qualifications required by those seeking employment as social workers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stewart: There are no plans to change the training and qualifications required by those seeking to enter the social work profession. A new diploma in social work has been introduced in the last two years replacing earlier qualifications. In Scotland there are now 16 college-based and distance learning routes to achieving the new diploma in social work.

Botanic Gardens

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what grant in aid or other Government funding was given to (a) the Royal Botanic Garden, Edinburgh, and (b) the Botanic Garden, Glasgow, in each of the past 10 years.

Sir Hector Monro: The grant in aid provided to the Royal Botanic Garden, Edinburgh from 1986-87 onwards, and before that as direct running costs as part of the then Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland, was as follows:

1983-84	210,000
1984-85	232,000
1985-86	1,880,000
1986-87	3,680,000
1987-88	4,060,000
1988-89	4,232,000
1989-90	4,596,000
1991-92	4,764,138
1992-93	5,596,000

The botanic garden, Glasgow is not the Secretary of State's responsibility but that of Glasgow district council. Government funding to the district council comes from revenue support grant and it is for the council to decide how much of this it apportions to the botanic garden.

Scottish Association for the Care and Resettlement of Offenders

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what assessment he has made of the work of the SACRO reparation and mediation project in Edinburgh.

Mr. Stewart: I consider this pilot project to have made a significant contribution to the development of knowledge and practice on reparation and mediation.

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will now reconsider his decision on the amount of funding made by the social work services group to the SACRO reparation and mediation project in Edinburgh for the year 1993-94.

Mr. Stewart: The grant offered to the SACRO reparation and mediation project in Edinburgh was increased from £16,720 for 1992-93 to £21,000 in 1993-94, an increase of 26 per cent. I do not propose to reconsider the grant offer for 1993-94.

Prisoners

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the cost of maintaining an individual at HM prisons in Scotland.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The cost of maintaining an individual at HM prisons in Scotland in 1992-93, calculated as total expenditure on prisons, including capital, divided by average prisoner numbers, is approximately £25,400 per annum. Excluding capital expenditure, the cost is approximately £22,900 per individual per annum.

Forestry Commission (Land Sales)

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will place in the Library a list of all the land which has been sold by the Forestry Commission in 1992 in England, Scotland and Wales in each county, giving the name of the area sold, the area, the grid reference, the amount received on the sale, and to whom it was sold in each case.

Sir Hector Monro: A list giving details, including name, size and location, of the areas of forest land sold by the Forestry Commission in 1992 is held in the Library of the House. The list provides the name of the purchaser and the price paid where the purchaser has agreed that this information can be made public. The list is restricted to forest land because information on the sale of other categories of land, such as agricultural land, houses, gardens and minor boundary adjustments, is not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. Grid references for each area of land sold could also be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Fraud

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the size of the fraud squad in each police force in Scotland.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information requested is set out in the following table:

Force	Number of Officers as at 31 December 1992
Central	2
Dumfries and Galloway	—
Fife	7
Grampian	6
Lothian and Borders	11
Northern	—

Ancient Monuments

Mr. Martlew: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many ancient monuments in Scotland are currently scheduled; how many he estimates ought to be scheduled; when he estimates the scheduling will be complete; how many scheduled monuments have been damaged or destroyed in each of the last five years; what were the causes of that damage or destruction; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Hector Monro: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to Historic Scotland under its chief executive, Mr. Graeme Munro. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Graeme N. Munro to Mr. Eric Martlew, dated 15 March 1993:

As Chief Executive of Historic Scotland I am writing in response to your Parliamentary Question of 10 March to the Secretary of State for Scotland regarding ancient monuments in Scotland.

The total number of scheduled ancient monuments is 5,600, and approximately 300 scheduled monuments are now being newly scheduled each year, a considerable increase on the previously prevailing levels. We have introduced an additional target of revising 40 schedule entries a year to keep the schedule as accurate as possible.

It has been estimated that there are between 15,000 and 20,000 monuments in Scotland which may be of sufficient interest to warrant assessment for scheduling. However, it is not possible to say with any certainty how many monuments remain to be scheduled. The assessment of a monument's suitability for scheduling is a professional judgment made in the light of the circumstances of each individual case.

In addition, the process of scheduling is continuously evolving, and it may well be that as archaeological knowledge develops, different criteria come to be developed, and new categories of monument will certainly be recognised. For these reasons we do not consider it possible to have a completion date.

Our information on the state of scheduled monuments derives from visits by our Monument Wardens, locally based officers who regularly inspect scheduled sites to check on their condition. We do not have year-by-year statistics available, but a summary of the data suggests that a total of 675 scheduled monuments have sustained some degree of damage in the last 10 years. We do not have graded data, but Historic Scotland's Inspectors assess the number of sites damaged so that they have lost more than 50 per cent. of their archaeological value at no more than 100. I must emphasise that this is a highly subjective assessment.

The principal causes of damage to ancient monuments are:

(a) disturbance by agricultural stock, rabbits and other vermin;
(b) marine and riverine erosion;
(c) roots of self-sown scrub and trees (including ivy on ruinous buildings);
(d) accidental vehicle tracking and dumping.

In recent years, the introduction of Monument Wardens has led to a closer relationship with owners and occupiers of scheduled monuments. This and the provision of more and better advice and information to owners individually and to targetted groups such as farmers, foresters and road builders has resulted in a decrease in the amount of damage caused in ignorance. We remain unable fully to predict and counteract the effects of sudden catastrophic events such as the recent severe storms and high tides, but whenever such events occur Historic Scotland acts promptly to assess the damage and respond to it.

We are giving increased priority in scheduling to providing protection for the most important and vulnerable sites. We are also preparing, in co-operation with Regional Councils, non-statutory registers of significant monuments. These will enable us to schedule much more quickly specific sites which come under threat. Non-statutory lists have been completed for Grampian and Fife.

Empty Houses

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he has sought explanations from islands and district councils regarding local authority accommodation which remains unlet or otherwise unoccupied; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 8 March 1993]: The Scottish Office Environment Department has recently commissioned research to identify the location and extent of empty houses in the public sector in Scotland and the reasons for them being empty. This work will also review the strategies used by public sector landlords for dealing with empty houses and so allow us to identify good practice. The research results will be available in the spring.

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what information he has regarding the amount that each Scottish local authority lost in revenue for the financial years (a) 1990-91 and (b) 1991-92 in having empty unlet houses.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 8 March 1993]: The amounts debited to local authority housing revenue accounts as income receivable from houses during periods in 1990-91 and 1991-92 when they were not let are shown in the table.

Stray Dogs

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what information he has regarding the appointment in each local authority of officers to deal with stray dogs, as required by the Environmental Protection Act 1990.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 8 March 1993]: Section 149 of the Environmental Protection Act 1990, which came into force on 1 April 1992, requires all district and islands councils in Scotland to appoint an officer to deal with stray dogs. Details of appointments made by individual authorities are not held centrally.

Training

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what information he has about the quality of youth training and employment training schemes.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 10 March 1993]: Scottish Enterprise and Highlands and Islands Enterprise have a duty to keep under continuous review the suitability and adequacy of training provided by local enterprise companies or their agents. Both bodies provide the Scottish Office with regular management information about the effectiveness of the youth training and employment training programmes, including the numbers of trainees achieving vocational qualifications and job outcomes.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what formal rights of appeal exist for anyone involved in Government training schemes if he or she feels that they have not received the service promised by the Government.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 10 March 1993]: Scottish Enterprise and Highlands and Islands Enterprise, which are responsible for the delivery of Government-funded training programmes in Scotland, are required to ensure that each of the local enterprise companies with which they contract for the local delivery of these programmes operates a satisfactory procedure for dealing with all complaints made to them. The precise details of these procedures are likely to vary from one local enterprise company to another. Individuals may also make representations to Scottish Enterprise or Highlands and Islands Enterprise if they believe that a local enterprise company has failed to comply with its contractual obligations.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what numbers and percentage of youth training and employment training places are provided by (a) private employers, (b) public bodies, (c) voluntary bodies and (d) others.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 10 March 1993]: In Scotland responsibility for monitoring the delivery of youth training and employment training rests with Scottish Enterprise and Highlands and Islands Enterprise. I have asked the chairmen of these two bodies to write to the hon. Member with the information he has requested.

Secondary School Teachers

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish the output from Scottish colleges of education of graduate secondary school teachers in each specialist subject and the number employed in each such subject by each regional council for the last three years for which such information is available; and what are the projected figures for the current academic year.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 10 March 1993]: The available information is set out in the tables. The numbers of graduates from the Scottish colleges of education in 1991-92 and1992-93 have been estimated by applying historical success ratios to the number of final year students in training. Detailed information on the number of secondary teachers by subject employed by each regional council is collected only in alternate years; figures for 1990-91 and provisional figures for 1992-93 are given in the table. In 1989-90 and 1991-92 only the total number of teachers per region is collected. Totals may not always exactly equal the sum of their component parts due to rounding.

European Court of Justice

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland on how many occasions, in each of the past five years (a) a district court, (b) a sheriff court and (c) a Court of Session has requested the European Court of Justice to provide a ruling as provided in article 177 of the treaty of Rome.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 11 March 1993]: There have been no such requests from the Court of Session in any of the years referred to. Information about requests from district and sheriff courts is not available centrally.

Child Care

Mr. Chisholm: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how much money has been given to local enterprise companies for after school child care for 1993-94; and whether the money is ring fenced.

Mr. Stewart: [holding answer 12 March 1993]: Resources for a new programme for the provision of out of school child care have been included in the overall budgets for Scottish Enterprise and Highlands and Islands Enterprise for 1993-94. The relevant resources have not been ring fenced, in accordance with the normal budgetary arrangements for these bodies; and the detailed allocation of resources to the local enterprise companies is an operational matter for Scottish Enterprise and Highlands and Islands Enterprise.

Official Entertainment

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how much was spent on official entertainment in his Department in 1991-92 and 1992-93 to date.

Mr. Lang: The information requested is as follows:

1991-92	62,800
1992-93[1]	86,700

[1] To date.

The figure for 1992-93 includes expenditure on official hospitality in connection with events in Scotland arising from the United Kingdom presidency of the European Community.

Plutonium

Mr. McFall: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what measures he is taking to comply with European directives on the air transportation of plutonium; and what quantity of shipments from Germany to Dounreay through Wick airport have been notified to his Department.

Mr. Norris: I have been asked to reply.

No European directive deals specifically with the transport of plutonium by air. No such shipment from Germany to Dounreay via Wick airport has been notified to my Department.

Fraud

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what consideration he has given to establishing a Scottish serious fraud office covering all police force areas in Scotland.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: In contrast to the historical position elsewhere in the United Kingdom, in Scotland the procurator fiscal, as public prosecutor, has always had an investigative role in relation to the whole range of serious crime, including fraud, and has had the right to direct police inquiries. Since 1984 the Crown Office fraud unit has, at the request of procurators fiscal, exercised these functions in some of the more serious fraud cases, in particular those arising in smaller pocurator fiscal districts. The matter of investigation of serious and complex fraud in Scotland was reconsidered following the Roskill report and provision was made by the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 1987 to give officers nominated by my noble and learned Friend the Lord Advocate similar investigative powers in cases of serious or complex fraud to those exercised elsewhere in the United Kingdom by the Serious Fraud Office. These powers are used in supplement of the procurator fiscal's powers of investigation. Particularly in view of the well-established role of the procurator fiscal and Crown Office, including the system by which all cases proposed for trial on indictment are reported to the Crown Office and considered by Crown counsel, it has not been considered necessary to establish a separate fraud prosecution agency for Scotland.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Unemployment

14. Mr. Olner: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how much of the recently announced increase in the expenditure of his Department is to meet the costs of increased unemployment.

Mr. Lilley: Table 5 of my Department's third annual report shows that in cash terms, planned benefit expenditure in 1993-94 exceeds the estimated outturn for 1992-93 by £5·84 billion. Just under 19 per cent. of this increase is for the unemployed.

24. Mr. Congdon: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what recent measures his Department has taken to support people who have become unemployed in the past 12 months.

Mr. Burt: The Government have met their commitment to maintain the value of benefits. Unemployment benefit and income support benefit rates for 1993-94 are being increased by 3·6 per cent. in line with the retail prices index.

There are increased incentives to work. There is a greater gap between incomes in work and out of work and as a consequence the unemployment trap is alleviated. In addition, in April 1992, the working conditions threshold for entitlement to family credit was reduced from 24 hours to 16 hours per week to improve opportunities for the unemployed with families to take work.

Pensioners

15. Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security by how much more than inflation benefits for lower income pensioners have been increased since 1989.

Miss Widdecombe: I refer my hon. Friend to my oral answer earlier today to the hon. Member for St Ives (Mr. Harris).

20. Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will publish a league table of European Community countries listing their comparative levels of social security provision for pensioners.

Miss Widdecombe: League tables of such provision are usually misleading, as most other member states, unlike the United Kingdom, have wholly earnings-related pension schemes. Direct comparison of pension rates is not therefore possible. In order to make a meaningful comparison it would be necessary to take into account the total benefit package available to pensioners.

The Department recently completed a comparative exercise of six member states, using data supplied by an independent firm of actuaries. The exercise indicated that when factors such as safety net provision and health care are taken into account, British pensioners who previously had been on low earnings are better off than those in Germany, France, Italy and Spain, and only just behind those in the Netherlands. It also showed that occupational pensions bring the total pension package for many British pensioners previously on average earnings up to the level available in the larger EC countries.

22. Mr. Pickles: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what proportion of pensioners were in the top half of the income distribution in 1979 and at the last available date.

Miss Widdecombe: The table shows the proportion of pensioners in the top half of the overall population income distribution.

	1979	1988-89
Pensioner couples (BHC)	24	28
Single pensioners (BHC)	21	23
All pensioners (BHC)	23	26
Pensioner couples (AHC)	25	33
Single pensioners (AHC)	25	27
All pensioners (AHC)	25	30

Notes:
1. Figures have been calculated using the methodology used to produce HBAI results. They therefore relate to individual pensioners (rather than pensioner units), and assume all members of a household share the same standard of living.
2. 1988-89 denotes a combined sample from the 1988 and 1989 family expenditure surveys.
3. BHC and AHC denote before and after housing costs respectively.
4. Percentages may not add to 100 owing to rounding.

26. Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his estimate of the trend in pensioners' real income since 1979.

Miss Widdecombe: Between 1979 and 1989 the total net average income of pensioner units[1] increased, in real terms, by 30 per cent. before housing costs are taken into account and by 37 per cent. after housing costs. Both single pensioners and pensioner couples enjoyed increases in their real net incomes of 29 per cent. before housing costs and 33 per cent. and 36 per cent. respectively after housing costs are taken into account.

Source: Family Expenditure Survey 1989..

1. Pensioner units are defined as single people over state pension age and couples in which the husband is over state pension age.

27. Mr. Mark Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his estimate of the trend in the real income of pensioners since 1979.

Miss Widdecombe: I refer my hon. Friend to my oral answer to the hon. Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Thurnham) earlier today.

Invalidity Pension

16. Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what has been the average percentage increase in real terms of the invalidity pension and invalidity allowances since November 1978.

Mr. Scott: Invalidity pension and invalidity allowances have increased by almost 3 per cent. in real terms between November 1978 and April 1992. From April 1993 we have announced an increase in line with last September's RPI of 3·6 per cent. The latest RPI figure for January was 1·7 per cent.

The average weekly payment of invalidity benefit was £67·40 on 30 March 1991, the latest date for which information is available.

Note: Information from a 1 per cent. sample of claimants.

Occupational Pensions

17. Mr. Mike O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what further proposals he has to protect occupational pension scheme members from their companies accessing the funds for their own purposes.

Miss Widdecombe: A detailed and wide-ranging review of the legal framework within which occupational pension schemes operate is currently being carried out by an independent committee, the Pensions Law Review Committee. It would be inappropriate for the Government to pre-empt its findings. Decisions on whether any legislative changes are appropriate will be taken in the light of the committee's recommendations.

Disability Living Allowance

18. Mr. Skinner: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many disability living allowance cases are still to be dealt with by his Department.

Mr. Scott: There were 37,000 disability living allowance claims awaiting action at the end of January.

Invalid Care Allowance

19. Mr. Whittingdale: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many women are in receipt of invalid care allowance in 1978-79 and at the latest available date.

Mr. Scott: As at January 1981, the earliest date for which information is available, 3,600 women were receiving invalid care allowance. We estimate that there are currently 195,000 recipients of whom approximately 160,000 are women.

Fraud

21. Mr. Brandreth: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what new measures his Department is taking to tackle fraud and the abuse of benefits.

Mr. Burt: An additional £10 million of resources are being made available to the Benefits Agency to help step up the fight against fraud. More specially trained investigators will be deployed and there will be increasing emphasis on the use of new technology. We are also planning to give new financial incentives to local authorities to clamp down on false housing benefit claims.

Child Support Agency

23. Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what progress he has made in setting up the Child Support Agency.

Mr. Burt: I am pleased to report that excellent progress has been made. The Child Support Agency will begin operations on 5 April as planned. Operating within the framework of the Child Support Act, the agency will provide a clear focus for the assessment, collection, and enforcement of maintenance payment, and ensure that many more parents meet their responsibility to maintain their children.

25. Mr. Brazier: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what long-term savings he expects as a result of the operation of the Child Support Agency.

Mr. Burt: We expect that, in the long term, absent parents will contribute around £600 million to the maintenance of their children, a cost currently borne by tax payers.

Family Credit

28. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security over what range of net income families are eligible for family credit.

Dr. Liam Fox: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security over what range of net income families are eligible for family credit.

Mr. Burt: Eligibility for family credit depends not only on a family's income, but also on the number of children in the family and their ages. A family with one child under 11 can get family credit if their net weekly income is less than £139 a week. There is no minimum qualifying level. Families with more, or older, children remain entitled to family credit at much higher levels of income. For example, a family with four children aged 3, 8, 11 and 16 could be eligible with a net income of £209 a week.

Mr. Sweeney: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the number of families receiving family credit; and how many families were receiving a family income supplement in 1979.

Mr. Lilley: At the end of October 1992 there were 450,000 families receiving family credit, compared with 78,000 families receiving family income supplement in April 1979.

Maxwell Pension Funds

29. Mr. Madel: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the latest information known to his Department concerning efforts being made to recover the missing Maxwell pension funds; and if he will make a statement.

Miss Widdecombe: The Department's Maxwell pensions unit and Sir John Cuckney continue to assist the liquidators and the pension scheme trustees in their attempts to restore assets to the schemes. Meanwhile, the trustees of the Maxwell Pensioners Trust announced last week that the trust would be making grants to pension schemes when the Government's emergency funding is exhausted to keep pensions in payment for a further period while asset recovery continues.

Unemployment Benefit

Ms Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security whether he will consider amending the operation by the employment service of the NI 230 rule.

Mr. Burt: We have no plans to amend the legislation which governs the abatement of unemployment benefit by occupational pension and/or personal pension and which is explained in leaflet NI 230.

Severe Hardship Payments

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many applications for income support under the discretionary severe hardship provisions were made, and what percentage were successful, in November 1992, December 1992, January 1993 and February 1993.

Mr. Burt: The available information is in the table:

Date	Severe Hardship Applications	Successful claims Per cent.
November 1992	8,668	78
December 1992	7,183	80
January 1993	12,647	85

Notes:
1. Source: Severe hardship claims unit statistics.
2. Figures for February 1993 are not yet available.

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the total amount paid out to persons aged 16 and 17 years under the discretionary severe hardship provisions in each of the years since 1988.

Mr. Burt: The requested information is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. The amount of benefit paid to successful severe hardship applicants is not collected centrally.

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the annual budget of the severe hardship unit responsible for administering discretionary income support payments to young people at risk from hardship.

Mr. Burt: Income support, of which severe hardship payments form a part, is not constrained by a budget.

Child Benefit

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many awards of extended child benefit were made in each of November 1992, December 1992, January 1993 and February 1993.

Mr. Burt: The numbers are as follows:

	Number
November 1992	3,236
December 1992	2,242
January 1993	2,901
February 1993	2,017

European Council Directive

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will place in the Library a copy of the United Kingdom Government's response of 11 September 1992 to a letter from the European Commissioner responsible for social affairs and employment in connection with the United Kingdom's obligations under European Council directive (EEC) 80/987; and if he will make a statement.

Miss Widdecombe: The document requested is a formal reply to the European Commission. Such correspondence is treated as confidential on both sides and I am therefore not able to make the reply available. We understand that Commission officials are still considering it, but we are confident that the Government have done all that is required to implement this directive.

Rent Rebates, Wakefield

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what was the total rent rebate received in Wakefield since 1979;

(2) what was the level of Government expenditure for rent rebates in Wakefield in each year since 1979.

Mr. Burt: Such information as is available is in the table:

Year	Rent rebate paid (£)	Rent rebate subsidy[1] (£)
1983-84	12,472,345	12,003,803
1984-85	15,374,155	14,812,851
1985-86	14,939,028	14,415,343
1986-87	16,171,276	15,588,471
1987-88	16,383,457	15,820,735
1988-89	16,896,791	16,389,887
1989-90	15,526,638	15,060,838
1990-91	18,511,816	18,498,893
1991-92	20,450,512	20,422,045

Note:
[1] From 1990-91, the bulk of rent rebate subsidy was paid by the Department of the Environment as part of its housing revenue account arrangements.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Chile

Mr. Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations his Department has made to the Chilean Government concerning information relating to the arrest and imprisonment in 1974 of William Beausire; and what future action he proposes to take to secure the release of such information.

Mr. Garel-Jones: We made repeated representations to the Chilean authorities about Mr. Beausire's disappearance until 1990. In March 1991, the Commission for Truth and Reconciliation appointed by President Aylwin's democratically elected Government concluded that Mr. Beausire was arrested in Buenos Aires on 2 November 1974 and handed over to the then Chilean intelligence organisation, DINA, in whose custody he was held until his disappearance in June 1975.

The view of the Chilean authorities is that any further evidence concerning human rights abuses committed in the past should be taken up through legal channels. Our embassy in Santiago is ready to assist in any way possible, should a member of the Beausire family wish to pursue the case further.

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs on what basis Her Majesty's Government have offered to endeavour to secure six seats for Scotland in the proposed Committee of the Regions; and what numbers he plans to allocate to Wales, Northern Ireland and England, respectively.

Mr. Garel-Jones: No final decisions have been taken on the allocation of seats between the different parts of the United Kingdom. However, the Government will wish to ensure that Scotland, Wales, Northern Ireland and England are all appropriately represented on the Committee.

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement outlining the report-back procedures offered to Wales in connection with the proposed Committee of the Regions; and what cost will be involved in these procedures.

Mr. Garel-Jones: Consultations on arrangements continue. The costs will depend on final decisions.

Mr. Elletson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement of his policy in regard to British-Montenegran relations; and what conditions he will require to be satisfied before sanctions against Montenegro are lifted.

Mr. Goodlad: Sanctions against Serbia and Montenegro apply equally to the two republics. The conditions for lifting sanctions are set out in United Nations Security Council resolution 757 (1992), a copy of which is in the Library of the House. We are encouraging the leaderships of both republics to change their policies. The President of Montenegro, Mr. Bulatovic, is paying a working visit to London on 18 and 19 March and will meet my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs.

Public Bodies

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many appointments to the public bodies listed in "Public Bodies" for his Department were made from names supplied by the public appointments unit; and if he will list them.

Mr. Goodlad: In the case of the diplomatic wing of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, there were three:

Wilton Park Academic Council—
Mr. Anthony Bruce
Wilton Park Departmental Board—
Miss Ruth Watts Davies and Miss Valerie le Moignan

In the case of the aid wing, none.

Departmental Spending

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what percentage share of total departmental spending was accounted for by non-departmental public bodies in each year since 1979.

authorities in the last three months regarding the application of Patricia Cahill for a royal pardon from the King of Thailand.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Our embassy in Bangkok has been in regular touch with the Thai authorities about this case, most recently on 24 February. The Minister of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, my right hon. Friend the Member for Eddisbury (Mr. Goodlad), also raised it when he visited Bangkok last October.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what are the current queues awaiting interview in Bombay, New Delhi, Calcutta, Dhaka, Islamabad, Karachi, Nairobi and Dar-es-Salaam.

Foreign Affairs Council

Mr. Ian Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the outcome of the Foreign Affairs Council held on 8 March.

Mr. Hurd: I attended the Foreign Affairs Council on 8 March. My hon. Friend the Minister for Trade represented the United Kingdom on trade issues.

The Council reached a common position on the Commission's proposal of a one-year cohesion fund instrument. The European Parliament will now be consulted and it is expected that the regulation will enter into force in time to meet the 1 April deadline set at the Edinburgh Council.

Foreign Ministers signed an EC association agreement with Bulgaria. Similar agreements were signed with Poland and Hungary in December 1991, and with Romania in February 1993.

The Council agreed an additional protocol to the European economic area agreement following Switzerland's rejection of the EEA. This now opens the way to the ratification of the agreement which will create the world's largest single market, covering the Community and six European Free Trade Association countries.

Foreign Ministers discussed the Community's relations with Russia. They reaffirmed the Community's continued support for economic and political reform in Russia.

The Council continued its discussion of a Commission proposal to change the decision-making procedures for Community anti-dumping and other commercial defence measures. The Commission reported to the Council on developments concerning the general agreement on tarrifs and trade Uruguay round and EC/USA trade issues.

The Netherlands and the Commission, together with France and Italy, agreed to hold further discussions on possible trade measures in respect of rice from the Netherlands Antilles.

In a discussion of latest developments in the former Yugoslavia, Lord Owen outlined his strategy for securing the agreement of all parties to the Vance-Owen proposals. Ministers gave unanimous support to this approach and agreed that existing sanctions should be tightened.

St. Helena

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what procedures are used to select the general manager of the St. Helena development agency.

Mr. Garel-Jones: After a tender competition, the Overseas Development Administration retained Pieda, a firm of economic and planning consultants, to help develop St. Helena's Small Industries Authority into a development agency and recommend a general manager.

The consultants' nominee for this proposed position was approved by the Overseas Development Administration and the St. Helena Government. The agency has still be be set up.

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he expects the report by Mr. Brian Smith on matters relating to the heritage of St. Helena to be available; and if he will place a copy in the Library.

Mr. Garel-Jones: I expect Mr. Smith's report to be completed by the end of April 1993. The St. Helena Heritage Society and the St. Helena Government jointly commissioned the report. I hope to place a copy in the House of Commons Library.

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will give the number of votes and the percentage they represent of the eligible population on the new electoral roll on St. Helena and the figures for the previous roll.

Mr. Garel-Jones: The new electoral roll is not yet complete.

In the 1989 election the electoral roll comprised 2,532 voters, of whom 1,588 voted. This represented 63 per cent. of those registered to vote.

No figure for the eligible population in 1989 is available but the last census, in 1987, gave a figure of 3,508.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Legal Aid

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what representations he has had over the proposals for restricting the availability of legal aid in respect of redress for injuries inflicted in accidents; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John M. Taylor: The Lord Chancellor and I have received a number of such representations. The Lord Chancellor gave evidence about these matters to the Home Affairs Select Committee on 24 February 1993.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Car Tax

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 4 March, Official Report, column 245, what level of sales was assumed to estimate the revenue forgone at £750 million, when car tax was abolished; what proportion of the retail prices reduction has been replaced by price increases; and if he will estimate the effects on (a) the retail prices index and (b) the tax and prices index if the £750 million is fully replaced by other taxation and also by manufacturers' price increases.

Sir John Cope: The estimated revenue loss in 1993-94 of £750 million—car tax and consequential VAT—was based on car sales of around 1·5 million. There are considerable difficulties associated with monitoring the retail price of new cars and no estimates are available on how prices have changed since the abolition of car tax was announced in November 1992. Were the revenue to be recouped wholly from an increase in the excise duty on road fuels, this would have an estimated impact effect of 0·1 per cent. on both the retail prices index and the tax and price index.

Mortgage Relief Scheme

Mr. Hall: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what the take-up rate of the mortgage relief scheme in Warrington, South has been in each year since its commencement.

Mr. Dorrell: I regret that this information is not available.

Personal Income Tax

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 24 February, Official Report, columns 593-94, if he will estimate the total tax forgone in each region in each year since 1988-89.

Mr. Dorrell: Available information is given in the table. Some regional estimates are based on small samples and all figures are given to the nearest £50 million.

Estimated change in tax revenue at rates in excess of 40 per cent.

Regulations

Mr. Sproat: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 9 February, Official Report, column 539, if he has now finished compiling and has checked for accuracy and consistency of definition the comprehensive provisional list of regulations for which his Department is responsible; and when he intends to place this list in the Library.

Mr. Dorrell: Work is proceeding as quickly as possible on checking my Department's list of regulations affecting business. A consolidated list of regulations for all Departments will be compiled by the central deregulation unit of the DTI and placed in the Library as soon as possible.

Council Tax

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what monitoring is carried out of the extent to which, in the area of every local authority, council tax listing officers have fully complied with their instructions to make inquiries from local authorities as to the existence of planning restrictions limiting dwellings to occupation by persons engaged in agriculture.

Mr. Nelson [holding answer 8 March 1993]: Monitoring of the major activities of council tax work was undertaken by visits to each listing office by central and regional office staff. There was no specific monitoring of the extent to which listing officers complied with the instructions referred to in the question.

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 25 January, Official Report, column 522, if he will publish the advice given to listing officers on the approach they should take to the valuation of farmhouses for council tax purposes.

Mr. Nelson [holding answer 8 March 1993]: Listing officers are required to band dwellings on the basis prescribed by council tax legislation.

Regulations

Mr. Sproat: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage, pursuant to his answer of 4 February, Official Report, column 251, if he has now finished compiling and has checked for accuracy and consistency of definition the comprehensive provisional list of regulations for which his Department is responsible; and when he intends to place the list in the Library.

Mr. Brooke: Work is proceeding as quickly as possible on checking my Department's list of regulations affecting business. A consolidated list of regulations for all Departments will be compiled by the central deregulation unit of the Department of Trade and Industry and placed in the Library as soon as possible.

Public Bodies

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how many appointments to the public bodies listed in "Public Bodies" for his Department were made from names supplied by the public appointments unit; and if he will list them.

Mr. Key: The Department of National Heritage is still in the process of setting up a central database of public appointees and therefore the information to answer this question is not yet available. Until this information is held centrally, this question could be answered only at disproportionate cost.

Local Authority Services

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for South Hams (Mr. Steen) of 10 November 1992, Official Report, columns 687-89, if he will list the members of the steering committee which is monitoring the investigations of the local provision of libraries, etc., by way of (a) their professional and occupational qualifications, (b) their occupations, (c) country in which they reside and (d) their remuneration; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: Nominations to the steering committee have been invited from the key library organisations, local authority associations and from the library supply trade. I will announce the names when they are known.

DEFENCE

Army Bands

Mr. Couchman: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he is yet in a position to make a statement about the future of Army bands.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The organisation of Army bands has been reviewed in order to ensure that the right numbers of bandsmen, providing music to the high standard expected, are employed in proportion to the Army's total size and that the important contribution that bands make to the regimental system is retained. The results of this review are as follows.

The number, size and affiliation of the state bands of the Household Division and of the Royal Artillery will be unchanged.

The size of other future bands will increase. In future all bands will have either 35 or 49 musicians, replacing present arrangements where many bands have fewer than 20 musicians. Such small bands are not musically viable and have proved difficult to recruit.

The need to ensure that bands are large enough to be musically viable makes it impossible to retain the present number of bands, taking into account the number of bandsmen who will be available as the Army reduces in size. However, in bringing forward new arrangements, it has been considered highly desirable to ensure that a substantial link is retained between an infantry or cavalry regiment and an allocated band. It is possible to do this while providing fewer bands overall, by allocating a number of bands to the Royal Armoured Corps, and to each of the divisions of infantry. The precise way in which these bands will meet regimental needs will be determined in accordance with the wishes of the regiments within the infantry divisions and of the Royal Armoured Corps. Under present arrangements, many regimental bands play for their regiment on only a limited number of occasions, and under the new arrangements there will be sufficient musical capacity overall to meet all regimental needs and to do so in a manner that will be consistent with regimental ceremony and traditions.

All other arms and corps which now have bands will in future have a band of 35 bandsmen, as for the first time will the Army Air Corps.

The overall organisation will be as follows:

	Bands	Size	Numbers
Household Cavalry	2	35	70
Foot Guards	5	49	245
Royal Armoured Corps	4	35	140
Infantry Divisions:
Scottish	2	35	70
Queens	2	35	70
Kings	2	35	70
Prince of Wales	2	35	70
Light	1	49	49
Parachute Regiment	1	35	35
Royal Irish Regiment	1	35	35
Royal Artillery	1	49	49
Royal Engineers	1	35	35
Royal Signals	1	35	35
Army Air Corps	1	35	35
REME	1	35	35
Royal Logistic Corps	1	35	35
Adjutant General's Corps	1	35	35

In addition, we shall be establishing a central music authority for the Army, headed by an inspector of Army music, responsible for recruitment, training and appointment of Army musicians. This will help to ensure the improvement and future maintenance of musical standards throughout the Army.

The operational role of bandsmen will remain unchanged.

These arrangements will ensure that the traditional role of music in support of the regimental system will continue, and that the Army as a whole will enjoy the highest standard of musical support.

Regulations

Mr. Sproat: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 12 February, Official Report, column 690, if he has now finished compiling and has checked for accuracy and consistency of definition the comprehensive provisional list of regulations for which his Department is responsible; and when he intends to place the list in the Library.

Mr. Aitken: My Department has completed its review and check for accuracy of the provisional list of administrative requirements which impact on business. My Department is not responsible for any primary or secondary legislation under which regulations are made which impact on industry. However, there are certain forms which the Department requires or invites companies with whom we conduct business to complete. A list of these is being placed in the Library.

RAF Vulcan

Mr. Nigel Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what was the cost of continuing training flights for the RAF Vulcan display flight from the end of September 1992 to date; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what was the cost, for the last year for which figures are available, of the operation of the RAF Vulcan display flight; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Aitken: I refer the hon. Member to the answers I recently gave to the hon. Member for Nuneaton (Mr. Olner) on 9 March 1993, column 549, and 12 March 1993, column 725 respectively.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT ADMINISTRATION

Family Planning

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assistance his Department has sought from British manufacturers and suppliers of contraceptives in connection with the Overseas Development Administration's promotion of family planning in the developing world; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The provision of contraceptives forms a relatively modest part of our population assistance, but it is increasing. The aim is to provide contraceptives of a type relevant to the needs of developing countries and selected in consultation with local institutions. A British manufacturer, Cilag Ltd., is currently supplying delfen foam—an aerosol contraceptive—to Pakistan under an ODA project worth over £500,000. Other British manufacturers have been invited to tender for condom contracts.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Sittings Costs

Mr. Cryer: To ask the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed, as representing the House of Commons Commission, what are the costs of preparing for a sitting of the House over the weekend of 13-14 March.

Mr. Beith: No additional costs have been incurred by House Departments.

Birmingham Northern Relief Road (Exhibition)

Mr. Elletson: To ask the Chairman of the Administration Committee if he has considered an application for an exhibition relating to the Birmingham northern relief road to be displayed in the Upper Waiting Hall.

Mr. Michael J. Martin: I understand that, under procedures agreed by the Administration Committee, arrangements have been made for the exhibition to be held in the Upper Waiting Hall from 19 to 26 April 1993.

EDUCATION

Unemployed Graduates

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what percentage of students who graduated in 1992 are still unemployed.

Mr. Boswell: Details of graduate destinations will be given in a statistical bulletin to be published shortly. Some 12 per cent. of full-time first degree students who graduated from higher education institutions in Great Britain in 1991 whose destinations were known were reported believed unemployed at December 1991. Destinations of 1992 graduates are not yet available.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education, pursuant to his answer of 9 March, Official Report, column 522, if he will break down the figures for employment, including other, of school leavers into (a) unemployment, (b) employment and (c) training schemes.

Mr. Boswell: The table gives an estimated breakdown of the figures of school leavers for "employment, including other" into their involvement in employment, training schemes and other. The Department does not collect data on school leavers who become unemployed.

Notes:

(1) Data on training schemes was not collected separately until 1988-89. Prior to this figures were included in "Employment" category.

(2) Prior to 1989-90, employment included those intending to take up full-time education at a later date. From 1989-90 onwards these are included in "Other" category.

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will publish a table showing the destination of 16-year-old school leavers by region for each year since 1980 specifying the numbers and percentages going into (a) employment, (b) unemployment, (c) training schemes, (d) full-time education, (e) part-time education and (f) other.

Mr. Boswell: The tables give the available estimates of the intended destinations and percentages of 16-year-old school leavers by region in England since 1980. The Department does not collect data on school leavers who become unemployed or those intending to study part-time.

Grant-maintained Schools Centre

Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Education for what purposes the Government intend in future to fund the Grant-Maintained Schools Centre.

Mr. Patten: Government grant to the Grant-Maintained Schools Centre will continue to support certain activities related to schools once approved for grant-maintained status. In addition, I now intend that it should be available to support the dissemination of factual information about grant-maintained status. The Grant-Maintained Schools Centre will be bound by the same code of practice as it is proposed should apply to local education authority officers and which is currently under discussion with them. In the meantime, the Grant-Maintained Schools Centre will be bound by the draft code which is the basis for discussion: copies are being deposited in the Libraries of both Houses.

Somerset University

Mr. Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education, pursuant to his answer of 15 February, Official Report, column 52, if he will give the date upon which he gave his consent to the use of the name "Somerset University"; and if he will publish the document in which his consent is recorded.

Mr. Boswell: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for York (Mr. Bayley) on 23 February, Official Report, column 509.

Education Authorities (Political Control)

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Education how many local education authorities are Conservative controlled.

Mr. Forth: Conservatives are the majority party on 26 local education authorites in England.

Teachers' Salaries

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will list the average classroom teacher's salary inclusive of incentive allowances and incremental enhancements for each education authority in England.

Mr. Forth: The table shows the average salary of standard scale teachers in the maintained nursery, primary and secondary schools sector on 31 March 1990. The figures are based on the actual salaries paid to teachers including incentive allowances, London allowances, and other discretionary payments. More recent figures are not yet available separately for each LEA. The 1992 new earnings survey recorded the average earnings of all school teachers in England and Wales, including head and deputy head teachers, as £20,498.

TRANSPORT

Air Pollution

Mrs. Wise: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what steps he will take to reduce the levels of nitrogen oxides and improve air quality in urban areas.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: An emissions test was included in the MOT test in November 1991. Tough European Community standards for new cars were introduced on 1 January. This has meant the fitting of catalytic converters to most new petrol-engined cars. A typical vehicle equipped with a catalyst in good condition will reduce its emissions of carbon monoxide, hydrocarbons and oxides of nitrogen by about 90 per cent. Since 1 September 1992 there has been a metered smoke test in the annual test for heavy diesels. A range of measures is also being implemented to cut traffic congestion and pollution through better traffic management, parking controls and improved public transport. The Department of Transport is also carrying out a wide-ranging study of urban traffic congestion, including the possible role of road pricing.

Regulations

Mr. Sproat: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his answer of 8 February, Official Report, column 418, if he has now finished compiling and has checked for accuracy and consistency of definition the comprehensive provisional list of regulations for which his Department is responsible; and when he intends to place the list in the Library.

Mr. Norris: Work is proceeding as quickly as possible on checking my Department's list of regulations affecting business. A consolidated list of regulations for all Departments will be compiled by the central deregulation unit of the Department of Trade and Industry and placed in the Library as soon as possible.

Railway Lines, North-west

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he will make a statement about the future of the Carnforth-Barrow and Barrow-Carlisle Cumbrian coast railway lines;

(2) if he will make a statement about the future of the Wigan-Southport and the Ormskirk-Preston railway lines.

Mr. Freeman: Our policy is to franchise the operation of all British Rail's passenger services to the private sector. Each franchise will be based upon the timetable operated by British Rail just prior to its commencement. In the meantime, decisions about services on individual lines remain a matter for British Rail.

Free Flight Offers

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to the answer of the President of the Board of Trade on 15 December 1992, Official Report, column 147, on guidelines on free flight offers, what progress has been made in the Government's consideration of the Civil Aviation Authority's proposal on a statutory financial protection scheme to reimburse scheduled passengers in the event of an airline collapsing.

Mr. Norris: The position remains as indicated in the answer of 15 December. Primary legislation would be needed to implement such a financial protection scheme and will necessarily depend on there being an opportunity to introduce such legislation.

Railways (Crimes)

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many crimes against the person and robberies were committed on the Liverpool Street to Romford line stations and trains over the past five years.

Mr. Norris: Figures are not readily available for years before 1991. Figures for crimes against the person on stations and trains between Liverpool Street and Romford in 1991 and 1992 are as follows:

	1991	1992
Robberies	31	31
Sexual offences	17	13
Assaults	34	30
Theft from person	37	50
Other	314	359
Total	433	483

Road Tolls

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what issues other than revenue raising and reduction of congestion will be included in his consideration of further road tolls.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: My right hon. Friend plans to publish by the early summer a Green Paper which will discuss the basis of charging for the use of inter-urban roads and all the issues arising from that. Reaction to the Green Paper will be an important consideration in developing policy in this area.

Road Accidents (Children)

Mr. Nigel Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what measures are being taken to reduce the number of children killed and injured outside schools by motorists; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: The Department has introduced a wide range of engineering, educational and publicity measures to reduce the number of children who are killed or injured on the roads. These were outlined in our 1990 policy document "Children and Roads: A Safer Way". In particular trials are being conducted of variable speed limits outside schools on busy trunk roads.

Exhaust Emissions

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his answer of 16 February, Official Report, columns 150-51, if he will give consideration to compensating engineering companies and garages in respect of the development and purchase of equipment to undertake the off-road testing of diesel exhaust emissions to comply with the new regulations; and if he will estimate the costs involved.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: The suspension of the metered check of diesel smoke is only temporary and it is my intention to reinstate it at the earliest opportunity. Consequently I do not consider that there is any case for offering compensation to equipment manufacturers. Equally, since owners of diesel-engined vehicles still have to go to MOT testing stations which have been authorised to test diesels where excessive smoke continues to be checked by eye, garages with smoke meters are not losing any fee income during the period of suspension.

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what action has been taken since 1 April 1991 in response to complaints about smokey vehicles; how many operators have been required to have vehicles tested at a testing station; and how many prohibition notices and operator license variations have been issued as a result.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: Since April 1991 the vehicle inspectorate has asked some 3,000 vehicle operators to check vehicles for excessive smoke, following complaints. Most operators have responded positively to these requests and have taken steps, where appropriate, to remedy defects. A follow-up vehicle inspection has been necessary only in a relatively few cases. I am not aware of any complaint which has resulted in the issue of a prohibition notice or action against an operator's licence. A vehicle would be inspected at a testing station only if that were necessary to clear a prohibition.

Cycle Routes

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment he has made of the operation of the scheme launched in 1982 to promote cycle routes in five towns; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: Carefully designed cycle routes were implemented in the towns in the study under this scheme. Much was learnt about how to provide safe, good-quality routes and facilities and the technical lessons have already been published. These routes did not result in an increase in cycling and in particular did not attract people to cycle instead of using their cars. However, the routes did improve safety for cyclists, who tended to congregate on them. The final report will be published soon.

Selby Bypass

Mr. Alison: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what stage has been reached in his departmental key event programme for the construction of the Selby bypass as published in September 1987; and what slippage has occurred.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: The 1987 White Paper categorised the proposed Selby bypass for construction from 1991 onwards. Preparatory works have since proceeded and, following a public inquiry, orders establishing the line and necessary alterations to side roads were made last month. We expect the next stage, which is the publication of the draft compulsory purchase order, to occur this summer.

Mr. Alison: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to be in a position to invite tenders for the construction of the Selby bypass and how soon thereafter to start work on the project.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: As statutory, financial and other procedures have still to be completed for the Selby bypass scheme, it is too early to give a firm date for when tenders could be invited. After the compulsory purchase order is published, the legal procedures allowing for objections, and possibly a public inquiry, have to be followed. Once this order is made it typically takes six to 12 months until we would be in a position to invite tenders. Works could be ready to start about six months later.

Road Accidents

Mr. Nigel Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many pedestrians under the age of 16 years were killed or injured in road accidents in 1992.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: The latest available data, for 1991, show that 20,848 pedestrians under the age of 16 were killed or injured in road accidents.

Passenger Rolling Stock

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what proposals there are to introduce new or newly constructed passenger rolling stock on the London, Tilbury and Southend line; what is the estimated cost; and when he expects it to be introduced;

(2) what action has been taken since 1988 to remove the danger of electrical explosions in the guard's vans and EMU rolling stock in operation on the London, Tilbury and Southend line; what modifications to rolling stock are still to be carried out; and what is the total cost of any modifications that have (a) been carried out and (b) are still to be carried out;

(3) how many units in each class of electrical multiple unit rolling stock are in use on the London, Tilbury and Southend line; what is the average age of each class of EMU; and what is the average age of all the rolling stock in use on the line;

(4) how many and which class of electrical multiple unit operating on the London, Tilbury and Southend line are being used with the guard's brake and adjoining passenger accommodation locked out of use as a precaution against electrical explosions;

(5) on how many occasions since 1988 there have been explosions in the guard's vans and electrical multiple unit rolling stock operating on the London, Tilbury and Southend line; and if he will give the date, class and EMU involved and the cause of the explosion for each incident.

Mr. Freeman: The number of units and the average age of the rolling stock in each class are as follows:

Class	Number of units	Average age (years)
302	30	35
308	27	32
310	37	27

The overall average age of the fleet is 29 years.

There have been two explosions in the guard's vans of London, Tilbury and Southend line rolling stock since 1988. These occurred on 15 September and 11 October 1991, and involved a class 308 unit and a class 312 unit respectively. Both incidents were caused by failure of the high tension cable insulation.

I understand from British Rail that the necessary repairs to the class 310 and 312 units have been done, and work on class 302 and class 308 units should be completed later this month, at a total cost of around £125,000.

The guard's van and adjoining coach on each of the seven class 302 and class 308 units still to be repaired are currently locked out of use.

My right hon. Friend and I have asked British Rail to tell us by Easter what rolling stock it wishes to lease using the £150 million leasing facility announced at the time of the autumn statement, and for which routes. Rolling stock for the London, Tilbury and Southend line is one of the options.

Mr. John Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what proportion of new rolling stock to be ordered by British Rail over the coming year is planned to be awarded to ABB York.

Mr. Freeman: Orders for new rolling stock are awarded by British Rail following competitive tendering in accordance with the EC utilities directive [90/531/EEC].

Jubilee Line

Mr. John Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport to which company the contract for building the new Jubilee line rolling stock will be awarded.

Mr. Norris: This is a matter for London Underground Ltd., which I know will not make a statement until a contract is signed.

Biofuels

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what assessment he has made of the relative polluting effects on the environment of biofuels compared with those of petrol or diesel; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what plans he has to encourage the wider availability of and increased use of bioethanol and rape methyl ester as a substitute for petrol or diesel;

(3) what plans he has to encourage the wider availability of and increased use of blended biodiesel and bioethanol blends as substitutes for petrol or diesel.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle [holding answer 15 March 1993]: The Department is sponsoring research assessing the environmental, operational and cost implications of a range of alternative road transport fuels including biofuels. This includes a study exploring the feasibility of conducting limited in-service field trials of alternative fuels. The series of linked reports should be complete by mid 1993. In addition the Department is carrying out emission tests on a separate biodiesel trial being conducted by Reading Buses.

While, in principle, biofuels offer the possibility of reduced carbon dioxide emissions, the case in terms of other emissions is not clear cut; and the cost of biofuels is very high. I am waiting for the outcome of the work currently under way. I have no plans, therefore, to encourage wider availability and use of biofuels at this stage.

ENVIRONMENT

Major Accident Hazards

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what communications he has received recently from the European Commission in regard to EC directive 82/501/EEC on major accident hazards of certain industrial activities.

Mr. Maclean: The United Kingdom received a letter from the European Commission acting under article 169, dated 18 February 1993, concerning the application of EC directive 82/501/EEC to a waste disposal incinerator in Gwent owned by ReChem International. The Department is currently considering this matter and a response will be made within the time limit set by the Commission.

Correspondence

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to reply to the letter dated 28 January from the hon. Members for East Lothian and for Durham, North-West (Ms Armstrong) requesting a meeting to discuss problems in the cement industry, which was transferred to his Department from the Department of Trade and Industry on 22 February.

Mr. Baldry: I refer the hon. Member to my letter to him dated 15 March.

Regulations

Mr. Sproat: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his answer of 12 February, Official Report, column 831, if he has now finished compiling and has checked for accuracy and consistency of definition the comprehensive provisional list of regulations for which his Department is responsible; and when he intends to place the list in the Library.

Mr. Howard: Work is proceeding as quickly as possible on checking my Department's list of regulations affecting business. It will be placed in the Library as soon as possible.

Housing

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what percentage of dwellings of each housing association registered with the Housing Corporation is (a) available for let, (b) to be let after minor repairs, (c) to be let after major repairs, (d) to be sold, (e) awaiting demolition and (f) unlet for any reason; and if he will give the national average for each category; (2) if he will list in rank order the percentage of dwellings available for letting but unlet for each housing association registered with the Housing Corporation, with an average for all associations.

Mr. Howard: Statistics on dwellings owned and managed by registered housing associations are collected by the Housing Corporation, which publishes annually figures for England as a whole. The information that is available at national average level, as at the end of March 1992, is as follows:

	Percentage	Percentage
(i) Dwellings under letting		97·5
(ii) Vacant and available for letting		1·1
(of which:
—requiring minor repair	0·4)
(iii) Vacant and not available for letting		1·4
(of which:
—awaiting or undergoing works	1·2
—awaiting sale	0·1
—other	0·1)

I shall ask the Housing Corporation to write to the hon. Member with information about individual housing associations.

Mr. Henderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the amounts of local authority housing capital provision for each of the last five years for each standard region of England and in total.

Mr. Baldry: I refer the hon. Member to my answer on 27 January 1993, Official Report, column 778 to the hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Milburn).

Mr. Henderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the amounts of housing revenue account subsidy given to local authorities for each of the last five years for each standard region of England and in total.

Mr. Baldry: The information requested is shown in the table. Housing revenue account subsidy was introduced in 1990-91 and so there is no comparable information for 1988-89 or 1989-90.

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many tenants have exercised their right under the charter programme to make bids for a housing action trust; and how many of these bids have been successful.

Mr. Baldry: We have had approaches from five tenants' groups. None has yet made a formal bid.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the standard spending assessment per head of population for each local authority in England for each year from 1989-90 to 1993-94.

Mr. Robin Squire: The information requested has been placed in the Library.

Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list for each year since 1974 the total expenditure of Worcester city council and Wychavon district council, and the average expenditure of the English district councils.

Mr. Robin Squire: Standard spending assessments for 1990-91 to 1993-94 and grant-related expenditure from 1981-82 to 1989-90 for Worcester and Wychavon are given below in millions of pounds and in pounds per head of resident population, together with the corresponding average for all shire districts.

It would be possible to provide information prior to 1981-82 only at disproportionate expense.

Mr. Henderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the amounts of central Government support for local authorities under his Department's inner cities programme for each of the last five years for each standard region of England and in total.

Mr. Robin Squire: The total amounts of expenditure outturn achieved by local authorities under my Department's urban group of programmes for each year from 1987-88 to 1991-92 are as follows:

[1]DOE region excludes Merseyside.
[2]Derelict land grant only.
[3]UDG and DLG only.
[4]Includes outturn figures for urban programme and derelict land grant; and UDG approvals for 1987-88 and 1988-89 only—UDG subsequently subsumed within city grant.

Further details of these and other urban group programmes, including urban development corporations, city grant, task forces and city action teams, are in the Department's annual reports.

Mr. Henderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what were the total amounts of central Government support for local authorities, voted in the estimates for his Department, for each of the last five years for each standard region of England and in total.

Mr. Robin Squire: The total amounts of central Government support for local authorities voted in estimates for which the Department of the Environment accounts, and included in the planning total, for the last five years were:

£ million

Year	Number
1987-88	19,180
1988-89	19,772
1989-90	20,715
1990-91	24,575
1991-92	32,376

In order to allow for comparison, these figures have been adjusted to reflect consistent definitions of the planning total and to include proxies for the yields of non-domestic rates prior to 1990-91.

Figures for each standard region in England are not available, and could not be obtained without disproportionate cost.

Mr. Henderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what are the figures for the yield from non-domestic rates for each of the last five years for each standard region of England, and in total;

(2) what are the figures of non-domestic rate payments to local authorities for each of the last five years for each standard region of England and in total;

(3) what were the amounts of rate support grant for local authorities for each of the last three years of its operation for each standard region of England and in total;

(4) what were the amounts of revenue support grant and community charge grant for local authorities for each of the last three years for each standard region of England and in total;

(5) what was the amount of grant given to local authorities for community charge transitional relief in respect of 1990-91, for each standard region of England, and in total;

(6) what were the amounts of grant given to local authorities under the community charge reduction scheme in respect of (a) 1991-92 and (b) 1992-93 for each standard region of England and in total.

Mr. Robin Squire: The information requested is as follows:

Columns 1 and 2 show estimated net non-domestic rate yield for 1988-89 and 1989-90 including income from properties which from 1990-91 would be shown on the central or crown lists.

Columns 3 to 5 show the estimated amount of non-domestic rates raised by local authorities for each year of the community charge system from properties shown on local lists—that is the contribution to the pool plus the allowance for the cost of collection. For 1990-91 and 1991-92 there are based on final calculations by authorities (taking into account prior year adjustments where appropriate. For 1992-93 the amounts shown are the provisional calculations of the contribution to the pool, taking into account in-year recalculations resulting from the provisions of the Non-Domestic Rates Act 1992. These amounts are not comparable with columns 1 and 2, which will include income from properties not on local lists.

Columns 6 to 8 show the amount of non-domestic rates paid to local authorities from the non-domestic rates pool for each year of the community charge system, 1990-91 to 1992-93. For 1992-93 payments from the pool include an Exchequer payment which compensates local authorities for the shortfall in 1992-93 which would otherwise occur as a result of the Non-Domestic Rating Act 1992. Payments of non-domestic rates in respect of 1988-89 and 1989-90 are assumed to be the same as the estimated yield, as shown in columns 1 and 2 respectively.

Columns 4 to 6 show the revenue support grant payable in each year of the community charge system from 1990-91 to 1992-93. The figures for 1992-93 include additional grant payable in respect of the teachers pay award.

Column 7 shows the community charge grant receivable in respect of 1991-92 community charges, as estimated by authorities when setting their community charges for 1992-93.

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the difference in the level of Government grant and business rates per head of population and per household between the London borough of Wandsworth and the London borough of Hackney.

Mr. Robin Squire: The amounts of revenue support grant (RSG) and income from the uniform business rate (UBR) per head of resident population and per household for 1993-94 for the authorities requested are given:

Local Authority	RSG £ per head	RSG £ per household	UBR £ per head	UBR £ per household
Wandsworth	619	1,459	213	501
Hackney	1,082	2,625	213	516

Note: The household figures are from the 1991 census.

Urban Regeneration Agency

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list all the people Lord Walker has met in furtherance of his role as chairman-designate of the Urban Regeneration Agency, the dates of these meetings and the reasons for them.

Mr. Robin Squire: Since the announcement of the Government's intention that he should be the first chairman of the Urban Regeneration Agency, Lord Walker has met numerous people on a range of matters and has listened to the views that many of them have expressed on the Urban Regeneration Agency.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what consultations he has had and plans to have with local authority associations on the composition of the board of the Urban Regeneration Agency; and when he intends to begin appointing board members;

(2) if he will make a statement on the criteria to be used in selecting people for appointment to the board of the Urban Regeneration Agency.

Mr. Robin Squire: Board members will not be appointed until after the Housing and Urban Regeneration Bill has received Royal Assent. In making the appointments, the Secretary of State will take into account views expressed during Parliament's consideration of the Bill and the responses to the consultation exercise on the agency, including those from the local authority associations. His aim in selecting board members will be to make a range of expertise available to the agency, choosing them for the contribution they can make, not because of whom they represent.

Tree Preservation Orders

Sir David Steel: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he will complete draft proposals for the revision of the legislation on tree preservation orders.

Mr. Maclean: The system of tree preservation legislation has proved its value over the years and remains extremely effective. It has been modified and strengthened from time to time and the Government are currently undertaking a formal review to see whether further progress can be made. My Department is continuing to study representations made in the light of the consultation stage of this review.

Waste Management

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what contribution has been made by British experts to the waste management policy group of the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development.

Mr. Maclean: Officials from my Department attend all meetings of the group to reflect United Kingdom experience and interests. The head of my Department's waste technical division chaired the group's advisory committee which prepared the 1992 OECD council decision on the control of transfrontier movements of wastes destined for recovery operations.

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what initiatives his Department supports in local authorities to support the separation and recycling of household wastes.

Mr. Maclean: My Department supports local authority initiatives for separating and recycling waste through supplementary credit approvals for recycling. The following authorities have been allocated supplementary credit approvals for 1992-93:

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what evaluation he has made of the application to the United Kingdom of the recent report on management of plastic wastes in Europe by the United Nations Economic Commission for Europe.

Mr. Maclean: We have examined the report, which will be a useful contribution to the current debate on recycling.

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what volumes of hazardous or toxic wastes have been imported into the United Kingdom since 5 May 1992; what ports of entry were involved; and what checks are made on consignments of imported wastes to ascertain if consignment papers match cargoes.

Mr. Maclean: Imports of hazardous or toxic wastes to the United Kingdom from 5 May 1992 until 12 March 1993, by last Customs office of entry, are as follows:

Port of entry	Waste (tonnes)
Boston	149·0
Dover	7,109·7

A transfrontier shipment note giving details of the nature, amount and destination of a consignment of toxic or hazardous waste must be sent to the relevant waste regulation authority before the wast shipment can take place and must travel with the consignment. The waste regulation authority is responsible for ensuring that the contents of consignments match the descriptions given in transfrontier shipment notes.

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what volumes of (a) lindane, (b) chlorobenzenes, (c) chlorophenols, (d) chlorinated methoxy benzene and (e) other dioxin-contaminated wastes have been imported into the United Kingdom since 1 January; what import licences have been issued over the past 15 months for such imports; and if he will make a statement on council decision 93/98/EEC on transfrontier transport of hazardous wastes and their disposal of 1 February, in so far as it applies to the United Kingdom.

Mr. Maclean: Imports are not recorded in the exact manner indicated by the hon. Member. The tables show the amount of waste imported (a) from 1 January 1992 to 12 March 1993 and (b) from 1 January 1993 to 12 March 1993.

Under decision 93/98/EEC of 1 February 1993, the Council approved the procedure for the conclusion, on behalf of the Community, of the Basel convention on the control of transboundary movements of hazardous wastes and their disposal. The Council on 23 March will consider the date of deposit of the instrument of approval by the Community.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what progress has been made by the European Commission and the EC technical adaptation committee in drawing up a list of wastes under the framework directive on waste, and a list of hazardous wastes under the hazardous waste directive;

(2) what consultation he has had with industry prior to producing the draft list of those wastes which would be considered hazardous in the context of the hazardous waste directive and associated measures;

(3) upon what scientific basis he has concluded that the recycling of paper sludge to agricultural land should be regarded as hazardous;

(4) what assessment he has made of the additional costs to United Kingdom industry if it were prevented from recycling paper sludge on agricultural sites and obliged instead to use formal landfill sites.

Mr. Maclean: The draft lists, known as the European waste catalogue, are being drawn up by the Commission's consultants for consideration by the technical adaptation committee. The catalogue is still at a formative stage and no decisions have yet been taken.

Successive drafts of the catalogue have been widely circulated for comment to a growing list of representative bodies, beginning in October last year.

In the light of responses to consultation, the Government are considering the draft catalogue, its potential cost implications, and the implications for the special waste regulations. Paper sludge is shown as non-hazardous in the draft. Other wastes from the paper manufacturing industry are shown as hazardous. Whether this would represent a change from the position under the existing special waste regulations will depend upon the precise composition of the waste concerned.

Tenants' Choice

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many tenants have exercised their rights under the tenants' choice programme to transfer from local authorities to housing associations.

Mr. Baldry: This information is not held in the form requested. However, 830 dwellings have transferred to housing associations, following successful tenants' choice ballots.

Uniform Business Rate

Mr. Alison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what individual valuations have been calculated and currently applied to the specifically and separately rateable British Coal installation within Selby district in relation to the introduction of uniform business rate.

Mr. Robin Squire: The Selby mine complex is assessed as one hereditament comprising land, buildings, rateable plant and machinery at five mines and a coal disposal point at Gascoigne Wood. Kellingley colliery is a similar property.

The table shows a breakdown of the 1992-93 assessments.

	Rateable value (£) Selby	Kellingley
Land value	46,000	30,250
Buildings, structures, rateable plant and machinery	3,786,500	1,148,550
Access rights (shafts etc.)	3,981,462	1,102,129
Mineral element	6,132,579	1,760,075
TOTAL	13,946,541	4,081,004

There is also a tipping site at Cridling Stubbs with an assessment of £59,228.

Solid Fuel

Mrs. Helen Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what responses he has received to the consultation paper issued in July 1992 about a proposal to limit the sulphur content of solid fuel for domestic use; and what action he has taken on the issue.

Mr. Maclean: My Department received comments from 23 organisations. These were mostly in favour of the proposal, but a number of practical problems of monitoring and enforcement were raised. We are currently considering next steps in the light of these responses.

City Challenge, Bradford

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what consideration he has given to the application of Bradford city challenge funds for providing grant aid to Springram Ltd. in connection with a new factory at Euroway estate, Bradford.

Mr. Robin Squire [holding answer 5 February]: Any such application is a matter for Bradford city challenge in the first instance. No formal proposal has been put to the Department for consideration.

Hedges

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many hedge planting and hedge repair schemes were carried out in rural areas in each year since 1979; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maclean [holding answer 15 March 1993]: Grants for hedgerow planting and for major repairs have been available under the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food's farm and conservation grant scheme and its predecessors since 1976. Farmers in environmentally sensitive areas may also benefit from the option of planting and repairing hedgerows under conservation plans. However, the information requested with regard to these schemes can be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Incentives are also offered under schemes run by the Countryside Commission. The countryside stewardship scheme seeks to conserve those features of the landscape which contribute to the preservation and abundance of our wildlife. The precise number of agreements involving hedgerow restoration and planting is not known, but an approximate figure since the scheme's launch in July 1991 is 344 agreements. The hedgerow incentive scheme provides grant aid for the restoration and management of our most valuable hedgerows. Since its launch in July 1992, 481 agreements have been made.

Countryside Stewardship Scheme

Mr. Martlew: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many successful applications were made under the countryside stewardship scheme in (a) 1991 and (b) 1992; what was the cost of such schemes for each year; how many schemes involved additional payments for public access; what was the total amount paid in additional access payments; and what was the amount of land for which access has been paid.

Mr. Maclean [holding answer 15 March 1993]: The table provides the information requested in relation to agreements secured with land managers under countryside stewardship as a result of applications to the scheme in 1991. Figures for 1992 are based on agreement offers made —final figures for agreements secured are not yet available.

Countryside stewardship	1991	1992
Successful applications which resulted in agreements or agreement offers	900	1,384
The cost of agreements secured or offered[1]	£3,250,000	£6,900,000
Number of agreements secured or offered in each year involving additional payments for public access	300	350
Amount paid for additional access[1 2]	£350,000	£625,000
Amount of land to which access payments apply[1 2]	7,000 (hectares)	12,474 (hectares)

[1] Figures shown for 1992 under these categories are based on the cumulative total for agreements secured as a result of applications made in 1991 and agreement offers made as a result of applications in 1992. Payments in respect of 1992 agreements are estimated only and most will not fall due until September 1993.

[2] In 1992 an additional access option was introduced to offer payments for the creation of linear routes. Figures are not included in the table, but it is estimated that 1992 agreements will lead to the creation of about 163 km of new linear access.

Leeds Development Corporation

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will set out for each year since its creation the publicity and public relations budget of the Leeds development corporation.

Mr. Robin Squire [holding answer 15 March 1993]: Leeds development corporation's expenditure on publicity and public relations, which includes the corporation's promotional and marketing activities, was £223,000 in 1988-89, £324,000 in 1989-90, £480,000 in 1990-91 and £499,000 in 1991-92. For 1992-93 the proposed level of expenditure is £300,000.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what has been the average length of sentence imposed on persons convicted for Northern Ireland-related offences in Great Britain in each year since 1969;

(2) what has been the average length of sentence imposed by the courts since 1973 on a terrorist convicted of Northern Ireland terrorist-related activities, excluding homicide, in England and Wales;

(3) what has been the average length of sentence imposed by the courts since 1973 on a terrorist convicted of Northern Ireland terrorist-related activities, excluding homicide, in Scotland.

Mr. Jack: The available statistics are contained in Home Office statistical bulletin "Statistics on the Operation of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Acts 1974 and 1976—29 November 1974 to 26 March 1984"—tables 4 and 5, issue number 10/84, and "Statistics on the Operation of Prevention of Terrorism Legislation—1992" —tables 5 and 6, issue number 5/93, copies of which are in the Library.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what has been the average length of sentence imposed by the courts since 1970 on a terrorist convicted of a Northern Ireland-related homicide in England and Wales.

Mr. Jack: All 10 suspects who have been convicted of a Northern Ireland-related homicide in England and Wales since 1970 were convicted of murder and sentenced to life imprisonment.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what were the occupations, by census classification or other categorisation, of each person killed on the European mainland in violence related to the security situation in Northern Ireland since 1969.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The available information relates to convictions following detention under prevention of terrorism legislation. This is contained in the Home Office statistical bulletin, issues 10/84 and 5/93.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Young Offenders

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what estimate he has made of the number of places required in secure training units for the 11 to 15 years age group which he announced on 2 March; and if he will publish the evidence on which he bases that estimate.

Mr. Jack: Work is proceeding on the development of detailed plans for the introduction of the new secure training order for persistent juvenile offenders between the ages of 12 and 15, including an assessment of the number of places likely to be required.

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 10 March, Official Report, column 557, when he expects to be able to provide an initial rough figure for the capital costs of (a) the individual units and (b) the total programme of secure training units for the 11 to 15 age groups announced on 2 March.

Mr. Jack: As my right hon. and learned Friend indicated in his statement on 2 March, columns 139-42, it is envisaged that the centres will be provided through agreements with suitable organisations which may come from the public, voluntary or private sectors provided that they can demonstrate the ability to meet the standards we shall be setting and to give value for money. Both the capital and revenue costs involved in implementing secure training orders are likely, therefore, to depend, inter alia, on a process of competitive tendering. This will take place once specifications have been drawn up.

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 9 March, Official Report, column 478, if he will give the reasons for the Government's view that corporal punishment is not an acceptable way of dealing with offenders.

Mr. Jack: There are considerable doubts about the effectiveness of corporal punishment as a deterrent. The courts had largely stopped using this form of punishment before its abolition in 1948, not least because of evidence which seemed to indicate that its use was counterproductive; those who were flogged were found to be more likely to commit further offences than similar offenders who were not subjected to corporal punishment.

Moreover, the use of corporal punishment would be contrary to the United Kingdom's obligations under article 3 of the European convention on human rights which states that no one shall be subjected to torture or inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.

Thames House

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how much is being spent on the refurbishment and structural work at Thames house.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The projected outturn cost of the work on Thames house is £238 million.

Police (Discipline)

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 22 February, Official Report, column 430, from which police authorities the 19 police officers retired.

Mr. Charles Wardle: My answer of 22 February contained an inaccuracy, for which I apologise. The number of police officers who had retired after disciplinary charges had been brought against them, but before those charges had been heard should have been given as 18, not 19. The police authorities from which the 18 officers retired in 1991 are set down in the table:

	Number
Cambridgeshire	3
Durham	1
Gloucestershire	1
Lancashire	2
Merseyside	1
Northumbria	1
South Wales	3
Surrey	1
Sussex	2
Thames Valley	2
West Midlands	1
Total	18

United Kingdom Immigrants Advisory Service

Sir John Wheeler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the plans for a new voluntary body to take over the general immigration work of the United Kingdom Immigrants Advisory Service.

Mr. Charles Wardle: I announced on 8 July 1992, columns 202-203, that the Government had decided to terminate the grant in aid paid to UKIAS and that my right hon. and learned Friend had invited Mr. Humfrey Malins to lead a small planning group, outside Government, to draw up proposals for a new voluntary body which would receive grant under section 23 of the Immigration Act 1971 and would take over UKIAS's general immigration work.

After consulting widely, the planning group completed its proposals at the end of last year and published its report on 29 January. A copy is in the Library of the House. The Government have now considered this report and have concluded that the trustees of an organisation constituted and structured as the planning group proposes would be able to meet their responsibilities under charity law and to satisfy the Home Office that there would be proper accountability for the grant paid. Accordingly, my right hon. and learned Friend is asking the planning group now to take steps to implement its proposals and establish the new body as outlined in the report.

The Government are most grateful to Mr. Malins and the members of the planning group for their work on the report and for their willingness to take their proposals forward, and also to the Reverend David Haslam and members of the standing executive committee who have formed an interim administration to run UKIAS during the transitional period so that the service to immigration appellants can continue.

Immigration (Prison Detention)

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people are currently being detained in prison as a result of immigration procedures; and what information he has on the length of time they have been held.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: On 31 January 1993, there were 299 detainees held in prison service establishments in England and Wales under the Immigration Act 1971. The latest available information relating to the period of detention is for 31 August 1992 and is given in the table.

Market Testing

Mr. Hall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the cost to date of the market test exercise in relation to establishment division 5 information systems and pay services.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Up to 31 March 1993 the cost of the market test of ED5 information systems and pay services is expected to be £217,000.

Mr. Hall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what financial arrangements he proposes to make with potential contractors in his market testing of establishment division 5 information systems and pay services to cover liabilities under the Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations 1981 and the EC acquired rights directive.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The potential contractors will be required to take account of the possible implications of the Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations 1981 and the EC acquired rights directive in their bids.

Mr. Hall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will require all prospective contractors for the work of the establishment division 5 information systems and pay services to be certificated to BS 5750 and hold the "TickIt" qualification.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Prospective contractors will need to demonstrate that they can deliver the service to an acceptable quality standard, such as the BS 5750 and "TickIt" qualification.

Genetic Engineering

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make representations to his EC partners to secure that all EC genetic engineering regulations are cross-linked with those on animal experimentation and welfare.

Mr. Charles Wardle: We ensure that appropriate opportunities are taken to remind our EC partners of the need to bear in mind the principles of EC directive 86/609/EEC on animal experimentation when considering genetic engineering matters.

Cinematograph Films (Animals) Act

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to amend the Cinematograph Films (Animals) Act 1937 to include films shown on television, in private clubs, and in video form.

Mr. Charles Wardle: We have no plans to amend the Cinematograph Films (Animals) Act 1937.

Animal Experimentation

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will bring forward proposals to impose a statutory requirement upon all those undertaking work under the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986 to receive compulsory training.

Mr. Charles Wardle: From 1 April 1994 applicants for personal licences will be required to have completed successfully an accredited training programme. In addition to this, from 1 April 1995, first-time project licence applicants will require further pre-licensing training, to be acquired from accredited training programmes.

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make it his policy to secure the formation of animal care and use committees at all establishments designated under the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The regulatory system established under the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986 places responsibility on the holder of a certificate of designation issued under section 6 to ensure proper standards of animal care and use at his or her establishment. In discharging that responsibility, it is open to the certificate holder to establish an animal care and use committee according to local circumstances and need. There are no plans to require such committees at all designated establishments.

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to extend the conditions of the code of practice on housing and care of laboratory animals to cover breeding and supply establishments.

Mr. Charles Wardle: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to an earlier question from the hon. Member on 3 November 1992, column 128.

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to increase the number of his departmental inspectors to undertake work in relation to the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986.

Mr. Charles Wardle: None.

Crime Statistics

Mr. Nigel Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many crimes have been committed by those aged 18 years and younger each year since 1983;

(2) what was the total number of convictions for all offences in each year since 1983.

Mr. Jack: Information on "known offenders"—those found guilty or cautioned—by age is published annually in the Command Paper "Criminal Statistics England and Wales". Table 5.23 of the 1988 and 1991 publications gives the requested data for indictable offences back to 1983.

Figures showing the number of convictions for all offences are also published annually in the above-mentioned publication. Table 5.8 of the 1991 issue gives figures back to 1981.

A copy of this publication is available in the Library.

1992 data will not be available until the autumn of 1993.

Mr. Nigel Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many people were convicted for committing crimes involving the use of firearms in each year since 1979;

(2) how many people are currently serving prison sentences for committing crimes that involved the use of firearms.

Mr. Jack: Information for the years 1979, 1980, 1987 and 1989 to 1991 on the number of persons convicted of offences involving the use of firearms in England and Wales is given in the table. Information about other years could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Information is not held centrally about the number of persons currently serving prison sentences for offences that involve the use of firearms. However in 1991, 1,261 offenders were sentenced at the courts in England and Wales to immediate custody for indictable offences and 15 for summary offences which all involved the use of firearms.

1992 data will not be available until autumn 1993.

Mr. Jack: Statistics on notifiable offences recorded by the police in which firearms were reported to have been used by police force area were published in "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales", supplementary tables 1989 Vol. 3—for the years 1979 to 1989 and 1991 Vol. 3—for the years 1990 and 1991—table S3.1(A). Copies of these publications are in the Library.

Mr. Nigel Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many crimes involving physical violence were reported in each year since 1983.

Mr. Jack: The available information is for notifiable offences recorded by the police. Statistics for 1983 to 1991 were published in table 2.24 of the 1991 volume of "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales". The latest figures are for the 12 months ending June 1992 and were published in Home Office statistical bulletin 31/92. Copies of both are available in the Library.

Mr. Jack: This information is not separately identifiable in the statistics collected centrally.

Crime Prevention

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make it his policy to place a statutory responsibility upon local authorities to allocate a budget for crime prevention measures.

Mr. Jack: No. It is for individual local authorities to determine their expenditure priorities within overall budgets.

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on his plans for the greater involvement of local authorities in (a) crime prevention and (b) protection to the general public from the effects of crime.

Mr. Jack: Local authorities are already closely involved in crime prevention and the protection of towns and neighbourhoods through their participation in the delivery of a number of the Government's housing and inner city initiatives, including city challenge, estates action and the safer cities programme. Outside these programmes, the Government welcome the increasing development by local authorities of their own community safety strategies and action plans, in partnership with the police and other agencies, following guidance issued to them in Home Office circular 44/90 (Welsh Office circular 28/90).

Primates

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will establish a United Kingdom register of breeding primates.

Mr. Charles Wardle: There are no plans for a register exclusively for the United Kingdom. The Primate Society of Great Britain has suggested the establishment of a European primate register, and we have raised this idea with our EC partners. These discussions are at an early stage.

Dog Breeders

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to introduce legislation to control and restrict the activities of dog breeders and dealers.

Mr. Charles Wardle: None. Establishments where dogs are bred for sale are already subject to the controls of the Breeding of Dogs Act 1973. The controls of the 1973 Act were strengthened by the Breeding of Dogs Act 1991.

Mr. Charles Wardle: Registrations under the British nationality (Hong Kong) selection scheme commenced on 25 May 1991. Between then and 6 March 1992, 3,405 British citizen passports were issued in Hong Kong to scheme beneficiaries. The corresponding figure for 7 March 1992 to 6 March 1993 was 18,767.

Metropolitan Police Commissioner

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department who is responsible for the appointment of the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis; and to whom the appointee is subsequently responsible.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis is appointed by her Majesty the Queen. He subsequently conducts the business of that office under the direction of the Secretary of State.

Mr. Mike O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the police authorities, with the sum involved in each case, affected by the reduction in class IX, vote I, sub-head D2, "special grants for policing costs", in the spring supplementary estimates.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: No police authorities were affected by this reduction, which was due to a lower than anticipated level of grant being due in support of payments made by assisted police authorities.

PRIME MINISTER

Banking Supervision

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Prime Minister what discussions he has had concerning the content of the second report of the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee, Session 1992-93, "Banking Supervision and BCCI: The Implications of the Bingham report."

The Prime Minister: I meet my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer regularly to discuss matters of common interest.

Water and Sewerage Services, Scotland

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Prime Minister when he expects a decision to be taken on the future of water and sewerage services in Scotland; and if he will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland has received nearly 5,000 responses to his consultation paper on the future of water and sewerage services in Scotland. He will make a decision when all responses have been considered.

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Prime Minister which Department is responsible for deciding on the future of water and sewerage services in Scotland; and if he will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland is responsible for deciding on the future of water and sewerage services in Scotland.

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the total estimated cost of road traffic accidents to the national health service at current prices and in cash terms (a) in 1980 and (b) in each of the last three years.

Mr. Sackville: This information is not held centrally.

Misappropriation

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action is taken when national health service cash or assets have been misappropriated or improperly obtained by (a) members of the public, (b) members of staff or (c) managers, directors or chairmen.

Dr. Mawhinney: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on 20 January at column 322.

Nursing Homes

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what evidence she has received from family health services authorities that general practices are de-registering or refusing to register elderly residents of nursing homes.

Dr. Mawhinney: None.

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will issue guidelines to general practitioners about the extent to which palliative treatment should be given by general practitioners to residents of nursing homes.

Dr. Mawhinney: No.

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what advice she has issued to family health services authorities to deal with the de-registering or the refusal to register by general practitioners of elderly residents of nursing homes.

Dr. Mawhinney: Family health services authorities are aware of their obligations in this area. They are able to provide to patients a list of alternative doctors in their area. Under the National Health Service General Medical Services Regulations 1992, family health services also have the power to assign a patient to a general practitioner should that patient experience problems in registering in the normal way.

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many general practitioners in Derbyshire have refused to give palliative care to residents of nursing homes in the county; and what steps she has taken to rectify the situation.

Dr. Mawhinney: We have no evidence to suggest that any general practitioner in Derbyshire has refused to provide palliative care to patients resident in nursing homes.

Warrington Hospital

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what were the post-operative infection rates for each year since 1990 for Warrington general hospital.

Mr. Sackville: This information is not collected centrally. The hon. Member may wish to contact Mr. D. Hannah, chairman of Warrington health authority, for details.

Complementary Therapies

Miss Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment she has made of the savings to the NHS drugs budget from the use of complemetary therapies in general practice; and if she will make provision to fund research to provide evidence for such savings.

Dr. Mawhinney: No such assessment has been made directly involving complementary therapies. The Department and the National Health Service management executive have taken a number of measures to contain spending on the NHS drugs budget and shall continue to seek ways of improving the effectiveness of these measures, as well as considering, new ones.

Mr. Congdon: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what recent assessment she has made of the contribution that complementary therapists make to the health of the nation.

Mr. Sackville: The national health service may adopt a variety of approaches in meeting the health needs of the population. Natural therapies may be incorporated in local arrangements for health care, including programmes aimed at meeting the targets in the key areas initially selected for action in "The Health of the Nation" strategy, where they are considered appropriate and cost-effective.

Breast Implant Surgery

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps are being taken to make prospective patients aware of the risks involved in breast implant surgery.

Mr. Sackville: The Department keeps the potential risks of these implants under review and provides advice. The Chief Medical Officer wrote to all doctors on this topic in January 1992. A copy of the letter has been placed in the Library.

It remains the professional responsibility of clinicians to inform patients about the possibility of any known side effects in the process of obtaining consent.

Abortion

Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what assessment has been made of the incidence of significant under-reporting of the numbers of abortions in some health authorities; and if she will make a statement;

(2) if she will obtain for her departmental library a copy of a publication the name of which has been supplied to her.

Mr. Sackville: Any evidence of under-reporting is always investigated. The publication referred to is the November 1992 issue of the British Journal of Obstetrics and Gynaecology, a copy of which is held in the Department's library. One of the articles in the journal is about apparent discrepancies in the number of abortions carried out in one health region. The figures are being investigated and follow-up action will be taken if required.

Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will give a breakdown by district health authority of the number of abortions performed in the latest year for which figures are available which are recorded (a) through the formal notification procedure and (b) through records of hospital activity; if she will calculate the percentage discrepancy in each case; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Sackville: A comparison of data from the hospital episode statistics (HES) system with those from the formal notification system is being carried out. Any discrepancies will be further investigated.

Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what recent representations she has received concering possible under-reporting of abortions by some health authorities.

Mr. Sackville: Two such representations have been received since the beginning of 1991.

Psychiatric Care

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will make it her policy to establish a statutory right of access to a key worker and a care programme for all those under the care of a consultant psychiatrist who currently live in the community.

Mr. Yeo: We have no plans to introduce new legislation to this effect.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will make it her policy to ensure that mental health review tribunals do not discharge patients from compulsory detention in hospital unless adequate after-care arrangements are provided.

Mr. Yeo: The care progamme approach makes it the responsibility of all district health authorities, in collaboration with local social services departments, to draw up individual care programmes for all in-patients about to be discharged from mental illness hospitals. This includes those patients discharged by a mental health review tribunal. I understand that tribunals take account of proposed aftercare arrangements in the evidence they receive when considering discharge.

Prescriptions

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health on average how many items of prescription are dispensed each day (a) to patients exempt from charge and (b) to patients paying for prescription.

Dr. Mawhinney: In 1991, the latest year for which information is available, an average of 1·01 million prescribed items were dispensed each day by community pharmacists and appliance contractors, of which about 812,000 went to patients exempt from charge or entitled to charge remission and some 199,000 went to patients who paid charges or held prescription prepayment certificates.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many prescriptions for moisturising creams were dispensed in 1991-92.

Dr. Mawhinney: Moisturising creams as such are not a recognised therapeutic category. The number of prescriptions for emollients dispensed by community pharmacists and dispensing doctors in England in 1991 was 2·2 million.

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what studies her Department has made of the evolution of prescribing patterns in each of the 10 categories of medicines to which she proposes to extend the selected list system.

Dr. Mawhinney: None. It will be for the Advisory Committee on National Health Service Drugs to decide what data it needs to enable it to complete its review.

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations she has received from pharmaceutical companies about the implications for employment of the proposed extension of the selected list for medicines.

Dr. Mawhinney: We have received a number of representations from pharmaceutical companies. In response, we have pointed out that the changes we are introducing mirror measures being taken throughout Europe to limit the growth of drugs bills. Investment and employment in the United Kingdom pharmaceutical industry depend on a number of factors in both the United Kingdom and other key pharmaceutical markets.

Sir Keith Speed: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what level of prescribing must be reached before a generic drug is included within part 8 of the drug tariff.

Dr. Mawhinney: Entry to the drug tariff is triggered automatically when 100,000 prescriptions are written generically per year.

Sir Keith Speed: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is her estimate of the number of prescription items to be written under the national health service in the 1993-94 financial year.

Dr. Mawhinney: This information is not available in the form requested, but it is estimated that some 448 million prescribed items will be dispensed by community pharmacists, appliance contractors and dispensing doctors in 1993-94.

Personal Social Services

Mr. Garnier: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the level of resources for spending on personal social services, including community care, in 1992-93 and 1993-94; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Yeo: Total standard spending for local authority personal social services in 1992-93 is £4,850 million. In 1993-94 standard spending will be £5,585 million, an increase of 15 per cent. Included in the 1993-94 total is the special transitional grant of £565 million for community care. This provides evidence of the Government's commitment to social services. Standard spending next year will be more than 33 per cent. higher in real terms than in 1990-91. Expenditure by local authorities in 1992-93 is 67 per cent. higher in real terms than in 1978-79, and the special transitional grant is 35 per cent. higher than the transfer of resources from the Department of Social Security.

Leprosy Patients (Thalidomide)

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations she has received from the Committee on the Safety of Medicines concerning the use of thalidomide to treat leprosy patients.

Dr. Mawhinney: None.

Complaints Procedure

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many complaints were made by patients to family health service authorities about general practitioners during the last year for which figures are available; and how many of these complaints were upheld.

Dr. Mawhinney: The latest available figures relating to formal complaints are contained in table 5.14 (Family Health Services) of "Health and Personal Social Services Statistics 1992", a copy of which is in the Library.

Figures for the numbers of comments, suggestions and informal complaints made to family health services authorities are not available centrally.

Young Offenders

Lady Olga Maitland: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will list the local authorities who have provided secure units for juvenile offenders and those which have not.

Mr. Yeo: I refer my hon. Friend to the replies I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Elmet (Mr. Batiste) on 20 January at columns 318-19.

Mr. Peter Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what provision has been made by local authorities in the north-east to provide secure accommodation for young offenders.

Mr. Yeo: The information is shown in the table.

Secure accommodation in North East region

Location	Managing authorities	Number of secure places
New Aycliffe Royston House	Durham	14
Aycliffe Community Home special unit	Durham	36
Netherton Park Elm secure unit	Northumberland	5

Mr. Peter Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will list the premises in the Hexham constituency which have been used to provide accommodation for young offenders in each of the last five years; if she will provide details of the local authorities who have made use of them; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Yeo: Information is not available centrally about the individual premises in which children or young people are looked after by local authorities or voluntary organisations other than for local authority secure units. There are no secure units in the Hexham constituency.

The provision of accommodation for young people on sentence is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary.

Doctors' Working Hours

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the average number of hours worked by (a) consultants and (b) junior hospital doctors in England in each of the past five years (i) by region and (ii) nationally.

Dr. Mawhinney: Information on the average hours worked by consultants and junior hospital doctors is not available centrally. Information on regional averages could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

The average weekly contracted hours for junior hospital doctors in England is available for the period 1988-91, as at 30 September each year, as follows:
1988:82 hours 1989:81 hours 1990:80 hours 1991: 80 hours (all figures rounded to the nearest whole hour).

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many junior hospital doctors worked fewer than 83 hours a week as at 1 March; and how many remain above that figure.

Dr. Mawhinney: This information is not available centrally.

Eye Tests

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people received eye tests free of charge in each of the last five years by category of exemption from charges.

Dr. Mawhinney: The number of free national health service sight tests paid for in each financial year in England in each of the last five years are shown in the table, by category of exemption from charges.

[1] From April 1989, national health service sight tests were restricted to certain groups in the population. The sight tests paid for in 1989-90 include some conducted prior to 1 April 1989—old scheme—when national health service sight tests were universally available. The remainder paid for in 1989-90 do not represent a full year under the new system, because of the delay in payments. The figure for 1989-90 is not, therefore, directly comparable with that for 1990-91.

Antacids

Mr. Renton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to her answer of 22 February, Official Report, column 480, what was the total prescription volume and costs for (a) antacids and (b) anti-ulcer drugs for each of the last 10 years.

Dr. Mawhinney: The information is as follows:

Regulations

Mr. Sproat: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to her answer of 5 February, Official Report, column 379, if she has now finished compiling and has checked for accuracy and consistency of definition the comprehensive provisional list of regulations for which her Department is responsible; and when she intends to place the list in the Library.

Mr. Sackville: A consolidated list of regulations for all Departments will be compiled by the central deregulation unit of the Department of Trade and Industry and placed in the Library as soon as possible.

Dr. Kypros Loucas

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if she will establish a special compensation scheme for patients found to have been wrongfully treated by Dr. Kypros Loucas;

(2) what requests for assistance Her Majesty's Government have received from the General Medical Council in respect of the inquiry into the conduct of Dr. Kypros Loucas.

Mr. Yeo: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave her on 15 March at column 7.

Maternity Services

Mrs. Wise: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many women were delivered in England during each of the financial years 1990-91 and 1991-92; and how many (a) complete and (b) incomplete records have been included in the maternity hospital episode system data files for each of these two financial years.

Mr. Sackville [holding answer 12 March 1993]: There were 665,065 deliveries in England during 1990-91, the latest year for which figures are available.

During 1990-91 there were 400,448 delivery episodes recorded on the maternity hospital episode system. An analysis of the quality and completeness of these data is proceeding. The data files for 1991-92 are not yet available.

WALES

Housebuilding Statistics

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what are the latest year-on-year figures in public sector housebuilding, giving figures for elderly persons' accommodation separately; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Information on activity is given in the table:

Completions of local authority and new town dwellings and units provided by housing associations

	Built for the elderly	Total
1990-91	385	3,525
1991-92	396	3,885

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what are the latest year-on-year figures for housing association housebuilding.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Information on activity is given in the table:

Total units provided by housing associations in Wales

	Total
1990-91	3,060
1991-92	3,548

Committee of the Regions

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what consultations he has had in relation to the functions of the Welsh Economic Council and proposals for a forum for membership of the Committee of the regions representing Wales; and if he will make it his policy to make strict definitions of the purposes of the proposed council and forum to avoid duplication of functions.

Mr. David Hunt: I have received 89 responses to my consultation paper on the Welsh Economic Council; consultations are continuing.

Heads of the Valley Authority

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list those organisations and individuals who made representations to him proposing a unitary authority based on Blaenau Gwent, Merthyr Tydfil together with the community areas of Rhymney, Darran Valley and New Tredegar.

Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales whether he will list those organisations and individuals who recommended to him the establishment of the proposed Heads of the Valleys unitary authority.

Mr. David Hunt: My proposal to establish a Heads of the Valley unitary authority was based upon my consideration of the large number of often conflicting representations I received about the possible boundaries of unitary authorities in the valleys. Copies of the representations I received, both to my consultation paper of June 1991 and to my statement to the House of 3 March 1992, are in the Library of the House.

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a further statement on the application of the criteria of the community identity and traditional loyalty to which he made reference in Cm. 2155 "Local Government in Wales", to his proposed unitary authority based on Blaenau Gwent, Merthyr Tydfil, together with the community areas of Rhymney, Darran Valley and New Tredegar.

Mr. David Hunt: I am well aware of the strength of community identity that exists in these areas. I am confident that the proposed Heads of the Valleys authority, which is based on communities which share similar heritage, will be well able both to respond to the needs of local people and to ensure the provision of high quality services efficiently, economically and effectively.

NHS Expenditure

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what has been spent per head of the population on the national health service in Wales in each year since 1985 at (a) current and (b) outturn prices.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The information requested is given in the table.

NHS (in Wales) Expenditure (Gross) per head

Training and Enterprise Councils

Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what are the total budgets for each training and enterprise council in Wales for 1992-93 and the estimated budgets for 1993-94; and what are the amounts in each case for (a) youth training and (b) adult training.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The information requested in respect of 1992-93 was given in my replies to the hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Milburn) on 10 November 1992.

Information relating to 1993-94 budgets is not available, as contracts with training and enterprise councils have not yet been finalised.

Regional Technology Centres

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what plans he has to develop regional technology centres to establish delivery mechanisms for innovation and technology transfer and offer specific services to small and medium-sized enterprises in Wales.

Mr. David Hunt: Colleges in Wales provide a regional network of centres of technology and, with the active support of the Government, many of these organisations including North East Wales institute (NEWI), Carmarthenshire college of technology and art (CCTA) and the university of Glamorgan, already deliver focused technology transfer services to Welsh industry, particularly small and medium-sized enterprises (SMEs). University colleges, and companies, in Wales make extensive use of the teaching company scheme and are involved in many of the LINK programmes.

The Welsh Development Agency also encourages technology transfer; Imperial Park is being developed and this and other initiatives such as the Welsh relay centre and support under the European STRIDE and DTI college-industrial units programmes will build on existing strengths and make an invaluable contribution towards enhancing the innovative culture we are seeking to encourage within Welsh SMEs.

Moreover, as I announced recently, the Government are reviewing the scope for transferring responsibility for a range of schemes for encouraging industrial innovation and technology transfer in Wales from the Department of Trade and Industry to the Welsh Office.

Far East Investment

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what representations have been made by his Department to companies and organisations in (a) Taiwan, (b) Hong Kong and (c) Singapore concerning the development of inward investment programmes in Wales.

Mr. David Hunt: My Department, together with Welsh Development International, is in close touch with a number of companies in Taiwan, Hong Kong and Singapore about the opportunities for investment in Wales.

Local Government Reorganisation

Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what time scale he proposes for the further consultation on the White Paper on local government reorganisation.

Mr. David Hunt: I would welcome views from right hon. and hon. Members and all other interested parties as soon as possible.

School Music

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to the answer of 9 March to the hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones), Official Report, columns 513-14, what proposals he has to consult the chairman of the Welsh Arts Council in relation to the funding of school and county-level brass bands, youth choirs and orchestras.

Sir Wyn Roberts: None. I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply given to the hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside on 9 March, columns 513-14.

Market Testing

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what assessment he has made of the consequences of market testing bids for civil service jobs in Wales for divestment of work out of Wales.

Mr. David Hunt: If such aspects arise, I will consider them in the context of each case.

National Museum Schools Service

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many county councils currently support financially the national museum schools service; how many of them have indicated that they will cease to support that service after 1 April; what assessment he has made over the impact of the future level of funding on the achievement of national curriculum history syllabus targets in primary and secondary schools; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Wyn Roberts: Five local education authorities currently give financial support to the schools museum service. Three of them have indicated their intention to give some continuing support next year, but South Glamorgan and Gwynedd have said that they will withdraw support. The £150,000 grant from the Welsh Office which my right hon. Friend announced on 9 December 1992 should more than offset the reduced support from the local education authorities, and should allow the present service to be sustained. The total level of financial support will also depend on contributions from schools. No assessment of the effects of the reduced local education authority support can yet be made.

Regulations

Mr. Sproat: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to his answer of 8 February, Official Report, column 485, if he has now finished compiling and has checked for accuracy and consistency of definition the comprehensive, provisional list of regulations for which his Department is responsible; and when he intends to place the list in the Library.

Mr. David Hunt: Pursuant to the answer given on 8 February, I can now confirm that there are no such Wales-only regulations.

Health Staff (Bloodborne Diseases)

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what guidelines he will issue to Welsh health authorities in relation to prompt reporting to his Department of the present or past service of bloodborne virus-infected health professionals in their employ involved in invasive forms of treatment or surgery with a view to recall systems, counselling and, where necessary, redeployment away from invasive surgery.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The Welsh Office will be associated with the review of advice on procedures to be adopted by health authorities announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health on 11 March 1993.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what proposals he has in relation to improvement of medical records database to enable accurate recall of ex-patients, where those patients were treated or their babies delivered by health professionals subsequently found to be suffering from AIDS or infected by HIV, Hepatitis B or other bloodborne viruses and diseases.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The Welsh Office is supporting a project to improve the quality and consistency of the medical record which will help in the identification of patients who may have been treated by an infected health professional.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has received in relation to Mid Glamorgan health authority's decision not to notify the public or to issue specific recall notices to patients treated by, or children delivered by or with the assistance of their late doctor employee, deceased suffering from AIDS.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: My right hon. Friend has received three representations about this matter.

Royal Naval Armaments Depot, Trecwn

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what are the terms of reference of the study that has been commissioned into the suitability and specific qualities of RNAD Trecwn for decommissioning munitions; and what form the study will take.

Mr. David Hunt: The study is being managed jointly by the Welsh Development Agency, Dyfed county council and Preseli Pembrokeshire district council. It will be primarily a locational study, seeking to identify the specific advantages of RNAD Trecwn for decommissioning. The study will be carried out in parallel with a North Atlantic Treaty Organisation study into decommissioning munitions being carried out by the NATO Maintenance and Supply Agency (NAMSA).

The terms of reference of the RNAD Trecwn study are to analyse:

skill availability;

depot size and handling capacity in relation to information provided by the NAMSA study; security and administration;

locational advantages and disadvantages, including transport and internal movements; and suitability for the methods of decommissioning required, as identified by the NAMSA study.

Youth Training

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the youth training budget for each of the seven Welsh training and enterprise councils for the 1993-94 financial year.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The information requested is not yet available. The training and enterprise councils have been given indicative budgets during the course of negotiations, but contracts for 1993-94 have not been finalised.

Welsh Development Agency

Mr. Richards: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the appointment of the chairman of the Welsh Development Agency.

Mr. David Hunt: I am considering a large number of applications received in response to advertisements for this appointment. This will not be completed in time for a new appointment to become effective before the end of this month and I have therefore asked the present chairman, Dr. Gwyn Jones, to continue in post until the end of June. I am pleased to say that Dr. Jones has told me that he has been able to adjust his commitments to enable him to do so. I will make a further announcement about the appointment in due course.

Ancient Monuments

Mr. Martlew: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many ancient monuments in Wales are currently scheduled; how many he estimates ought to be scheduled; when he estimates the scheduling will be complete; how many scheduled monuments have been damaged or destroyed in each of the last five years; what were the causes of that damage or destruction, and if he will make a statement.

Sir Wyn Roberts: Responsibility for this subject has been delegated to Cadw: Welsh Historic Monuments. I have asked the chief executive, John Carr, to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from E. A. J. Carr to Mr. Eric Martlew, dated March 1993:

I am replying to your recent Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Wales about the scheduling of ancient monuments in Wales since the matters you raise are the responsibility of the Agency.

The identification and scheduling of monuments of national importance is a key activity for the Agency. An evaluation of all known archaeological remains in Wales is underway and currently 2,697 monuments have been scheduled. It is estimated that when this exercise is completed, the total number of scheduled monuments in Wales might be of the order of 5,500.

We have been considering how the Agency's work in this area might be accelerated and you will be interested to know that during the next financial year, Cadw will be supplementing the work of its Inspectorate by employing a contractor to work on the scheduling enhancement of Roman military sites in the Principality. We shall also be reviewing the way in which contractors could be used to further accelerate this work.

The Agency routinely monitors the condition of all scheduled monuments on a three year cycle, and where damage has been identified all such cases are investigated. Depending on the circumstances of each case our response has ranged from a warning to those involved to a prosecution of the offenders. In two cases a successful prosecution has been mounted and a further two cases have been referred to the Crown Prosecution Service.

The Agency has no precise record of the number of scheduled monuments that may be damaged each year but from the monitoring arrangements I mention above this is kept under review. You might find it helpful to have details of those monuments descheduled in the last five years due to reasons of damage or destruction though you will see that in each case damage occured before 1988.

1988-89
Y Gaer Camp, Clwyd:
The site has been levelled and landscaped removing any evidence of the monument when developed as a caravan park in the 1950s.

1989-90
Mount Sion Round Barrow, Dyfed:
This monument was situated in the middle of two gun ranges and was destroyed by gunfire in 1981.

Mynydd Llanybyther, alignment of standing stones, Dyfed:
No remains of this monument survive. It was probably destroyed when the area was first planted by the Forestry Commission in 1957.

Siemens Laboratory, West Glamorgan:
Demolished following grant of scheduled monument consent in 1987.

1990-91
Castell Dol Wiff:
The monument was lost when the site was levelled and a bungalow built over the site in 1983.

Rose Valley Barrow:
The remains of the barrow are thought to have been lost as a consequence of natural erosion. The original mound is thought to have been levelled when the site was brought into agricultural use and ploughed probably in the 1970s.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Royal Victoria Hospital

Dr. Hendron: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many beds for patients there are in the Royal Victoria hospital at present and how many there were during each of the last five years.

Mr. Hanley: The average numbers of available beds in the Royal Victoria hospital from 1987 to 1991-92 are as follows:

	Number
1987	1,008
1988-89	1,019
1989-90	977

Information on the number of available beds at present in the Royal Victoria hospital is not held centrally.

Dr. Hendron: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many nurses will be employed at the Royal Victoria hospital at the end of 1993.

Mr. Hanley: It is not possible to state the number of nurses who will be employed at the Royal Victoria hospital at the end of 1993. This will be determined on the basis of service requirements at that time.

Dr. Hendron: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many nurses have been employed at the Royal Victoria hospital for each of the last five years; and what was the ratio of nurses to patients in each year.

Mr. Hanley: The information is set out in the table.

	Number of nurses		Nurse (WTE)/Patient Days ratio[2]
Year	Total	W.T.E[1]
1988-89	1,388	1,085·70	1:266
1989-90	1,408	1,110·10	1:253
1990-91	1,398	1,107·88	1:243
1991-92	1,475	1,190·26	1:218

[1] W.T.E = Whole Time Equivalent.
[2] Nurse to patient ratios are calculated on the basis of one nurse (whole-time equivalent) to the number of patient days (excluding out-patients).

3. If an individual is arrested on more than one occasion, he/she will be added to the statistics on each occasion.
4. An individual convicted at different trials is added to the statistics on each occasion, and only once on each occasion whether or not he/she is convicted of more than one offence at each trial.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) what has been the average length of sentence imposed on persons convicted for security-related offences in Northern Ireland in each year since 1969;

(2) what has been the average length of sentence imposed by the courts since 1970 on a terrorist convicted of a Northern Ireland-related homicide in Northern Ireland;

Regulations

Mr. Sproat: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, pursuant to his answer of 4 March, Official Report, column 249, if he has now finished compiling and has checked for accuracy and consistency of definition the comprehensive provisional list of regulations for which his Department is responsible; and when he intends to place the list in the Library.

Mr. Atkins: Work is proceeding as quickly as possible on checking my Department's list of regulations affecting business. A consolidated list of regulations for all Departments will be compiled by the central deregulation unit of the Department of Trade and Industry and placed in the Library as soon as possible.

Electricity

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether the undertaking on rises in electricity prices given by the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Wiltshire, North (Mr. Needham) to the then hon. Member for Hartlepool on 16 October 1991 in evidence taken before the Energy Committee (HC No. 25 of 1991-92, page 5) remains the policy of Her Majesty's Government.

Mr. Atkins: Yes, the mechanism described by the then Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland was implemented and remains in place.

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will publish details of changes in the fuel cost element of electricity generating cost in Northern Ireland for each of the past three years for which records are available and the present year to date.

Mr. Atkins: The fuel costs incurred in the generation of electricity were:

	£ million

1991-92	96·7
[1]1992-93	99·7

[1] To 28 February.

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will sanction higher than inflation and fuel element-related increased charges by Northern Ireland Electricity to domestic and industrial consumers in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Atkins: This is a matter for the Director General of Electricity Supply in Northern Ireland.

EMPLOYMENT

Training

15. Mr. Milligan: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what progress there has been on the delivery of the youth training guarantee in Hampshire.

Mr. McLoughlin: Hampshire training and enterprise council and the careers service have been working extremely hard to ensure that the YT guarantee is met. I am pleased to say that there are now over 6,000 young people on YT and that the number waiting for places has reduced dramatically in recent months.

16. Mr. Waterson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what types of apprenticeship are being brought forward through the youth training scheme in the south-east of England.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Some 10,300 apprenticeships covering a wide range of skills were operating under youth training in the south-east in spring 1992.

17. Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if she will make a further statement on the implementation of training for work.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Annual contract negotiations with training and enterprise councils are well on their way to completion and training for work will start from the 29 March as a major part of the 1·5 million opportunities we are making available to help people back to work.

23. Mr. Patrick Thompson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what types of apprenticeship are coming forward through the youth training scheme.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Some 54,000 apprenticeships were operating under youth training in the spring of 1992, over 30,000 more than in 1984; and covering a wide range of occupations. One example is the county Durham training and enterprise council engineering initiative, offering training to craft and technician levels for over 100 young people.

Ms Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment (1) how many people were participating in

(a) employment training, (b) employment action, (c) the enterprise allowance scheme and (d) youth training in each region and in Great Britain as a whole in each month since September 1992; and if she will make a statement;

(2) if she will publish a table showing for each region and for Great Britain as a whole the destination of leavers from (a) youth training schemes and (b) ET, giving the most recent figures, and figures for each earlier period since the scheme began to operate, broken done in the same way as the answer of 15 February to the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn), Official Report, column 58.

Mr. McLoughlin: As the information is contained in a large number of tables, I will write to the hon. Member.

Long-term Unemployment

18. Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what measures the Government have introduced to help the long-term unemployed, aged over 45 years, to obtain work and training.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: All our employment and training services are open to people aged over 45 years, including the additional half million places available from April.

Wages Councils

19. Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what further representations she has received on the abolition of the wages councils; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I have continued to receive representations for and against abolition of the councils.

Enterprise Allowance

20. Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what has been the annual expenditure on enterprise allowance since its inception.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Annual expenditure on the enterprise allowance scheme (EAS) and its successor since 1991-92, the business start-up scheme (BSUS), is as follows:

	£ millions (GB)
1982-83	2·4
1983-84	23·2
1984-85	76·7
1985-86	103·9
1986-87	143·4
1987-88	195·9
1988-89	196·7
1989-90	170·9
1990-91	133·0
1991-92	105·2

Labour Statistics

21. Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what percentage of male unemployed people in Blaenau Gwent have been without work for between one and two years.

Mr. McLoughlin: In January 1993, on the unadjusted bases, 18 per cent. of male claimants in the Blaenau Gwent parliamentary constituency had been unemployed for between one and two years.

Mr. Bill Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what are the figures for jobs lost in the Sheffield area in the steel and engineering industry over the last 12 months.

Mr. McLoughlin: Figures at the level of industrial and geographical detail specified are only available from the census of employment—subject to confidentiality restrictions. The results of the 1991 census of employment will be available from 8 April. For the period specified, estimates are available only for broad industry groups by standard region.

Youth Unemployment

22. Mr. Austin-Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if she will outline the measures which she has taken to alleviate youth unemployment in Woolwich; and what assessment she has made of the results.

Mr. McLoughlin: Woolwich is covered by South Thames training and enterprise council. The TEC has recently increased its youth training opportunities by 75 per cent., from 2,000 to 3,500. This is sufficient to meet the demand for places locally.

Equal Opportunities

24. Dr. Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what steps she is taking to promote equal opportunities in employment irrespective of age; and if she will make a statement.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: We deplore age discrimination and take every opportunity to persuade employers to treat everyone on their merits. Employers who practise age discrimination miss out on the skill, experience and reliability which older people can offer.

Vacancies

25. Mr. Olner: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many vacancies are currently available at jobcentres in the west midlands.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: In January 1993, on the seasonally adjusted basis, there were 6,000 unfilled vacancies registered at jobcentres in the west midlands region.

These do not represent the total number of vacancies available in the area.

Job Clubs

26. Mr. Sykes: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what progress has been made in the development of special job clubs in the north-east.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: There are currently 15 specialist job clubs in the north-east, giving extra help to executives, people with language or literacy difficulties, ex-offenders and people with disabilities.

Cumbria Training and Enterprise Council

27. Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment when she next intends to visit Cumbria TEC to discuss its budget.

Mr. McLoughlin: My right hon. Friend has no plans to visit Cumbria TEC but she has recently met the chairman of the TEC. I, or other Employment Department Ministers, intend to visit all of the TECs in due course.

Disabled people

28. Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what plans she has for encouraging more employers to provide opportunities for people with disabilities.

Mr. McLoughlin: The Department will continue to encourage employers to provide opportunities for disabled people through a programme of education and persuasion backed by practical help. From 1 June 1993 employers using the disability symbol will be required to make five specific commitments central to good practice in the employment of people with disabilities. We will continue to develop and improve the schemes and services which help to meet the employment and training needs of people with disabilities.

Full-time Employment

29. Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment in how many standard planning regions in the United Kingdom full-time employment has increased since 1979 for (a) men and (b) women.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Male full-time estimates are not available for the period requested. Since 1979 total male civilian employment has increased in East Anglia and the south-west. The number of females in full-time civilian employment has increased in the south-east, East Anglia, the south-west, east midlands and Yorkshire and Humberside.

Industrial Accidents

Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many industrial accidents there were in ports covered by the national dock labour scheme in 1988.

Mr. McLoughlin: The information is not readily available in the form requested and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

The table shows the total number of occupational injuries within the docks and harbour industry in Great Britain during the 1988-89 financial year.

Injuries in all Docks and Harbours as Reported to the Health and Safety Executive's Factory and Agricultural Inspectorates 1988-89

Market Testing

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if she will make it her policy to ensure that no charges will be imposed upon local authorities for schemes currently granted under the training and information wings of the Health and Safety Commission, as a result of the introduction of the market-testing proposals.

Mr. McLoughlin: I have no such plans at present.

Foundry Industry

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what plans she has for increasing the number of training places in the foundry industry.

Mr. McLoughlin: Employers in all sectors of industry and commerce are responsible for training their employees.

Training and enterprise councils in England and Wales, and local enterprise companies in Scotland, plan for and provide youth training, and training places for unemployed adults, which meets their local labour market needs.

Regulations

Mr. Sproat: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment, pursuant to her answer of 9 February, Official Report, column 595, if she has now finished compiling and has checked for accuracy and consistency of definition the comprehensive provisional list of regulations for which her Department is responsible; and when she intends to place the list in the Library.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I placed a list of all legislation for which the Department, including the Health and Safety Executive, is responsible in the Library on 15 March.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Cycles

Mr. Simpson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what was the value of bicycle parts imported into the European Community and the equivalent or actual number of completed cycles imported, together with the comparable Community and United Kingdom production and the number of completed cycle equivalents sold in the United Kingdom, in each year since 1988.

Mr. Needham: The information requested is in the table.

EC(12) Imports of cycles and cycle parts from non-EC countries 1988-91 £ million thousands

	1988	1989	1990	1991
Cycles	2,129	3,049	5,144	6,805

Note:

Cycles are defined in terms of division 8712 of the harmonised system—bicycles and other cycles (including delivery tricycles) not motorised.

Value figures converted from ECUs to sterling using annual average exchange rate.

Estimates of production, in terms of value, for the UK cycle industry are published in "Business Monitor" PA1002, a copy of which is available in the Library., Official figures of EC wide production are not available.

Official figures of cycle sales in the United Kingdom are not collected.

Proyecto Venezuela

Mr. Jacques Arnold: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will assess the results of Proyecto Venezuela, the Venezualan-British business development initiative.

Mr. Needham: The main objectives of Proyecto Venezuela were to bring the opportunities in Venezuela to the attention of British industry and to raise the profile of United Kingdom companies in Venezuela. A research and publicity campaign and an intensive ministerial visiting programme helped achieve these objectives. Over 500 companies requested information on Venezuela, 185 companies and 500 company representatives attended seminars on Venezuela and in 1992 five missions comprising 118 companies visited the market. There was also a successful energy and environment seminar in Caracas held in conjunction with PDVSA, the Venezuelan State Oil Company.

In 1992, our direct export to Venezuela increased by 13 per cent. over 1991 and the United Kingdom continues to be one of the largest foreign direct investors in Venezuela. Several British companies have opened offices in Caracas. On the project side, there have been successes in the water sector. Companies are well placed to win contracts in other areas, including in the important oil and gas sector.

Proyecto Venezuela has always been considered a long-term project and the promotional programme, including inward and outward missions, continues. Proyecto Venezuela is also taking on an educational and cultural dimension with notable successes in the industrial training field. The British Council co-operated with the DTI in the production of a comprehensive training brochure and over 200 students from PDVSA and its affiliates have undertaken courses run by British training and higher education establishments.

Poland

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what proposals he has to change Government policy on providing credits to assist the expansion of the Polish economy and trade with the United Kingdom.

Mr. Needham: A review of the possibility of reintroducing ECGD cover is being undertaken. I expect the review to be completed within a few weeks but I cannot prejudge its outcome.

Gas-powered Electricity Generation

Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what percentage of Britain's electricity was derived from gas in each year since 1987; and what is the expected percentage contribution in each year to 1996.

Mr. Eggar: The percentages of United Kingdom electricity generated from gas in each year since 1987 are as follows:

	Per cent.
1987	0·9
1988	1·0
1989	1·0
1990	1·2
1992	2·7

Caminus Energy Ltd., in its report "Markets for Coal (HMSO ISBN 0 11 514987 2) produced for the Government's coal review, analysed the future fuel mix in electricity generation under two sets of assumptions. The conclusions of its analysis, including the forecast contribution of gas-fired power stations, is set out in tables 14 and 15 of the report.

Amateur Radio Stations

Mr. Redmond: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many amateur radio station inspections his officers have carried out in the last 12 months; and what the results were.

Mr. Leigh: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Radiocommunications Agency under its chief executive, John Michell. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from B. A. Maxwell to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 12 March 1993:

You recently tabled a question concerning amateur radio station inspections. As you know, the Chief Executive of the Agency has been asked to write to you with the information requested as this is an operational matter for which this Agency is responsible. I am replying in the absence of the Chief Executive. The question and the information are as follows.

Question 109 tabled on 10 March 1993: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, how many amateur radio station inspections his officers have carried out in the last 12 months; and what the results were.

In the present financial year to the end of February, 126 inspections of amateur radio stations were carried out. 26 oral and 4 written warnings were given. 2 amateurs were prosecuted and 1 licence revoked.

I hope this is helpful.

Astra Holdings

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when the report into Astra Holdings is to be completed; and if he will place a copy of it in the Library when it is ready.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: I cannot say, but the inspection is well advanced. When the report is received, consideration can be given to publication. It is the general policy to publish reports on public companies, and on publication copies of reports are placed in the Library.

One-stop Shops

Mr. James Hill: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many bids have been received from chambers of commerce, training and enterprise councils and local authorities to set up one-stop shops for small and medium-sized business.

Mr. Leigh: Fifty-seven bids were received.

Manufactured Imports

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what percentage of the British market for manufactures is filled by imports.

Mr. Needham: The latest published information on the topic can be found in "Business Monitor" MQ12, which is available in the Library of the House.

Cosmetics (Safety)

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make representations to the European Community to secure the establishment of an independent committee of experts to review what is required to ensure the safety of cosmetics.

Mr. Leigh: I see no need to duplicate the work of the European Commission's Scientific Committee on Cosmetology set up by Commission decision 77/45/EEC on 19 December 1977 and comprising independent experts who are responsible for considering questions concerning the safety evaluation of cosmetic ingredients.

Public Bodies

Dr. Wright: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many appointments to the public bodies listed in "Public Bodies" for his Department were made from names supplied by the public appointment unit; and if he will list them.

Mr. Eggar: My right hon. Friend is responsible for a total of over 800 public appointments. The public appointments unit (PAU) provides names of suitably qualified candidates for a wide range of DTI public appointments. Since 1 April 1992 15 appointments to nine separate public bodies have been made from names supplied by the PAU. In addition, the PAU has provided information on potential candidates for public appointments identified within the Department.

EC Research and Development

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what contribution his Department plans to make to the conference on EC research and development organised by the European Commission to be held in Coventry on 2 April.

Mr. Leigh: My Department has not been asked to contribute to the one-day conference on EC research and development organised by Coventry university on 2 April. However, an official will be attending the conference.

The Office of Science and Technology, which is responsible for co-ordinating all United Kingdom policy on EC R and D, will be providing a speaker.

"North America Now"

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if his recently launched "North America Now" trade and export campaign involves business in the nuclear sector.

Mr. Needham: The nuclear industry, which principally takes in the energy sector, is not a priority sector for the first year of the "North America Now" campaign. DTI's role in the promotion of nuclear power generation technology with regard to the north American market is responsive rather than proactive. However, there are two "supply side" enabling technologies that are relevant to the nuclear industry—process control instrumentation and environmental monitoring and remediation technology —which are priority sectors for the first year of the campaign and will be promoted to appropriate north American "end-users". Where such opportunities are identified in the US nuclear power generation sector, DTI will assist United Kingdom industry in tackling those opportunities.

Other applications of nuclear technology where they correspond to priority sectors, such as the health care sector, will be actively promoted to the north American markets during the course of the campaign.

Hong Kong

Mr. Cousins: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many trade delegations visited Hong Kong supported by the British Government in each of the last three years; and how many inward investment missions from Hong Kong have been supported over a similar period.

Mr. Needham: Support under my Department's outward mission scheme was provided for 10 trade missions to Hong Kong during 1990-91. Nine missions were supported during 1991-92 and 13 during 1992-93.

The Invest in Britain Bureau hosted its first inward investment mission to the United Kingdom from Hong Kong in June 1992. A second mission will visit the United Kingdom this month.

Export Credits

Mr. Cousins: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what were the average premium rates charged by national credit agencies in the United Kingdom, France, Germany, Italy, the United States of America and Japan for capital exports in non-OECD markets and the standard national bank interest rates.

Mr. Needham: The Export Credits Guarantee Department has only limited details of the rates that other export credit agencies charge for capital exports in non-OECD markets. Such information that it does have has been provided by the various agencies in strict confidence.

Rates vary widely from market to market and for different types and durations of risk. Comparison of averages is therefore rather difficult but in general ECGD rates are higher than average for the higher risk markets, lower than average for lower risk and, in aggregate, are rather higher than the overall average.

Interest rates charged by banks vary between customers and over time. In the specific case of fixed rate export fiannce minimum rates are determined by the OECD consensus. The current rates for the countries concerned are:

	Contract rate Per cent.	Pre-contract rate Per cent.
United Kingdom	8·10	8·30
France	9·20	9·40
Germany	7·87	8·07
Italy	12·75	12·95
United States of America
2-5 years credit	5·93	6·13
over 5-8·5 years credit	6·83	7·03
over 8·5 years credit	7·26	7·46
Japan	5·00	5·20

European Coal and Steel Community

Mr. Morgan: To ask the President of the Board of Trade at which (a) geographical areas and (b) sectors of job creation the reserves of the European Coal and Steel Community will be targeted when the ECSC is wound up.

Mr. Sainsbury: The ECSC treaty expires in 2002. Discussions are already underway with our EC partners and the Commission on the future of the ECSC financing activities. The Council has called on the Commission to bring forward proposals for using the reserves in the way most suitable for the industries concerned.

Aerospace Industry

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what steps he is taking to ensure that long-term finance is available to the British aerospace industry to ensure high-level research and development.

Mr. Sainsbury: My Department is committed to continuing the successful partnership between Government and the British aerospace industry. It recognises the importance of supporting long-term research in the industry while working towards a progressive reduction in state aids.

Since 1979, the Department of Trade and Industry has made over £1·5 billion available in repayable launch aid, regional development grants and in support for the civil aircraft research and demonstration programme.

KONVER Programme

Mr. Hutton: To ask the President of the Board of Trade (1) what assessment has been made by Her Majesty's Government of the benefits to the United Kingdom of the European Commission's KONVER programme;

(2) if he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's policy towards the KONVER initiative proposed by the European Commission.

Mr. Sainsbury: The Government are awaiting the European Commission's proposal for implementing the KONVER Community initiative.

Hazardous Chemicals (Transport)

Ms Walley: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what quantities of hazardous chemicals were transported by (a) road, (b) rail and (c) into or out of United Kingdom ports in each of the last five years.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: I have been ask to reply.

Only limited information is available.

The quantity of chemicals, including those classed as dangerous, moved by road in vehicles over 3·5 tonnes in each of the last five years for which figures are available was:

	Million tonnes
1987	49
1988	52
1989	55
1990	53
1991	45

There were 1·4 million tonnes of dangerous chemicals moved by rail in wagons in 1989-90, 1·5 million tonnes in 1990-91, and 1·2 million tonnes in 1991-92. In addition, British Rail has moved annually some 14,000 tank containers of differing sizes.

Special surveys of movements of hazardous substances through United Kingdom ports recorded 3·1 and 3·5 million tonnes of packaged dangerous goods—which would include some dangerous chemicals in 1988 and 1989 respectively, and 7·8 and 8·1 million tonnes of bulk dangerous chemicals in 1989 and 1990 respectively.

Post Office

Mr. Rowe: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what financial and efficiency targets he has set for the Post Office in 1993.

Mr. Leigh: The President of the Board of Trade, in agreement with the Treasury and in consultation with the Post Office, has set Royal Mail and Post Office Counters Ltd. targets to achieve respectively an annual average return of 16 per cent. and 9·3 per cent. on capital employed over the three years 1992-93 to 1994-95. The profit used when calculating the return will be struck after interest —excluding interest on past surpluses—but before tax. The capital employed on which returns will be calculated will be the greater of either opening fixed assets or the previous year's closing capital employed.

The President of the Board of Trade, in agreement with the Treasury and in consultation with the Post Office, has set the following real unit cost targets for Royal Mail and Post Office Counters Ltd.:

Cumulative reduction by 1994-95 over 1991-92
Royal Mail—4 per cent.
Post Office Counters Ltd.—3 per cent.

As Parcelforce operates in a competitive market, the President of the Board of Trade has agreed with the Post Office that an efficiency target need not be set. The President of the Board of Trade announced on 15 July 1992 that Parcelforce is to be sold. Parcelforce has been set the financial target of achieving at least break even in each of the years 1992-93 and 1993-94, but has not been set a financial target in respect of 1994-95.

Ms Estelle Morris: To ask the President of the Board of Trade (1) if he will make it his policy, in the event of privatisation of Parcelforce, to impose an obligation on those who assume responsibility for the employment of Parcelforce staff to ensure that the pension rights and expectations of these staff are equal to those they enjoy as members of the Post Office superannuation scheme the Post Office pension scheme;

(2) what will be the basis in which he proposes to apportion the surpluses in the Post Office superannuation scheme and the Post Office pension scheme in the event of the privatisation of Parcelforce;

(3) what external advice his Department has sought on the legal implications of unilaterally changing the pension rights and entitlements on Parcelforce staff in the event of privatisation;

(4) what action he proposes to take to ensure that the long-term pension expectations of Post Office staff in Parcelforce are in no way diminished as a result of any privatisation.

Mr. Leigh [holding answer 15 March 1993]: We are considering the form and timing of the sale of Parcelforce, including such issues as pensions. Our decisions will be announced in due course.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what assessment his Department has made of the impact that adoption of any of the three new forms for new pensioners that the Department of Social Security currently has under trial, would have on the viability of the current network of post offices and sub-post offices.

Mr. Leigh [holding answer 12 March 1993]: The purpose of the trial is to enable an assessment to be made of the impact of different types of form. Any impact on post offices will be considered once the trial has been completed.

Free Flight Offers

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, pursuant to his answer of 17 February to the hon. Members for Cunninghame, South (Mr. Donohoe) and for Coventry South-East (Mr. Cunningham) Official Report, column 261, what evidence he now has on whether certain free flight offers accompanying the sale of goods or services are other than bona fide sales promotions.

Mr. Leigh: I have received no evidence which would cause me to change my answer of 17 February.

Regional Aid

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will set out by travel-to-work area the total amount of money received since 1984 in (a) United Kingdom regional assistance and (b) European regional development funds.

Mr. Sainsbury: Since little data on UK regional assistance, and none of the European regional development fund, are recorded by travel-to-work areas, the information requested could not be provided other than at disproportionate cost.

Ms Harman: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how much of the European Community's regional development fund earmarked in the present accounting period for use within the United Kingdom has yet to be disbursed; and how much of the undisbursed allocation he expects to be drawn down during the remainder of the present accounting period.

Mr. Sainsbury [holding answer 15 March 1993]: Of the United Kingdom's share of the fund for the period of the present regulations, 1989-1993, £1,521 million has been allocated and the remainder will have been allocated by the end of the year.

Deregulation Task Forces

Mr. Sproat: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list the chairmen of the task forces appointed to look into aspects of possible deregulation; which areas each chairman will cover; what will be the method of operation of each task force; who will serve on each task force, additional to the chairman; by what date he has ordered each task force to report their findings; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: We have set up seven task forces to undertake a comprehensive review of regulations affecting business and to advise Ministers on priorities for repeal and simplification. The task forces will work for the next six months, making regular reports to Ministers. The names of the task force chairmen and the areas they will cover are as follows:

Michael Heron—Food, drink and agriculture
Duncan Bluck CBE—Communications and transport
Christopher Spackman—Construction
Malcolm Bates—Engineering industries
John Robb—Chemicals and pharmaceuticals
Sir Sydney Lipworth—Financial services
Nigel Whittaker—Retail and Tourism

The Chairmen will meet Lord Sainsbury, the DTI's special adviser on deregulation, later this week to agree the method of operation of the task forces. The names of the other members of the task forces will be announced shortly.

Debt Payments

Mr. Cousins: To ask the President of the Board of Trade further to his answer to the hon. Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Fatchett) of 18 November, Official Report, column 225, if he has concluded his consultations on proposals to require large companies to state in their reports and accounts how quickly they pay; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: [holding answer 9 February 1993]: My Department issued on 25 January a consultative document on the options for taking forward our commitment that in future large companies will be required to state in their report and accounts how quickly they pay. We are asking for comments by 26 March. A copy of the document has been placed in the Library.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Milk Marketing Board

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the size of the site and the offices of the headquarters of the Milk Marketing Board at Thames Ditton; and what estimate has been made of their value.

Mr. Curry: The Milk Marketing Board has informed us that the size of its Thames Ditton headquarters site is about 22 acres. The gross area of buildings on site is about 254,000 sq ft. The value of the site would depend on a number of factors, such as the state of the market and the intended use for it.

Under the Agriculture Bill, the Milk Marketing Board would be able to apply to Ministers for approval of formal proposals for the transfer and distribution of its assets including its Thames Ditton headquarters. In deciding whether to grant approval, Ministers would have to have regard to all the circumstances and in particular to whether the proposals made reasonable provision for the distribution of assets to registered producers.

Veal

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what plans he has to impose restrictions on the import of white veal into the United Kingdom;

(2) if he will make it his policy to set a target date for banning the export from the United Kingdom of calves destined for veal crates.

Mr. Soames: I have no such plans as my legal advice is that these actions would be illegal under the treaty of Rome.

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many calves have been exported from the United Kingdom for rearing in veal calf crates in each year since 1985.

Mr. Soames: Totals of the number of calves exported from Great Britain to other EC countries for further fattening are given. It is not possible to determine what proportion of the totals were for rearing in veal calf crates.

Year	£ thousands
1985	142·4
1986	190·7
1987	365·2
1988	234·7

1991	399·6
1992	420·6

Laying Hens

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has (a) to increase the mandatory space allowance for battery cages containing laying hens and (b) to establish a target date for phasing out the use of battery cages in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Soames: It is already the Government's policy to seek revised Community rules to phase out the current design of battery cages and to increase the minimum space allowances set by the existing Community legislation. We look to the Commission to publish proposals for new welfare rules for laying hens as soon as possible.

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has to implement the recommendations of the Farm Animal Welfare Council concerning the welfare of laying hens in colony systems.

Mr. Soames: The Government intend to publish a response to the Farm Animal Welfare Council's report in the near future.

Wildlife Diseases

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make it his policy to develop a United Kingdom-wide database of wildlife diseases.

Mr. Soames: The Ministry has no plans to establish such a database.

Pigs

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what plans he has to establish a target date for banning the use of stall and tether systems by United Kingdom pig breeders;

(2) what plans he has to introduce legislation establishing minimum space allocations and minimum standards for bedding and foraging material for reared pigs in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Soames: The Welfare of Pigs Regulations 1991 already ban the installation of new stall and tether systems in this country and require all such systems to be phased out by the end of 1998. The Community directive adopted in 1991 which sets minimum standards for the welfare of pigs addresses the need for bedding and foraging material. This directive must be implemented in the United Kingdom by the beginning of 1994. However, the Welfare of Livestock Regulations 1990 already require pigs and certain other livestock to have a lying area which is well drained or well maintained with dry bedding.

Departmental Spending

Dr. Wright: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what share of total departmental spending was accounted for by non-departmental public bodies in each year since 1979.

Mr. Curry: Information relating to expenditure on non-departmental public bodies is contained in the annual publication "Public Bodies", which has been published each year since 1982. I regret that information prior to that date is not readily available.

Figures for departmental expenditure for the years to 1990 are contained in the public expenditure White Paper for each year and are summarised in the cash plan table given at the beginning of chapter 3 of each White Paper. Figures for 1991 onwards are contained in the Ministry's departmental reports and may be found in the cash plan at annex 1 to each report.

Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the number of confirmed cases of BSE, by county, for the month of February.

Mr. Soames: The information requested is available in the Library of the House.

Deregulation Initiative

Dr. Strang: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the organisations which have been or will be consulted about his deregulation initiative; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: The organisations consulted by my Department about the deregulation initiative number many hundreds. On food measures alone, 240 organisations have been consulted.

Dr. Strang: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food which licences of regulations from the list which he placed in the Library as referred to in his answer to the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) on 17 February 1992, Official Report, column 26, he is still considering as part of his deregulation initiative; what new licences and regulations he is considering as part of this initiative; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: The list of regulatory measures placed in the Library of the House on 17 February 1992 is shortly to be superseded by a more detailed list of regulations which affect industry. This is referred to as the baseline list. Under the Prime Minister's initiative on deregulation, all Whitehall Departments will include their baseline lists in a composite document to be laid in the House Library. Deregulation plans are being drawn up within my Department on the basis of the baseline list and informed by comments being received on the original list of measures placed in the Library of the House. A plan for deregulating food law was sent to interested organisations for comment earlier this month and has been in the Library of the House. All measures on the baseline list are open to review under the deregulation initiative. I have introduced five deregulatory principles:

regulation last: the regulatory approach will be followed only where fully justified and where some less burdensome route—e.g., through codes of conduct—is seen to be inadequate; need criteria: all national and EC regulations will be examined against strict need criteria and, in the case of legislation arising out of EC obligations, the principle of subsidiarity, as agreed at the Edinburgh European summit;

cost: the EC Commission will be asked to produce compliance cost assessments with all new proposals for EC legislation; and Government Departments will produce such assessments for all proposed national legislation which does not arise directly out of Community law; competition: in implementing Community law, the Government will seek to ensure that United Kingdom industry is not placed at a disadvantage compared with its competitors in other member states; consultation: business representatives will be fully consulted at the earliest possible stage on the effect of proposed new regulations on their own sectors.

Proposals for new licences and regulations will be scrutinised against these principles and will be subject to widespread consultation with the business and other interests concerned.

Mr. Sproat: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to his answer of 5 February, Official Report, column 375, if he has now finished compiling and has checked for accuracy and consistency of definition the comprehensive provisional list of regulations for which his Department is responsible; and when he intends to place the list in the Library.

Mr. Curry: Work is proceeding as quickly as possible on checking my Department's list of regulations affecting business. A consolidated list of regulations for all Departments will be compiled by the central deregulation unit of the DTI and placed in the Library as soon as possible.

Farmers (Regulations and Licences)

Dr. Strang: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food which licences or regulations relating to farmers have subsequently been (a) withdrawn or (b) amended after he placed in the Library the list mentioned in his answer of 17 February 1992 to the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark), Official Report, column 26; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: Comments from industry on the list of regulatory measures placed in the Library of the House on 17 February 1992 are still being received by my department. A particular effort is being made to obtain the views of small businesses. On the basis of this wide consultation, deregulation plans are being drawn up for the department's main policy areas with a view to reducing the level of regulatory burden placed on industry.

Fishermen

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list all major changes to the law affecting fishermen since 1963.

Mr. Curry: The following is a list of Acts of Parliament affecting fishermen since 1963:

Sea Fisheries Regulation Act 1966
Sea Fisheries (Shellfish) Act 1967
Sea Fish (Conservation) Act 1967
Conservation of Seals Act 1970
Salmon and Freshwater Fisheries Act 1975
Fishery Limits Act 1976
Fisheries Act 1981
British Fishing Boats Act 1983
Diseases of Fish Act 1983
Salmon Act 1986
Sea Fish (Conservation) Act 1992

Potatoes

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement about the future of research and development in potatoes when the new potato regime is introduced.

Mr. Curry: The EC proposals for a regime in potatoes would have no direct effect on research and development. However, it is unlikely that the Potato Marketing Board would be able to continue in its present form. That is why the Agriculture Bill, presently before the House, allows for the transfer of the board's assets including the research station at Sutton Bridge to a successor body or bodies in order to continue the industry's involvement in R and D.

Animal Health and Veterinary Group

Dr. Spink: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has for the future organisation of his Ministry's animal health and veterinary group.

Mr. Gummer: I have decided to proceed with a management review of the animal health and veterinary group, including the state veterinary service. The review will examine in detail the group's functions and organisation with a view to improving the use of the Ministry's resources in this area. It will be headed by a grade 5 official from my Ministry who has been asked to report by the end of this year.

Chinchilla

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what legal provisions apply to (a) the keeping of and (b) the commercial breeding and farming of chinchilla; and what steps his Department takes to ensure inspection and enforcement;

(2) what guidelines or standards are laid down on the keeping of chinchilla with particular reference to minimum cage size.

Mr. Soames: There is no legislation relating specifically to the keeping of chinchilla. Any chinchilla kept on agricultural land for farming purposes, including fur production, would be subject to the general animal welfare provisions of the Agriculture (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1968 and inspection by the state veterinary service. I am not, however, aware that any chinchilla are currently kept in the United Kingdom for such purposes.

The keeping of chinchilla for other purposes, like that of all domestic and captive animals, is covered by the Protection of Animals Act 1911 which is the responsibility of my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department. The Act makes it an offence to cause unnecessary suffering to any captive or domestic animal. In addition, pet shops are licensed by local authorities, which have the right of inspection under the Pet Animals Act 1951.

Salmon

Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many salmon were caught in England, Scotland and Wales during the season 1991 and the season 1992, by (a) rod and line, (b) commercial nets and (c) north-east coast drift net fishery.

Mr. Curry [pursuant to the reply, 27 January 1993, column 719]: I regret that the catch statistics were prepared on different bases: those for England and Wales included grilse, but those for Scotland excluded grilse. The table provides reported catches of salmon and grilse for each country.

Reported catches of salmon and grilse in England, Scotland and Wales in 1991 by method of capture

	England	Scotland	Wales
Rod and line	9,452	62,450	4,522
Commercial nets[1]	34,631	76,351	3,044
(of which NE coast drift nets)	(22,463)
Total	44,083	138,801	7,566

[1]Includes reported catches of salmon by all methods other than by rod and line.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Fraud

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security on how many occasions social security fraud was detected in (a) England, (b) Yorkshire and Humberside and (c) West Yorkshire in the last year for which figures are available; and how many prosecutions were undertaken in these areas.

Mr. Burt: The administration of fraud detection is a matter for Mr. Michael Bichard, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member with such information as is available and a copy will be placed in the Library.

Letter from Michael Bichard to Mr. David Hinchliffe, dated 15 March 1993:

As Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency, it is my responsibility to answer questions about relevant operational matters. I am therefore replying to your recent Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Social Security asking on how many occasions social security fraud was detected in (a) England, (b) Yorkshire and Humberside and (c) West Yorkshire in the last year for which figures are available; and how many prosecutions were undertaken in these areas.

The last full year for which figures are available is the year ending 31 March 1992. During the year ending 31 March 1992 a total of 196,061 social security investigations into fraud were undertaken in England by officers of the Benefits Agency. Included in this figure are 23,179 cases in the Yorkshire and Humberside area. I regret that I am unable to provide figures for the West Yorkshire area as we do not have a distinct operational area there.

In the same year there were a total of 3,644 prosecutions undertaken in England and Wales. I am unable to provide separate figures for England alone or the West Yorkshire and Humberside area. All prosecution statistics for the year in question were compiled by our solicitors branch who do not operate within these distinct geographical areas.

It may be useful for you to know that from the year starting April 1992 we have compiled prosecution statistics for each of our operational areas. This will enable us to provide information for smaller geographical areas.

I hope that you find this reply helpful. A copy will appear in the Official Report and a copy will also be placed in the Library.

Target Times

Lady Olga Maitland: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is (a) the target time and (b) the proportion of cases in which the target time was achieved over the past three months, for (i) attendance allowance claims and (ii) disability living allowance claims for those over 60 years of age.

Mr. Scott: The administration of disability living allowance is a matter for Mr. Michael Bichard, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to my hon. Friend and a copy will be placed in the Library.

Letter from Michael Bichard to Lady Olga Maitland, dated 15 March 1993:

As Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency, it is my responsibility to answer questions about relevant operational matters. I am therefore replying to the points raised in your recent Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Social security about (a) the target time and (b) the proportion of cases in which the target time was achieved over the past three months, for (i) Attendance Allowance (AA) claims and (ii) Disability Living Allowance (DLA) for those over 60 years of age.

You asked for the target time for clearing claims from DLA customers who are over 60 years of age. I should explain, however, that clearance times broken down to particular age bands of DLA customers is not routinely gathered.

The primary target set for the clearance of DLA claims is 60 per cent. of claims to be cleared in 30 days. The performance figures for the last three months are shown in the table below:

	Per Cent. in 30 days
December 1992	55
January 1993	49
February 1993	61

It will perhaps be helpful if I explain a little about the changes which took place with the onset of the new adjudication structure. With the introduction of DLA from 6 April 1992, all outstanding AA claims, reviews and appeals in respect of people under 65 were transferred to DLA for processing under the new adjudication system introduced at the same time. This was because any award of AA spanning 6 April for people under 65 would automatically become the Care Component of DLA at that time.

The primary target set for the clearance of AA claims is 60 per cent. of claims to be cleared in 35 days. The performance figures for AA for the last three months are shown in the table below:

	Per Cent. in 35 days
December 1992	54
January 1993	44
February 1993	52

As you may know the success of the advertising campaign and the policy initiatives surrounding the launch of the benefits attracted a much larger number of applications in the early stages than was expected. Backlogs of work arose as a result and this has undoubtedly affected our ability to meet the clearance targets. However I am pleased to say that the firm actions which have been taken to reduce the backlogs are now resulting in significant improvements in clearance times. At the end of February the total amount of outstanding claims to DLA stood at around 50,000 and about 45,000 for AA compared with the over 124,000 DLA claims and 153,000 claims outstanding at the end of June 1992.

Finally, I hope you find this reply helpful. A copy of this letter will appear in the Official Report and a copy will also be placed in the Library.

Disability Payments

Mrs. Jane Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his latest estimate of the number of disability living allowance claims being completed per adjudication officer per day.

Mr. Scott: The administration of disability living allowance is a matter for Mr Michael Bichard, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member and a copy will be placed in the Library.

Letter from Michael Bichard to Ms Jane Kennedy, dated 15 March 1993:

As Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency, it is my responsibility to answer questions about relevant operational matters. I am therefore replying to your recent Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Social Security asking for the latest number of Disability Living Allowance claims being completed per adjudication officer per day.

As at 26/2/93 adjudication officers dealing with new claims to Disability Living Allowance were clearing on average 15 cases per day.

It has to be borne in mind that because some cases are more complex than others this figure may vary week by week.

I hope you will find this reply helpful. A copy of this reply will appear in the Official Report and a copy will also be placed in the Library.

Homelessness

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what assessment his Department has made of the comparative living costs of homeless families placed in permanent accommodation with self-contained cooking facilities and homeless families who are placed in temporary accommodation and who are reliant on the purchase of take-away food.

Mr. Burt: None. Such an assessment would be difficult with neither a practicable definition of self-contained cooking facilities nor an accurate assessment of the number of people with access to other cooking facilities and the use they make of them.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what research his Department has undertaken into the impact of introducing VAT on take-away food on the weekly household budgets of homeless families living in temporary accommodation who are without access to self-contained cooking facilities.

Mr. Burt: None. Such research would not take account of families with access to facilities that were not self-contained. It would also require a practicable definition of the term "self-contained cooking facilities".

Abandoned Children (Mothers)

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what action he is taking to ensure that fathers cite the name of mothers who abandon their child, so that they can be made to pay maintenance towards the upkeep of their child; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Burt: The provisions of the Child Support Act 1991 apply equally whether it is the mother or the father who is the parent with care of the children. Therefore, where a father who is the parent with care of the child is in receipt of income support, family credit or disability working allowance, he will be required to co-operate with the Child Support Agency in obtaining maintenance from the mother, unless this would cause harm or undue distress to the parent with care or to any children living with him.

Pensioners (Consumer Goods)

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what information he has on the acquisition and ownership of consumer goods by pensioners for (a) 1979 and (b) the most recent year for which information is available, in respect of personal computers, typewriters, and word processors.

Miss Widdecombe: It is estimated that in 1991, the latest year for which information is available, 1·3 per cent. of retired households[1] had a home computer[2]. This information is not available for 1979. No information on ownership of typewriters is available.

Notes:

[1]retired households consist of single retired adults or households with one man and one woman where the head of household is retired.

[2]the term "home computer" covers personal computers and word processors.

Free School Meals

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will bring forward proposals to amend the Social Security Act 1986 to restore to local authorities the discretion to make available free school meals to children whose parents are not on income support.

Mr. Burt: There are no plans to extend the availability of free school meals. Families who cannot claim income support because a parent is working 16 hours or more a week can claim family credit. In setting the child rates used in calculating family credit entitlement, allowance is made for the non-availability of free school meals.

Independent Tribunal Service

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many cases the Independent Tribunal Service has cleared in 1990-91, 1991-92 and 1992-93.

Mr. Scott: The percentage share of total departmental spending accounted for by non-departmental bodies attached to the Department of Social Security is as follows:

Year	Per Cent
1992-93	1·78
1993-94	2·31

However, the details for earlier years are not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Hall: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what percentage of the population of the Warrington South constituency were (a) male lone parents or (b) female lone parents, at the latest available date.

Child Support Agency

Mr. Hall: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the estimated turnover rate of maintenance cases by the Child Support Agency in Warrington South.

Mr. Burt: In 1992-93 the child support unit in Warrington, South handled just under 1,300 maintenance cases. Estimates for 1993-94 are not available.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what plans he has to reduce delays in cases being heard by social security appeals tribunals in (a) Inverclyde, (b) Strathclyde and (c) Scotland as a whole; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what plans he has to reduce delays in cases being heard by medical appeals tribunals in (a) Strathclyde and (b) Scotland as a whole; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: Responsibility for the administration and organisation of social security and medical appeal tribunals lies with the president of the Independent Tribunal Service, His Honour Judge Thorpe, and the hon. Member may wish to write to his office direct.

Unemployment Benefit

Mr. Canavan: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what changes he will make to end the rule whereby workers over the age of 55 years who receive an occupational pension of £35 or more per week suffer a reduction in unemployment benefit;

(2) how many people over the age of 55 years suffer a reduction in unemployment benefit because they receive an occupational pension of more than £35 gross per week.

Mr. Burt: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Halifax (Mrs. Mahon) on 10 March at col. 625-26.

Regulations

Mr. Sproat: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer of 8 February, Official Report, columns 499-500, if he has now finished compiling and has checked for accuracy and consistency of definition the comprehensive provisional list of regulations which have an impact on business for which his Department is responsible; and when he intends to place the list in the Library.

Miss Widdecombe: A list of the Department's regulations affecting business has been checked and a consolidated list of such regulations for all Departments will be compiled by the central deregulation unit of the DTI and placed in the Library shortly.

Housing Benefit

Mr. Nigel Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer of 11 February, Official Report, columns 710-17, how many housing benefit claimants, were (a) local authority tenants, (b) housing association tenants and (c) other private tenants, for England, Wales, Scotland and Great Britain as a whole for the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. Scott: The information requested is in the Library.

Care Homes

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his estimate of the number of claimants with preserved rights to income support who will be in receipt of benefit towards the cost of their care in residential or nursing homes on 1 April.

Mr. Burt: The number is estimated to be 295,000. There are also residents currently self-supporting who will have preserved rights to the income support higher limits.

Allowable Fees

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will extend the £10 increase in allowable fees, for people in nursing homes, due in April, to sufferers from Alzheimer's disease and those judged to be suffering from terminal illness.

Mr. Burt: No. The terminal illness limit is not necessarily paid only to those who are terminally ill within the accepted definition of that term. Resources are better directed to the other limits.

From April 1993, under the community care scheme, all new residents of nursing homes who need public support will have their needs assessed by the local authority, which will contract with individual homes for their fees.

Mr. Lang: Amendments have been made to my Department's list of regulations affecting business and submitted to the Department of Trade and Industry. Community Transport Association

Sir David Steel: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will consider providing funding for the Community Transport Association's advice and information service to Scotland, to allow it to advertise its existence throughout Scotland.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 4 March 1993]: The Community Transport Association applied for funding from the Scottish Office Industry Department in January 1992 to extend their advice and information service to Scotland. The application was carefully considered but was not approved. While consideration was given to the possible scope for paying a grant, there are no grant schemes at present which would have been suitable for the purpose. While I am sympathetic to the association's wish to expand in Scotland, it cannot be a priority at the present time to provide new funds for new schemes of grant.

Any future application which the association may make to the Scottish Office under transport or social work legislation would be considered on its merits and would depend on the strength of the case and the level of funding sought. I hope that the Association will continue to monitor the level of inquiries for advice and information which it receives from Scotland against the possibility of any future application being made.

European Regional Development Fund

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what consultations he has had with Scottish local authorities and other eligible infrastructure-providing bodies concerning the levels of (a) base and (b) supplementary credit approvals with a view to the provision of matching Government funding to maximise successful applications for European regional development fund assistance.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 2 March 1993]: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland has discussed on three occasions with the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities the new arrangements for the treatment of grants from the European regional development fund. These come into effect on 1 April 1993 and fulfil the agreement reached with the European Commission for making it clear that ERDF grants confer additional spending power on Scottish local authorities. In common with all other bodies eligible to receive ERDF assistance. local authorities will continue to meet their contribution to approved expenditure from their own resources. In addition to the basic and supplementary allocations which the Secretary of State provides, authorities can enhance their spending by the use of capital receipts and by revenue and private sector contributions.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what has been the total amount of money received for (a) Strathclyde and (b) Scotland from the European regional development fund in each year since1986-87; and what are the expected amounts for each year until 1995-96.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 15 March 1993]: The European Commission allocates moneys on a calendar year basis. The Commission has not yet announced what funds will be made available for Scotland beyond 1993. It is not therefore possible to provide estimates for 1994-95 and beyond. the table sets out the information available on awards to Scotland and, of those, on awards to Strathclyde since 1986.

1991	124·5
1992	86.5
1993	111.5

Note:

The authentic figures for allocations are expressed in Ecu. The totals expressed here in sterling are for illustrative purposes only. The final sterling sums available to the programmes will depend on the exchange rates at the time payments are received.

Ambulance Crews

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will take steps to ensure that all offers of voluntary overtime by ambulance crews aimed at filling gaps that would otherwise occur in scheduled duties are not constrained by budget considerations.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 15 March 1993]: The scheduling of duties and overtime arrangements are operational matters to be decided by the general manager of the Scottish Ambulance Service.

Hospital Shops

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what surveys have been commissioned by the Home and Health Department into the number and estimated percentage of hospital shops which sell cigarettes and similar products.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 15 March 1993]: No surveys of hospital shops have been commissioned, but all health boards are committed to having policies in place to create a virtually smoke-free national health service as from 31 May 1993 and progress will be monitored by the NHS management executive in Scotland.

Renaval Programme

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland, pursuant to his answer of 16 February, Official Report, columns 168-69, if he will indicate the amounts of money paid by (a) the Scottish Office, (b) Strathclyde regional council, (c) Inverclyde district council, (d) the European Community and (e) the Renfrewshire enterprise company to those projects in Inverclyde which received aid by way of the European Community's Renaval programme.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 15 March 1993]: This information is not held centrally. My Department reimburses each project sponsor for that part of a project's defrayed expenditure eligible for European funds as awarded by the Renaval programme monitoring committee. The amount of EC funding paid out to date is given in the following table:

Project	Sponsor	Total eligible expenditure £	EC allocation £	Total eligible expenditure to date £	Total EC grant paid to date £

Tinnitus

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to fund medical research projects in Scotland specifically targeted at the relief of tinnitus; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 15 March 1993]: The leading centre for research into hearing disorders, including tinnitus, in the United Kingdom is the Medical Research Council Institute of Hearing Research which is based in Nottingham with clinical outstations in Glasgow and Southampton. The Chief Scientist Office of the Scottish Office participates in the forward planning processes of the institute and keeps in close contact with its work. In addition, the Chief Scientist Office itself is always prepared to consider applications for the funding of soundly-based research projects in this as in other health-related subjects.

Housing

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what information he has on the number of four and five-apartment houses currently owned in Scotland by local authorities and tenanted by single people.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 15 March 1993]: The available information on number of rooms by household size and tenure will be published in the 1991 census report for Scotland, part 1, in April 1993.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many four and five-apartment houses were built by local authorities in Scotland for letting as general purpose houses for the last five years for which figures are available.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 15 March 1993]: The information requested is not available.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will estimate the number of small houses for single parents or couples which were built by (a) local authorities and (b) housing associations in Scotland over the last five years for which figures are available.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 15 March 1993]: The information requested is not available.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what incentives he plans to stimulate additional building of houses in the social rented sector suitable for single people or couples; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 15 March 1993]: Local authorities and new town development corporations have substantial resources exceeding £400 million in 1993-94 which can be used to fund the additional building of rented housing if this is regarded as a local priority. In addition, Scottish Homes plan to give a record £260 million in grant to housing associations in Scotland next year, the bulk of which will be for social rented housing.

Electronics and Offshore Oil and Gas

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many (a) males and (b) females were employed full time in (i) the electronics industry and (ii) the offshore oil and gas industries and ancillary employment ashore in each of the past 10 years.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 15 March 1993]: Total offshore employment in the northern North sea in each year since 1982 is detailed in terms of an estimated range in the table. Employment onshore and offshore in companies wholly involved in oil-related activities in Scotland is also shown, together with estimated employment in the electronics industry. There are no separate figures for males and females.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 15 March 1993]: I refer the hon. Member to my right hon. Friend's statement of 11 March and the guidance on the implications for market testing of the Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations which my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster has placed in the Library. The statement and guidance have been drawn to the attention of COSLA.

The range of occupations covered includes: gardeners, scientists, administrators, curators, laboratory attendants, librarians, maintenance staff, and park constabulary.

Female Doctors

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what percentage of female medical practitioners were employed as (a) obstetricians, (b) gynaecologists, (c) neuro-surgeons, (d) other specialists in medical occupations and (e) general practitioners in each of the past seven years.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 15 March 1993]: The numbers in the specialties and in general practice, expressed as percentages of all women doctors working in the NHS in Scotland, are shown in the table:

Distribution of women doctors in the NHS

	1986	1987	1988	1989	1990	1991	[3]1992

[1]Information is available for the specialty of obstetrics and gynaecology, but not for each separately.
[2]1991 and 1992 data exclude community doctors in family planning services.
[3]The 1992 data are provisional.

Dental Services

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list (a) the number and amount of dental payments made and (b) the number of registered dental patients in each of the past five years.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 15 March 1993]: The number of claims made by dentists and the remuneration received by dentists in Scotland for the provision of NHS services as reflected in the total gross fees authorised for payments to dentists, which include the value of charges paid by patients, is shown in table 1 for the last five financial years. From October 1990 child patients could be registered with a dentist under capitation arrangements which cover most care and treatment. The figures for claims for dentists therefore exclude all treatment to children under capitation from October 1990 onwards. The figures for gross payments, however, include the cost of capitation patients. Formal arrangements for patients to be registered with a specific dentist were introduced under the new contract for general dental services on 1 October 1990. No information about registration is therefore available prior to October 1990. The number of adult and child patients registered since October 1990 is contained in table 2.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the average cost of dental treatment in (a) Strathclyde and (b) Scotland as a whole for the latest year for which figures are accessible.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 15 March 1993]: The average cost of a course of dental treatment in each of the health board areas within Strathclyde region and the average cost in Scotland as a whole for 1991-92 is contained in the table. The average cost is based on the cost of all adult treatments and certain treatments provided for children outside capitation arrangements, and includes the value of charges paid by patients. The cost of the majority of treatment provided to children which is under capitation arrangements is not included in the table as under capitation children do not have individual courses of treatment but receive all care and treatment needed on a continuing basis, for which dentists are paid regular standard payments. Information for individual local government regions is not available.

NATIONAL HERITAGE

Fire Precautions

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if he will make a statement on the powers of the London Fire Brigade to inspect (a) the Tower of London, (b) Hampton Court and (c) Buckingham palace; when was the last inspection in each case; and if copies of each such inspection will be placed in the Library.

Mr. Brooke: As these are Crown properties, the London Fire Brigade has no power to inspect them. The properties are nevertheless required to comply with the provisions of the Fire Precautions Act 1971, with certification as appropriate by the Home Office fire service inspectorate.

The management of each of these properties consults the London Fire Brigade on specific issues. The fire brigade undertakes joint exercises in each property and makes familiarisation visits several times a year.

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what action he has taken this year to safeguard visitors to the White Tower at the Tower of London and to maximise precautions against fire.

Mr. Brooke: Following the fire at Windsor in November, I set up an inquiry under Sir Alan Bailey to review fire precautions in the royal palaces, including the Tower of London.

I have asked the Master of the Armouries to write to the hon. Member about measures specific to the White Tower, for which the Royal Armouries has responsibility.

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what action he has taken since April 1992 to examine fire precautions and the safety of visitors at Hampton Court palace.

Mr. Brooke: Following the fire at Windsor in November, I set up an inquiry under Sir Alan Bailey to review fire precautions in the royal palaces, including Hampton Court palace.

I have asked the chief executive of the Historic Royal Palaces Agency to write to the hon. Member about measures specific to Hampton Court palace, for which the agency has responsibility.

Television Licences

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how many prosecutions took place in Pendle for television licence evasion for the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. Brooke: Separate statistics for Pendle, which falls within the area administered by the Preston TV licensing inquiry office are not available. In 1992, there were 6,238 prosecutions for television licence evasion in the Preston TVLEO area.

Concessionary Television Licences

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what guidance was issued to local authorities and others about the change in entitlement to concessionary television licences; when the guidance was issued; and if he will place a copy of such guidance in the Library.

Mr. Brooke: No guidance was issued to local authorities at the time about the effect of the Wireless Telegraphy (Broadcast Licence Charges and Exemption) (Amendment No. 2) Regulations 1988. But the changes to the concessionary television licence scheme which these regulations introduced were explained to the House by the then Home Secretary on 18 May 1988 and a press release was issued on the same day by the Home Office.

Museums (Security Vetting)

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if he will estimate the costs of security vetting (a) one museums support grade member of staff and (b) one member of staff employed by a contract security firm; and what ongoing non-security costs are borne in relation to the latter.

Mr. Key: The security arrangements at the National Museums and Galleries are the responsibility of the trustees, who have a statutory responsibility for managing their particular institution. They may consult the security advisor at the Museums and Galleries Commission.

Television Programmes

Mr. Stephen: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what action he is taking within the institutions of the European Community and the Council of Europe to prevent the transmission of violent or pornographic television programmes into British homes.

Mr. Brooke: We are exploring with the European Commission the scope for United Kingdom action under the EC broadcasting directive (89/552/EEC) against pornographic satellite channels based in another EC member state. No action is possible under the Council of Europe convention on transfrontier television as it is not yet in force. The convention, which the United Kingdom and seven other states have ratified, will come into force on 1 May 1993.

Departmental Spending

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what percentage share of total departmental spending was accounted for by non-departmental public bodies in each year since 1979.

Mr. Key: The information requested is shown in the table. Figures for the years prior to 1987-88 are not available.

Local Authority Services

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for South Hams (Mr. Steen) on 10 November 1992, Official Report, columns 687-89, if he will include Scottish local authorities in the examination of local provision of arts, theatres and library facilities which is being carried out by a firm of consultants; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke [holding answer 16 March 1993]: On libraries, the Scottish Office will be involved with the work of the steering committee overseeing the exercise. Whether any Scottish local authorities will be among the pilot projects themselves has yet to be determined. The possibility that Scottish local authorities might be included with English ones in a single consultancy study of local authority management of arts facilities is under consideration.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage, pursuant to the answer to the hon. Member for South Hams (Mr. Steen) of 10 November 1992, Official Report, columns 687-89, if he will make a further statement concerning (a) the remit of the consultants who are to examine the local authority provision of library services, arts and theatre facilities, (b) the choice of consultants, (c) the expected cost of the investigation and (d) when he expects to receive the final report from the said consultants.

Mr. Brooke [holding answer 16 March 1993]: The steering committee which will oversee the pilot projects on libraries will begin work soon. One of its first tasks will be to decide the remit of any associated consultancy work and a procedure for appointment.

Broadly, the remit for the consultants who will be undertaking the study of local authority arts facilities will be to make recommendations on how efficiency in this area of local authority management might best be improved through the introduction of increased competition. I expect to make further announcements in due course concerning both libraries and arts facilities; these will also cover the costs and timetables for consultancy work involved.

BCCI

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what discussions he has had concerning the content of the second report of the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee, Session 1992-93, on "Banking Supervision and BCCI: The Implications of the Bingham Report".

Mr. Nelson: My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has discussed the report with colleagues and officials. I have also met the hon. Member and a delegation of BCCI depositors.

Insider Dealing

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received from the City Group of Smaller Companies in respect of changes to insider dealing in the Criminal Justice Bill [Lords]; what reply he has sent; what action he will be taking; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nelson: The City Group of Smaller Companies has written to the Treasury setting out some suggested amendments to the proposed insider dealing legislation contained in the Criminal Justice Bill. Representatives of the group met Treasury officials on 15 March to discuss the suggestions in greater detail.

The Government are grateful for the representations made by the group and will give them careful consideration in readiness for the Criminal Justice Bill's remaining parliamentary stages.

Trade Gap

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on how Government policies are promoting the closing of the United Kingdom's trade gap.

Mr. Portillo: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave him on 17 February 1993, Official Report, column 210.

Motor Cars

Mr. Hunter: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his assessment of the implications of the Budget statement for the United Kingdom motor car industry.

Mr. Dorrell: The Budget will benefit industry, including the motor industry, by ensuring that the recovery is sustainable. The motor industry is already playing an important part in the recovery and has benefited significantly from the abolition of car tax. Yesterday's Budget completed the switch in taxation from car purchase to car use which the Chancellor announced in his autumn statement.

Yesterday's Budget also included two proposals of particular importance to the motor industry: a clear indication of the Government's intentions on fuel taxation and a new structure for the taxation of company cars from April 1994. Both changes will provide the industry with a stable background against which to plan future investment.

IMF

Mr. Denham: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the progress of the International Monetary Fund's visit to Brazil to discuss a new accord.

Mr. Nelson [holding answer 16 March 1993]: It is not for a United Kingdom Minister to comment on the status of negotiations between fund staff and third countries.

Companies

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what percentage of the United Kingdom's gross domestic product is generated by (a) publicly quoted companies and (b) private companies.

Mr. Nelson [holding answer 16 March 1993]: The latest estimate of the proportion of the United Kingdom's gross domestic product that is generated by companies is for 1991, when it was 53·7 per cent. A split between publicly quoted and private companies is not available centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mortgage Tax Relief

Mr. Alan Milburn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will provide a table showing the number of recipients of higher rate mortgage interest tax relief for each year since 1979-80 in the United Kingdom by region;

(2) if he will provide a table showing the number of recipients of mortgage interest tax relief for each year since 1979-80 in the United Kingdom by region;

(3) what was the total value of providing higher rate mortgage interest tax relief for each year since 1979-80 in the United Kingdom by region (a) at current prices and (b) at 1979-80 prices;

(4) pursuant to his answer of 17 June 1992, Official Report, columns 537-38, to the hon. Member for Angus, East (Mr. Welsh), if he will (a) update the table with the latest information he has available on mortgage interest tax relief and (b) provide the information at both 1979-80 prices and cash prices.

Mr. Dorrell [pursuant to his answer, 25 February 1993, c. 686-88]: I regret that three figures in the first two tables were printed incorrectly. For completeness the corrected answer is restated in full as follows:

Information for the total of mortgage interest relief is in the tables. The regional distributions for 1979-80 to 1982-83 have been derived from the relevant surveys of personal incomes. However, following the introduction of mortgage interest relief at source in April 1983, regional information cannot be extracted from Inland Revenue records. Broad estimates for the years 1983-84 to 1991-92 have accordingly been based on analyses of the family expenditure surveys for the years concerned.

Reliable estimates of the value of and the number of recipients of higher rate mortgage interest tax relief by region are not readily available and could be produced only at disproportionate cost.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Sentencing

Mr. Stephen: To ask the Attorney-General if he will ensure that upon the conviction of any person of a crime to which section 36 of the Criminal Justice Act 1988 applies, written notice is given to the victim of that crime or his or her relatives that the Attorney-General has a right of appeal, with leave of the Court of Appeal, if the sentence passed for that crime is unduly lenient.

The Attorney-General: There are well-established procedures within the Crown prosecution service and other prosecuting authorities for drawing to my attention cases where a reference to the Court of Appeal under section 36 of the Criminal Justice Act 1988 might be appropriate. My power to seek leave under the Act applies to all offences triable only upon indictment. There does not appear to be any lack of public awareness of the availability of the reference procedure.

Northumberland Beagling Festival

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Attorney-General how many persons were charged with offences alleged to have been committed at the Northumberland beagling festival, Forestburngate, in September 1991; how many prosecutions were brought; and what were the results of the prosecutions.

The Attorney-General: Thirteen people were charged with offences alleged to have been committed at the national beagle festival held in Northumberland during September 1991 and all were prosecuted. The results were that four were fined and ordered to pay prosecution costs, four were bound over to keep the peace, the charges against two were dismissed after full trial and the charges against three were not ultimately proceeded with.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Child Abduction

Mr. Olner: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will make a statement about the future of court mediation services in respect of referrals of child abduction cases.

Mr. John M. Taylor: The future role, organisation and funding of mediation services is being reviewed, within the context of divorce law reform, as part of the Government's rolling programme for the reform of family law. The Government have no immediate plans to introduce special arrangements for mediation in child abduction cases.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Poverty Alleviation

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps the World bank is taking to evaluate the effectiveness of its poverty alleviation activities; when this evaluation is expected to be concluded; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle) on 1 March, at column 21.

Developing Countries

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the dates of forthcoming consultative group meetings for developing countries convened by the World bank or the United Nations Development Programme and the countries which will be discussed at each meeting.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The latest information we have on aid co-ordination meetings planned for the rest of 1993 is as follows:

March:	Laos, Philippines, Romania
April:	Senegal, Zambia, Pakistan, Bangladesh, Bulgaria, Kyrgyzstan, Costa Rica, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras, Nicaragua

May:	Cote d'Ivoire, Guinea, Uganda, Papua New Guinea, Egypt, Armenia, Georgia, Moldova, Mongolia

Dates to be determined: Nigeria, Vietnam, Lebanon, Russia, Ukraine, Bolivia.

The timing is subject to agreement in all cases with the Government concerned and slippage may occur because of unforeseen political or economic developments.

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what actions the United Kingdom executive director of the World bank has taken to ensure that developing country non-governmental organisations are fully consulted on the environmental and social impact of World bank projects and structural adjustment loans.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We have consistently supported the World bank's policy of encouraging greater openness and consultation by its borrowers with local non-governmental organisations—NGOs. The bank requires prospective borrowers to make an environmental assessment, which is carried out at an early stage of project design, available to affected groups and local NGOs and to carry out meaningful consultations with them.

International Development Association

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what evaluation his Department has made of the effectiveness of the ninth replenishment of the International Develoment Association; what were the conclusions of this evaluation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Commitments to specific projects and programmes under the ninth replenishment of IDA are still being made. Disbursements of funds to implement them will continue for some years. They will be subject to ex-post evaluation by the operations evaluation department of the World bank. I also refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on 24 February at column 601.

Peru

Mr. Carrington: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on aid relations between the United Kingdom and the Government of Peru.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Given recent steps to restore democratic government in Peru, we have decided to resume those bilateral aid activities which were suspended in April 1992. Work will resume shortly on our offer of £3 million of programme aid and on new technical co-operation activities.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Medomsley Detention Centre

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Durham, North-West (Ms Armstrong) of 4 March, Official Report, column 287, why the former HM detention centre at Medomsley, County Durham, cannot be converted into an institution for young offenders instead of being put on the property market; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Medomsley is in a part of the country where there is already enough Prison Service accommodation. Resources would be required to replace dormitories with secure cells for it to meet present-day requirements. In the circumstances, its retention in the Prison Service estate cannot be justified.

Child Pornography

Mr. Ronnie Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what measures are being taken to prevent the production and distribution of child pornography in Britain; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what measures are being taken to prevent the flow of child pornography into Northumbria;

(3) what representations he has received on the issue of child pornography in recent months.

Mr. Jack: The Government take the problem of child pornography extremely seriously, not least because we recognise that the production of such material often involves the commission of sexual offences against children. The criminal law already contains stringent provisions directed against those who seek to profit from this abhorrent trade. Thus, it is a criminal offence under the Protection of Children Act 1978 to take, distribute, show, advertise or possess with a view to distribution any indecent photograph, film or video recording of a child under the age of 16. The maximum penalty on conviction on indictment of these offences is a prison sentence of three years, an unlimited fine, or both.

In the Criminal Justice Act 1988, the law was further strengthened by the introduction of a new offence of possessing child pornography. For this offence, the maximum penalty on summary conviction is a level 5 fine —currently £5,000. The criminal law also contains severe penalties for those convicted of the sexual abuse of children, including life imprisonment for those convicted of rape or buggery.

The deployment of police resources in Northumbria against child pornography or any other unlawful activity is an operational matter for the chief constable, in the light of his assessment of the needs of his area. At present, however, we have no reason to believe that child pornography is a greater problem in Northumbria than elsewhere in the United Kingdom.

As I indicated in my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Dr. Spink) on 5 February, Official Report, column 350, we are currently considering what improvements can be made in the enforcement of obscenity legislation. We have received a number of representations on this subject, including some which have been specifically concerned with child pornography, and we will announce our conclusions in due course.

Immigration Appeals

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many appeals are outstanding at the Immigration and Nationality Department for (a) naturalisation, (b) registration, (c) political asylum and (d) general immigration casework.

Mr. Charles Wardle: There is no right of appeal under nationality legislation. The available information on immigration cases is that the asylum and special cases division has about 1,550 outstanding cases and the after-entry casework division about 2,800 outstanding cases where an appeal has been lodged and an explanatory statement is awaiting preparation. Comparable figures for appeals casework at ports of entry are not held centrally.

Entry Refusals

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many passengers arriving in Great Britain were refused entry at each port in the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The information requested is given in the table.

John Ryan

Mr. Kilfoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what inquiries have been made into the death of John Ryan in Winson Green prison in 1987; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Immediately following John Ryan's death in the hospital unit at Birmingham prison in 1987, an inquiry was undertaken by the regional principal medical officer. In addition the senior medical officer at the prison, at the time, sent a report to the coroner.

The inquest verdict was that Mr. Ryan died from electrolyte imbalance due to water depletion and to bronchopneumonia due to lack of care.

Mr. Ryan's family sued the Department and at the Birmingham county court judgment was found against the Home Office. Negotiations are under way about the terms of a settlement with Mr. Ryan's family.

Mr. Ryan's death in custody was a matter of great regret. The inquiries carried out in 1987 resulted in a number of changes in procedures for monitoring prisoners in the hospital unit.

The director of health care services for prisoners is satisfied that the procedures which now operate at Birmingham should prevent the recurrence of such a tragedy.

Immigration Officers

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many immigration officers are currently employed at the immigration and nationality department in each division and at each port of entry.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The number of immigration officers, chief immigration officers and immigration inspectors in post on 28 February is set out in the table.

Firearms

Mr. Nigel Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many new firearm licences were issued in each year since 1979; and what is the total number of licences currently in force.

Mr. Charles Wardle: Statistics on the number of new firearm certificates issued since 1983 and the number in force at 31 December 1991 were published in Home Office statistical bulletin "Firearms Certificates Statistics, England and Wales, 1991"—issue 19/92. A copy of this bulletin is in the Library. Statistics on new firearm certificates issued prior to 1983 were not collected centrally.

Mr. Nigel Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the total number of firearm licences that have been withdrawn in each year since 1987.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The total number of firearm licences which were either revoked or had an application for renewal refused in England and Wales since 1987 is given in the table.

Year	Revocations	Applications for renewal refused
1987	170	276
1988	239	406
1989	224	309

Mr. Nigel Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the total number of unlicensed guns seized in each police authority area for each year since 1979.

Mr. Charles Wardle: This information is not collected centrally.

Castington Young Offenders Institution

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many vacant places there are at the Castington young offenders institution; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: On Friday, 12 March 1993, there were 45 unfilled places at Castington young offender institution. The establishment has a capacity of 300 places, but this has been reduced temporarily to 240 because some staff have had to be deployed on duty elsewhere in the Prison Service estate.

Market Testing

Mr. Hall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the effect of the Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations 1981 and the EC acquired rights directive on his market testing of establishments division 5 information systems and pay services.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The matter is under consideration. The effect of these provisions will depend on decisions regarding the sectors of business to be subject to competitive tendering and the terms on which tenders are to be invited.

Mr. Hall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has made, in his market testing of establishment division 5 information systems and pay services (ED5) for the return of work in-house from contractors where this becomes necessary.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Risks will be thoroughly assessed during the market-testing process and contingency plans will be developed as appropriate.

Secure Training Units

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the individuals and organisations he consulted in the process of deciding his policy of building secure training units for the 11 to 15 years age group announced on 2 March.

Mr. Jack: Before my right hon. and learned Friend made his statement on 2 March at columns 139-42, Ministers and officials considered representations and views about the problem of persistent juvenile offenders from a wide range of individuals and organisations.

Young Offenders

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many younger offenders in the Chelmsford and Mid Essex police division were (a) cautioned by the police and (b) prosecuted; of those prosecuted, how many were convicted; and what orders were made in respect of them in the last three available years.

Mr. Jack: The information readily available centrally is given in the table. The police force area is the smallest geographical unit for which information on cautioning is available centrally.

Child Abduction

Mr. Olner: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what assessment he has made as to the adequacy of records kept in respect of prosecutions for child abduction;

(2) how many prosecutions relating to child abduction offences there have been in England and Wales in each of the last five years.

Mr. Jack: Details of prosecutions for child abduction under sections 1 and 2 of the Child Abduction Act 1984 are contained in the annual publication "Criminal Statistics England and Wales". They include both prosecutions undertaken by the Director of Public Prosecutios and prosecutions instigated by individuals. As explained in appendix 2 to "Criminal Statistics England and Wales 1991", Cm 2134, statistics about court proceedings include some in which there has been no police involvement at the prosecution stage, for example in cases where the prosecution has been brought by a private individual, but the reporting of private prosecutions is known to be incomplete.

The available information about the number of prosecutions for offences relating to child abduction under sections 1 and 2 of the Child Abduction Act 1984 for 1987 to 1991 is given in the table. 1992 data are not expected to be available until autumn 1993.

Regulations

Mr. Sproat: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 10 February, Official Report, column 624, if he has now finished compiling and checked for accuracy and consistency of definition the comprehensive, provisional list of regulations for which his Department is responsible; and when he intends to place this list in the Library.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [holding answer 16 March 1993]: As I explained in my reply to my hon. Friend on 10 February, a list of regulations that impact on business has been put together by my Department. Work on this has now been completed and it is being placed in the Library.

Immigration

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the entry clearance applications of Mrs. Khadija Bibi—Ref.: IMM/78676—and her children were referred to his Department by the United Kingdom post in Islamabad; when a decision will be taken on these applications; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Charles Wardle [holding answer 11 March 1993]: Mrs. Khadija Bibi and seven children were refused entry clearances by the entry clearance officer in Islamabad on 4 October 1990. They appealed against the decision. The appeal hearing was listed for 18 September 1992 but was adjourned by the immigration appellate authority. In February 1993 Mrs. Bibi's representative sent the immigration department further evidence about the relationship between Mrs. Bibi and four of the children. This has now been considered and the entry clearance officer is being authorised to issue entry clearance to these applicants.

Entry Visas

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department on how many occasions his Department has given entry visas to the Iraqi citizens Amir Al-Saadi, Safa Al-Habobi, Sadik Taha, Raja Hassawali and Hussein Kamil since 1985.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: I have been asked to reply.

A visa was issued to Safa Al-Habobi in 1988. There is no record of visas being issued to the others listed.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

European Armaments Agency

Sir John Hunt: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to associate the countries of central Europe with the European armaments agency to be established by the Western European Union; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Garel-Jones: The Western European Union is continuing to examine the possibilities of enhanced co-operation in the field of armaments with the aim of creating a European armaments agency, in line with the declaration by WEU Heads of State and Government at Maastricht on 10 December 1991 and the declaration by the WEU Council of Ministers at the Petersberg on 19 June 1992. There has been no discussion to date of the possibility of associating the countries of central Europe with the eventual agency.

Kosovo

Sir John Hunt: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will agree to extend the UNPROFOR mission to Kosovo.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Decisions on the deployment of United Nations peacekeeping operations are a matter for the United Nations Security Council. There is already a CSCE mission in Kosovo whose aims are to monitor the human rights situation, promote dialogue between the communities and act as intermediary in disputes between the Serbian and local communities.

Yugoslavia

Sir John Hunt: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make it his policy to strengthen the present embargo against Serbia and Montenegro to the level recommended in recommendation 530 of the assembly of the Western European Union; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad: We would support introduction of more rigorous sanctions against Serbia and Montenegro should the Serbs seek to block a settlement. In the meantime we are actively supporting international efforts to ensure existing sanctions are enforced more rigorously. We welcome the efforts of the Western European Union assembly to identify measures that could improve sanctions enforcement.

Sir John Hunt: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is his policy towards bringing to trial before the appropriate judicial bodies those responsible for war crimes committed during the present conflicts in the former Yugoslavia.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We fully supported the adoption of United Nations Security Council resolution 808 which decides, in principle, to establish an ad hoc war crimes tribunal to bring those accused of war crimes in the former Yugoslavia to justice.

Sir John Hunt: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make it his policy to support the imposition of sanctions against sea or air transport operators in Western European Union member states found guilty of violating the United Nations embargo against Serbia and Montenegro; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad: It is the responsibility of each individual state to enforce sanctions within its own territory and according to its own legislation. We are determined to ensure that sanctions are enforced rigorously; there are severe penalties for those convicted of committing breaches. We have no legal powers to take punitive action against companies operating outside the United Kingdom involved in breaches of United Nations sanctions.

Sir John Hunt: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assistance he has offered in response to the request by Romania for help in policing the embargo against Serbia and Montenegro.

Mr. Goodlad: The United Kingdom contributes personnel and equipment to the sanctions assistance missions, now operating in a number of states including Romania. We are also making available £100,000 in practical sanctions enforcement to help states on the Danube. This will consist of communications and other equipment for customs authorities. Earlier today my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs discussed ways to tighten enforcement with the Romanian Foreign Minister.

Child Abduction

Mr. Olner: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will seek a meeting with the Spanish ambassador regarding the position of British children abducted to Spain.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: As Spain is signatory to both the Hague and European conventions on child abduction, cases of British children abducted to Spain are dealt with by the Lord Chancellor's Department.

Mr. Olner: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when measures to prevent child abduction were last discussed at the level of the United Nations.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Article 11 of the United Nations convention on the rights of the child calls upon states to take measures to combat "the illicit transfer and non-return of children abroad".
The convention was adopted by the General Assembly on 20 November 1989 after many years of detailed discussions.

Mr. Olner: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what data his Department has on cases of British children being abducted and taken abroad in the last three years.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Cases of children abducted to countries which are signatory to either or both of the Hague and European conventions are dealt with by the Lord Chancellor's Department, which is the central authority within the United Kingdom under the conventions. No data are available in my Department on such cases.

Statistics involving children taken to non-convention countries which were brought to the attention of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office are as follows:

	Children
1990	149
1991	108
1992	98

There may have been others of which we were not made aware.

Mr. Olner: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with other Commonwealth countries on the ratification of international conventions and bilateral agreements for the return of abducted children.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: It is our policy to encourage all countries, including Commonwealth countries, to adhere to the Hague convention. The Commonwealth Secretariat is hoping to put his subject on the agenda for the Commonwealth Law Ministers' meeting in November this year.

Mr. Olner: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will meet the National Council for Abducted Children to consider the appointment of a senior diplomat to mediate and negotiate for the return of abducted children.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: This proposal was one of the recommendations in the report of the Parliamentary working party on child abduction, published on 9 March 1993. I wish to study the report before considering such a meeting.

Mr. Olner: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make representations to (a) Italy and (b) Greece regarding signature and ratification of the Hague convention on child abduction.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: No. Both countries have signed the convention; Italy is in the process of ratifying; Greece has ratified but has not yet deposited instruments of ratification at the Hague.

Mr. Olner: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what initiatives he will recommend to his European Community partners to prevent child abduction in the European Community.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: None: the resolution on custody and abduction of children across national borders was adopted by the European Parliament in March 1984. It stated that the Council of Europe and Hague conventions were the appropriate means of protecting children and called on member states to ratify the conventions as soon as possible.

Western European Union

Sir John Hunt: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make it his policy to support the proposal in recommendation 528 of the assembly of the Western European Union to invite the central European countries to observe exercises co-ordinated by the Western European Union planning cell.

Mr. Garel-Jones: We note the suggestion made by the assembly of the Western European Union, and will consider it in due course. There is some way to go before the WEU is ready to conduct exercises.

Sir John Hunt: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proposals he has to ensure that an agreement between NATO and the Western European Union is so framed as to avoid duplication.

Mr. Garel-Jones: The modalities of the relationship between the Western European Union and the Atlantic alliance were set out in the declaration by WEU Heads of State and Government at Maastricht on 10 December 1991. Both NATO and the WEU have since agreed documents proposing guidelines for the practical working relations between the two organisations. The arrangements aim to ensure complementarity and transparency, not duplication, between the organisations.

Sir John Hunt: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make it his policy to support recommendation 532 of the Assembly of Western European Union on the need for member states of the Western European Union to co-ordinate policy on export of military equipment, end-distination controls on exports of jointly-produced equipment and the requirement to notify such exports to the United Nations register of international arms transfers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Garel-Jones: We are already working with our Western European Union partners, in the context of European political co-operation, for greater harmonisation and information exchange in national procedures on arms exports, including licensing procedures and procedures to ensure control of end use. We intend to notify the United Nations of all imports and exports covered by the United Nations register.

Sir John Hunt: To ask the Secretary of state for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make it his policy to support recommendation 531 of the Assembly of Western European Union for the Western European Union Council to draw up plans for military operations in Bosnia-Herzegovina.

Mr. Garel-Jones: We share the Western European Union assembly's concern at the crisis in the former Yugoslavia. We have supported WEU actions and contingency planning on Yugoslavia on the basis that it takes account of the requirements of the situation, the availability of resources, and planning in other organisations such as NATO.

Nuclear Defence

Sir John Hunt: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the adoption of a joint European position towards the American programme for global protection against limited strikes.

Mr. Garel-Jones: The new United States administration will wish to consult European allies on ballistic missile defences. NATO provides the natural forum for such discussion. The WEU may also have a role to play in defining European ballistic missile defence interests.

Palestine Liberation Organisation

Mr. Ronnie Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's relations with the Palestine Liberation Organisation and the Government's policy on the implementation of United Nations Security Council resolution 799.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: On 9 March my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office met Faisal Husseini, leader of the Palestinian negotiating team in the middle east peace process and two representatives of the Palestinian Liberation Organisation. He stressed the importance of an early resumption of peace talks, and urged the Palestinians to accept the invitations to the next round. We continue to seek a solution to the deportations problem on the basis of Security Council resolution 799.

Israel

Mr. Ronnie Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's policy on economic sanctions against the state of Israel.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We do not think economic sanctions against the state of Israel would be helpful.

River Danube

Sir John Hunt: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what offers of expertise, technical assistance or equipment have been made to the Danube riparian states to prevent the use of the River Danube in avoiding the sanctions imposed by UN Security Council resolutions 713 and 757.

Mr. Goodlad: The United Kingdom took the lead in setting up EC/CSCE sanctions assistance missions to advise the Governments on the enforcement of sanctions. The United Kingdom has contributed both personnel and equipment to these missions. They are now in place in Romania, Bulgaria, Hungary, Croatia, Ukraine and Macedonia. We have also offered £100,000 to enable states on the Danube to procure communications and other equipment for use by local customs authorities.

Arms Limitation Agreements

Sir John Hunt: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what technical assistance is being offered to the countries of central Europe to enable them to participate in operations to verify disarmament or arms limitation agreements to which they may be party.

Mr. Garel-Jones: The joint arms control implementation group has a programme of training exchanges with verification agencies in the former Warsaw pact states and recently hosted a highly successful seminar on the practical implementation of arms control agreements. The United Kingdom is also offering places to inspectors from former Warsaw pact states on forthcoming national inspections under the treaty on conventional armed forces in Europe.

Macedonia

Sir John Hunt: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is his policy on the recognition of the independence of the Republic of Macedonia with a name acceptable to its population; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad: The Edinburgh European Council decided to set aside the recognition of Macedonia to concentrate on issues that would be of practical assistance, including UN membership. The question of recognition is, therefore, still under consideration.

Greece and Turkey

Sir John Hunt: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what efforts Her Majesty's Government have made in resolving the differences which exist between Greece and Turkey.

Mr. Garel-Jones: Where we have a direct interest in issues of difficulty between Greece and Turkey, such as Cyprus, we continue our efforts to help find a lasting solution acceptable to all sides.

Serbia and Montenegro

Sir John Hunt: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make it his policy to publish evidence of any breach of the embargo imposed against Serbia and Montenegro.

Mr. Goodlad: It would not be proper for us to publish any allegations of sanctions breaches in advance of any prosecution that may take place and indeed to do so may prejudice the chances of a successful prosecution.

The United Nations sanctions committee investigates allegations of sanctions breaches and brings them to the attention of those responsible. It is not, however, the practice of the committee to publish its discussions.

Brussels Treaty

Sir John Hunt: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, what plans he has to refer the dispute on the expiry of the period of 50 years laid down in article XII of the modified Brussels treaty to a group of independent legal experts.

Mr. Garel-Jones: We have no plans to do so.

Overseas Missions

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 12 February, Official Report, column 842, at how many missions there is more than one swimming pool; and for what reason.

Mr. Goodlad: Swimming pools are officially provided for two reasons: for the representational use of the head of post and/or for amenity use by the staff at post, especially where staff live in a compound, or where such facilities are not locally available, accessible or suitable. Of the 135 swimming pools at posts overseas, about 80 are primarily representational and about 55 primarily for amenity use.

In the 26 FCO posts at which there are two swimming pools, one in each post is solely for representational use and the other solely for amenity use by the staff at post.

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 12 February, Official Report, column 842, at how many missions there is more than one tennis court; and for what reason.

Mr. Goodlad: Tennis courts are officially provided for two reasons: for the representational use of the head of post and/or for amenity use by the staff at post, especially where staff live in a compound, or where such facilities are not locally available, accessible, or suitable. Of the 81 tennis courts at posts overseas, about 24 are primarily representational and about 57 primarily for amenity use.

In the 10 FCO posts at which there are two tennis courts, one in each post is solely for representational use and the other solely for amenity use by the staff at post.

Departmental Officers (Travel)

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 2 March, Official Report, column 62, of the families accompanying the nine officers in first class, how many were dependent children.

Mr. Goodlad: Included in the families accompanying the nine officers in first class were two dependent children.

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 2 March, Official Report, column 62, what was the cost in the last year for which figures are available for officials and advisers travelling first class on duty journeys in the company of Ministers.

Mr. Goodlad: For the diplomatic wing, in the 12 months to 31 January 1993, the cost of first-class air travel for officials and advisers accompanying Ministers was £98,763, less rebates which the FCO will receive as part of its travel management contract.

For the overseas development wing, in the 12 months to 31 January 1993, the cost of first-class air travel for officials and advisers accompanying Ministers was £39,805, less rebates which the ODA will receive as part of its travel management contract.

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 2 March, Official Report, column 62, what were the operational reasons which required 12 officers to travel first class to their posts abroad in the last year; and what was the grade of the officer who travelled first class by virtue of his grade.

Mr. Goodlad: It is policy that ambassadors and high commissioners should fly first class on first arrival at and on final departure from the country to which they are accredited. It is expected that they will have to meet high-ranking members of the host Government and that they may have to give a statement to the press immediately before or after their journeys. They should not, therefore, travel below the status expected of them. They are also usually travelling at the end of hectic periods of briefing or debriefing. These were the operational reasons in the 12 cases cited. The other officer, also being appointed as ambassador, who travelled first class by virtue of his grade, was graded at salary point 1 of the senior grade.

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 2 March, Official Report, column 62, how many private secretaries and officers travelled first class in the 12 months to January.

Mr. Goodlad: For the diplomatic wing, in the 12 months to 31 January 1993, 36 private secretaries and officers travelled in first class on duty journeys overseas.

For the overseas development wing, in the 12 months to 31 January 1993, 55 private secretaries and officers travelled first class on duty journeys overseas.

WALES

Empty Properties

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many houses owned by the Mid Wales Development Agency, the Welsh Development Agency and local authorities are presently standing empty; what is the amount of rent thereby lost; and what plans he has to reduce the number of empty properties.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: No dwellings owned by the Welsh Development Agency are currently vacant. The number of vacant dwellings owned by local authorities and the Mid Wales Development Agency are given in the following table:

	Vacant dwellings
Local authorities[1]	2,034
Development board for rural Wales[2]	50

[1] At 1 April 1992.
[2] At 28 February 1993.

The rent lost by local authorities through void dwellings in the week ending 4 April 1992 was £60,000. Plans to reduce the number of local authorities' vacant dwellings are outlined in the "Agenda for Action for Housing in Wales". The document specifies a target that, for each local authority, the number of vacant dwellings should represent no more than 2 per cent. of its stock by 1993-94, and by 1996-97 it should be no higher than the figure achieved by the upper quartile of authorities in 1992-93.

Food Poisoning

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish figures showing the number of reported cases of (a) campylobacter, (b) salmonella, (c) salmonella enteritidis PT4, (d) listeria and (e) general food poisonings in Wales in both 1990 and 1991.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The number of notifications of food poisoning in Wales in 1990 and 1991 are shown in the table. Cases of campylobacter, salmonella, salmonella enteritidis PT4 and listeria are not separately notifiable.

	Formally notified	Ascertained by other means

ReChem International Ltd.

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has received in regard to the plans by ReChem to import dioxin-contaminated wastes from Hamburg for incineration at Pontypool, Gwent; and what communications he has had with his German counterpart on the subject.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The Welsh Office has received four letters relating to imports of waste from Germany. The German Government have been made aware of the United Kingdom's policy of self-sufficiency in final disposal for developed countries.

Heads of the Valleys Authority

Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales whether he will list the wards in the proposed Heads of the Valleys unitary authority which have been defined by his Department as deprived.

Mr. David Hunt: The list of wards recognised as deprived for urban programme purposes which was published in Welsh Office circular No. 25/91 includes all the wards in the proposed Heads of the Valleys unitary authority.

Mental Hospitals

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many mental hospital beds have been available in Wales in each year since 1985; and how many of these beds were located in old-style mental hospitals in each year.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The requested information is given in the table.

Capital City Status Study (South Glamorgan)

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a financial contribution towards the cost of the enhanced capital city status study carried out for the South Glamorgan county council by the town and regional planning department, University of Wales, college of Cardiff.

Mr. David Hunt: No.

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many appointments to the public bodies listed in "Public Bodies" for his Department were made from names supplied by the public appointments unit; and if he will list them.

Mr. David Hunt: This information is not held centrally and could not be identified.

Regional Assistance

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will set out by travel-to-work area the total amount of money received since 1984 in (a) regional assistance and (b) from the European rural development fund.

Mr. David Hunt: Information about European regional development fund allocations are not available on a travel-to-work area basis; regional assistance payments since 1984 are as follows:

Table includes expenditure relating to regional selective assistance, regional development grant II, and regional enterprise grants.

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement concerning development area status in Wales.

Mr. David Hunt: The representations received about the review of assisted areas are currently being considered. The Government hope to be able to make an announcement on the outcome of the review as soon as possible.

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what has been the amount of money made available to each travel-to-work area in Clwyd under objective 2 status; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: The resources which have been made available to provide European regional development fund —ERDF—and European social fund—ESF—grant assistance relate to the whole of this objective 2 area and are not allocated to any specific travel-to-work area.

The funding allocations agreed with the European Community for the Clwyd objective 2 programmes are shown in the table:

TRANSPORT

Tankers

Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what consideration has been given to compulsory pilotage for laden oil tankers in the Minches and other sensitive waters.

Mr. Norris: Compulsory pilotage has been considered for waters such as the Minch but has not been introduced for various legal and practical reasons. It would represent an infringement of the right of innocent passage. Further, pilotage can be required only where there is a competent harbour authority and, even then, masters using a route regularly are entitled to a pilotage exemption certificate. The voluntary code recently agreed with the industry therefore concentrates on other measures to reduce risks to sensitive areas. I understand that Lord Donaldson is covering this question in the work of his inquiry.

Railway Investment

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list all the railway investment projects which have received grant aid from the European regional development fund for each of the last 10 years; and the amount of grant received in each case.

Mr. Freeman: I have written to the hon. Gentleman and placed a copy of my reply in the Library of the House.

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport by what criteria railway investment projects are considered for eligibility for grant aid from the European regional development fund.

Mr. Freeman: The eligibility of programmes for grant aid from the European regional development fund is determined by regulation 4254/88—EC Official Journal 374/1988. Individual investment programmes are considered against these criteria by the relevant programme committees for the areas concerned.

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list all the current and pending railway investment projects for which applications for grant aid from the European regional development fund have been made; and the amount of grant aid being sought in each case.

Mr. Freeman: Following is a list of British Rail projects for which full or outline applications have been made for aid from the fund.

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many appointments to the public bodies listed in "Public Bodies" for his Department were made from names supplied by the public appointments unit; and if he will list them.

Mr. Steven Norris: A total of 12 of the appointments to the public bodies listed in "Public Bodies" for the Department of Transport were made from names supplied by the public appointments unit. These are as follows:

My right hon. Friend also appoints lay members of the transport tribunal, although responsibility for the tribunal rests with the Lord Chancellor's Department and is listed accordingly in "Public Bodies". Such appointments made from names supplied by the unit are Mr. J. Whitworth and Mr. G. Simms.

The Department may also check with the unit whether it has additional information on names from other sources, such as professional bodies, representative organisations, chairmen, or responses to advertisements.

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what percentage share of total departmental spending was accounted for by non-departmental public bodies in each year since 1979.

Mr. Steven Norris: Details of expenditure on non-departmental public bodies by individual departments from 1981-82 may be found in the annual publication "Public Bodies". Expenditure by the Department of Transport on NDPBs as a percentage of the Department's cash planning total since 1981-82 was as follows:

Plutonium

Mr. Macdonald: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will place in the Library the safety studies relating to the movement of plutonium nitrate solution from Dounreay to Sellafield via sea.

Mr. Norris: A copy is already in the Library.

Shipping (Sewage)

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his answer of 9 March, Official Report, column 474, when he expects to be able to introduce appropriate merchant shipping legislation to give full effect to the provision for requirements for sewage systems; and when he expects these requirements to become operational.

Mr. Norris: Standards for the design and construction of ship's sewage systems are being developed in the International Maritime Organisation's ship design and equipment sub-committee with a target date for completion of 1995. Merchant shipping legislation will be introduced to give effect to international requirements as soon as they are made.

Channel Tunnel Rail Link

Mrs. Helen Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the current estimated cost of (a) the King's Cross terminal development and (b) the crossrail link line.

Mr. Freeman: The estimates that we have indicate that the cost of the King's Cross terminal would be of the order of £1.4 billion and the crossrail project of the order of £1.7 billion.

Sir Keith Speed: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what proportion of funding for the channel tunnel rail link construction he is planning should come from the private sector.

Mr. Freeman: It is too early to say. The Government are committed to taking the project forward as a joint venture, and we shall now discuss the proposals with the private sector.

Swanage Railway

Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what decision his Department has made on the application for a light railway order on the Swanage railway.

Mr. Freeman: Following a local public inquiry and consideration of the inspector's report, I have today determined that this order should be made. I shall be sending my hon. Friend a copy of the decision letter and the inspector's report for information.

Heathrow Airport

Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what additions or improvements to the motorway system will be needed to cater for traffic using the proposed fifth terminal at Heathrow.

Mr. MacGregor: A number of schemes to improve the M25 and M4 in the vicinity of Heathrow are already in the national road programme and these will be needed whether or not a fifth terminal is to be built at Heathrow. In addition road access to the proposed fifth terminal would require a dedicated spur from the M25, and widening and junction improvements on the M4 between its junction 3 and the M25. I am adding schemes for these improvements to the programme so that the details of the road and traffic implications of a new terminal at Heathrow can be developed and considered alongside the planning application. I must stress that most of these further improvements will be needed only if the proposal for terminal 5 receives consent. We have reached agreement with the British Airports Authority on appropriate funding arrangements.

Motorways

Mr. James Hill: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he now expects the M3 extension between Bar End and Compton to be completed.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: The M3 motorway between Bar End and Compton is expected to be completed in autumn 1994.

Mr. James Hill: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what consideration his Department is giving to the upgrading of the M27 at Chilworth into a four-lane motorway; and on what time scale.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: There is a scheme in the road programme for widening the motorway between junctions 4 and 12. The next stage would be to conduct a fee competition for the engineering consultancy. No date has yet been fixed for this.

Hazchem Warning System

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what progress has been made on incorporationg the hazchem warning system into proposed European legislation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: My Department is working closely with the Home Office to promote the benefits of Hazchem's emergency action codes in Europe with a view to incorporating them in the United Nations road transport agreement, ADR, which is likely to form the basis of future European Commission proposals concerning the transport of dangerous goods. An ADR working group will meet at the United Kingdom fire service college in mid-April to consider our proposals.

Channel Tunnel Rail Link

Mr. William O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if it remains his policy that the rail link between 16 northern regions and the channel tunnel should be via King's Cross; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will publish the latest information available to his Department on plans for the British Rail high-speed rail link through London.

Mr. Freeman: I refer the hon. Member to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer's statement to the House on 16 March, column 194. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will make a full statement very soon.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Child Support Agency

Mr. Hall: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what assessment he has made of the effect of the work of the Child Support Agency on the work of the courts in Warrington South.

Mr. Burt: Implementation of the Child Support Act will mean that assessment, collection and enforcement of child maintenance in the majority of cases will be for the Child Support Agency and not for the courts. However, the courts will retain responsibility in certain areas, such as the arrangement of spousal maintenance, in handling property settlements, and in matters deciding contact with children.

The Child Support Agency will not be fully operational until 1997. Offsetting the transfer of functions from the courts during the period to 1997 will be additional work involving the variation of existing court orders.

An assessment of the impact on the work of the courts in Warrington, South is not separately available.

Unemployed Claimants

Mr. Knox: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will update the figures in table 5.10 of "Social Trends 1992," showing the percentages of unemployed claimants in 1991 receiving (a) unemployment benefit only, (b) unemployment benefit plus supplementary benefit and/or income support and (c) neither.

Mr. Burt: The information in the form requested for both 1991 and 1992 is in the table.

Unemployed male claimants receiving each benefit (percentage)	November 1991 (per cent.)	November 1992 (per cent.)

Local Offices

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to increase the number of those employed in the Benefits Agency offices in Greenock and Port Glasgow; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Burt: The administration of the Benefits Agency is a matter for Mr. Michael Bichard, the chief executive. He will reply to the hon. Member with such information as is available and a copy will be placed in the Library.

Letter from Michael Bichard to Dr. Norman Godman, dated 15 March 1993:

As Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency, it is my responsibility to answer questions about relevant operational matters. I am therefore replying to your recent Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Social Security asking what plans he has to increase the number of those employed in the Benefits Agency offices in Greenock and Port Glasgow.

Resource allocations for the next financial year for Greenock and Port Glasgow, which form the district of Clyde Coast and Cowal, have not been decided and so it is not yet possible to indicate whether staffing levels are likely to increase in these offices. It may prove helpful if I outline the timetable for allocating resources and give a broad indication of when the information you have asked for will be available.

Indicative allocations were issued to District Managers and Area Directors in February and final allocations will be made before the end of March. Part of all districts' allocations are made to Area Directors who are responsible for agreeing with District Managers how these resources should be distributed. Decisions will be made during April/May on the Area Director's allocation to districts. It will then be for District Managers to decide on staffing levels for the different offices within their district.

The level of resources allocated to districts is subject to continuous review throughout the year as workloads or other factors change. This can result in adjustments being made to staffing levels after initial allocations have been agreed.

I have asked the manager of Clyde Coast and Cowal district to write to you with planned staffing levels, for the next financial year, as soon as decisions have been reached.

I hope you find this reply helpful. A copy of this letter will appear in the Official Report and a copy will also appear in the Library.

Family Size

Mr. Knox: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will publish the latest figures available showing families with four or more children (a) as a percentage of all families with children and (b) as a percentage of unemployed families with children.

Mr. McLoughlin: I have been asked to reply.

Information for Great Britain from the summer (June to August) 1992 "Labour Force Survey" shows that;

(a) 5 per cent. of all one plus child families included four or more children;

(b) 10 per cent. of heads of one plus child families who were unemployed on the ILO definition had four or more children in their family.

Note: Children are only included if aged under 17 or aged 17 or 18 in full-time education.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Lay Adjudicator Scheme

Dr. Wright: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what is the present status of the lay adjudicator scheme outlined in the citizens charter White Paper.

Mr. Waldegrave: Having considered how the lay adjudicator scheme might work in practice, the Government have decided that the first step must be to make sure that public services' own complaints systems are effective and operate in line with citizens charter principles. As announced in the "Citizen's Charter First Report: 1992" (Cm 2101), this will be achieved through two initiatives. One is Charterline, a telephone helpline to provide information about the citizens charter and individual charters; and about whom to contact for more information about public services or to make a complaint. Charterline will be piloted in May 1993 in the east midlands.

The second is a review of public service complaints systems by a review team of people with relevant experience and expertise drawn from a variety of backgrounds. The team will encourage public services to operate in line with citizens charter principles and will offer advice on setting up and improving complaints systems. The team will operate for a period of two years, at the end of which it will recommend any further measures that may be needed to address the issues identified in the citizens charter White Paper (Cm 1599).

Work is in hand on the setting up of the team and I hope to make a formal announcement before the end of the month.

ENVIRONMENT

Environmental Protection

Mr. Henderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the amounts of central Government support for local authorities under his Department's environmental protection programme for each of the last five years for each standard region of England and in total.

Mr. Maclean: The information is not held in the form requested. I will write to the hon. Member.

Animal Imports

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make representations to his EC colleagues for the amendment of CITES to secure improved enforcement of provisions under article 111 relating to the import of animals for use by souvenir photographers.

Mr. Maclean: Application of article III of CITES is already mandatory throughout the European Community under the provisions of EC Council regulation 3626/82. I shall be happy to investigate, or to pass to the European Commission or CITES secretariat, as appropriate, any evidence of failure to implement or enforce the convention.

Water Abstraction Charges

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the forthcoming changes in water abstraction charges.

Mr. Maclean: I have recently approved the National Rivers Authority's new national abstraction charging scheme for 1993-94.

The adoption of the new scheme does not affect the amount to be raised within each region. The national average increase in bills is some 1·7 per cent., but the increase varies between regions according to the need for spending on water resource management and movements in balances.

Zoo Licensing Act 1981

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to review the implementation of the Zoo Licensing Act 1981.

Mr. Maclean: None at present.

Drinking Water

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the current regulations about the content of lead in drinking water in force in the United Kingdom; and what assessment he has made of the effect on them of World Health Organisation guidelines.

Mr. Maclean: The Water Supply (Water Quality) Regulations 1989 prescribe a maximum concentration at the point where water is supplied by the undertaker of 50 micrograms of lead per litre of water in any sample of drinking water. This is more stringent than the requirements of the EC drinking water directive. We are considering whether any changes are needed in the light of the revised guidelines which the World Health Organisation is expected to publish later in the year.

House Prices, Warrington

Mr. Hall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the average price of houses in Warrington, South in each year since 1984-85.

Mr. Baldry: Information on dwelling prices at regional level is published in "Housing and Construction Statistics", but figures are not available at constituency level.

Landfill Sites

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on progress made in meeting the targets set in the EC framework waste directive to establish the licensing of landfill sites by 1 April.

Mr. Maclean: The licensing of waste landfill sites is already required under part I of the Control of Pollution Act 1974. These will be replaced by new waste licensing provisions under part II of the Environmental Protection Act 1990, which I now propose to bring into force on 1 June this year. Some further amendments to United Kingdom legislation will also be required to implement the directive in full and appropriate regulations will be laid in due course, after relevant interests have been consulted.

Toxic Emissions

Mr. Loyden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what new initiatives he has taken to reduce the effects of toxic emissions and pollution by petrochemical industries on Merseyside.

Mr. Maclean: Under part I of the Environmental Protection Act 1990, prescribed processes require authorisation by Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution, and chemical plants fall into this category. In granting authorisation, the enforcing authority must seek to ensure that the best available techniques not entailing excessive cost, are employed to prevent or minimise the release of any substance prescribed for any medium.

HMIP has prepared guidance, in the form of process guidance notes for inspectors, on the standards to be applied to the processes it controls. The first nine notes in the chemicals sector which cover organic chemical processes were published on 27 January in preparation for the processes coming under integrated pollution control from 1 May 1993. These notes are publicly available for the benefit of operators and other interested parties. Further guidance notes for the chemicals sector will be published during 1993.

Copies of the guidance notes have been placed in the Library.

Food Availability

Mrs. Wise: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what studies he has made of the effect of the loss of local fresh food shops and the growth of out-of-town superstores on food availability and prices for non-car owners.

Mr. Baldry: None. But more general research led to the report "The Effects of Major Out-of-Town Retail Development", published by HMSO last year. That research informed the draft revised planning policy guidance note 6 "Town Centres and Retail Development" which we published for public consultation last October.

Ozone Levels

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what have been the levels of high-level ozone over the United Kingdom for the last three dates for which figures have been recorded; and what were the figures for equivalent dates in each of the last 10 years.

Mr. Maclean: The most recent three days for which total column ozone measurements are available from Lerwick, Scotland and Camborne, Cornwall are 13, 14 and 15 March. The measurements, together with measurements on the same dates for the past 10 years are as follows:

Dobson Spectrophotometer Ozone Measurement in Dobson Units (DU)

	Lerwick, Scotland			Camborne, Cornwall
	13 March	14 March	15 March	13 March	14 March	15 March

Blanks in the table indicate where measurements could not be made, due to certain conditions of wind, rain and cloud. Data for 1990-1993 are provisional pending final calibration in the summer.

Residential Property (Businesses)

Mr. William O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what guidance he issues on the car parking provisions which should be provided by planning authorities when considering planning applications for the operation of a taxi business from a residential property; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will consider giving further guidelines in planning policy guidance 4 to the hours that any business may be conducted from a terraced house when the neighbouring properties are occupied as domestic living quarters; and if he will make a statement;

(3) if he will give further consideration to improving the guidelines in planning policy guidance 4 concerning the establishing of taxi businesses from terraced houses; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Baldry: The revised planning policy guidance note No. 4 "Industrial and Commercial Development and Small Firms" was published in November 1992. It explains that planning permission will normally be required for any use of a dwelling house for business purposes which changes materially the overall character of the property's use as a dwelling house. Such a change may be indicated where the non-residential use generates visitors, traffic, noise or fumes over and above what might be expected if the property were in use as a single dwelling without any ancillary use.

It is for local planning authorities to decide whether the use of residential properties for business purposes is appropriate and acceptable development given the circumstances of each case, or whether such uses could be made acceptable by the imposition of conditions, such as those limiting working hours. The provision of adequate car-parking facilities can be material in deciding individual applications for planning permission. Guidance on the reasonableness of car-parking requirements is given in appendix D of planning policy guidance note No. 13.

Plant and Machinery (Rating)

Mr. David Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish the report of the expert advisory committee chaired by Mr. Derek Wood QC which has reviewed the rating of plant and machinery.

Mr. Redwood: The Secretary of State has, together with my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland, published the Wood committee report as a command paper and placed copies in the Library of the House. We are grateful to the chairman and members of the Committee for the thorough way in which they have investigated the rating of plant and machinery. They invited written evidence from a wide range of interested bodies and business ratepayers and received responses from 71 of them, some of whom also gave oral evidence. Members of the Committee also undertook a series of visits to different types of industrial plants.

The report is the first comprehensive review of the subject to be undertaken for over 30 years. The recommendations deal with how the rating of plant and machinery can be made more consistent with the rating valuation hypothesis and on the means to achieve harmonisation of the rating of plant and machinery throughout the United Kingdom. Specific recommendations remove anomalies and delete obsolete and tautologous references in the current rules. The report also suggests that valuations of plant and machinery using the contractor's basis should employ the unit cost method currently adopted in England, Wales and Northern Ireland.

The Government would welcome views on the report by 12 May before considering the extent to which its conclusions should be implemented for the 1995 revaluation of non-domestic property. In due course, we will undertake full consultation on the necessary implementing legislation.

Environmental Assessment

Mr. Peter Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when the consultation paper reviewing permitted development rights granted in the Town and Country General Development Order 1988 in relation to environmental assessment will be issued; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: I am pleased to announce the issue of the consultation paper today. It endorses the Government's commitment to ensuring that all projects which could have significant effects are thoroughly assessed before being allowed to go forward. The consultation paper invites comments on proposals to withdraw permitted development rights for projects listed in schedule 2 to the Town and Country Planning (Assessment of Environmental Effects) Regulations 1988 where they are likely to have such effects.

The consultation paper will also invite views on the Government's intention to withdraw permitted development rights where a proposed development is likely to have a significant effect on a special protection area designated under the birds directive (EC directive 79/409), or a special area of conservation designated under the habitats directive (EC directive 92/43).

Housing Associations

Mr. Sims: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what assistance he proposes to offer to housing associations in the transition to community care; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: Overall responsibility for policy on community care and monitoring its detailed implementation at local level rests with the Department of Health. Recognising the role housing associations can play in community care, I am asking the Housing Corporation to relax its rules so that, as a transitional measure in 1993-94, housing associations will continue to be eligible for special needs management allowance support for people placed in residential homes by local authorities.

I am aware that particular concern has been expressed about the future of care homes for those with an unsettled lifestyle, which may include people who misuse alcohol and drugs and people who are mentally ill. I am therefore asking the Housing Corporation to liaise closely with housing associations operating schemes for such people.

Waste Management

Mr. Congdon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to implement the waste management licensing system under part II of the Environmental Protection Act 1990; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maclean: Since August 1992 the Government have been consulting on the measures needed to implement the enhanced system of waste management licensing under part II of the Environmental Protection Act 1990. These consultations have been complex and detailed because of the need to strike the right balance between regulations, exemptions from licensing and guidance; the need to take account of European Community measures dealing with waste management; and the need to keep the burden of regulation to a minimum consistent with achieving our environmental protection objectives.

Given the range and weight of the comments raised, it has not been possible to conclude considering them by the Government's previous target date for implementation of licensing of 1 April 1993. I therefore propose to bring the waste management licensing system into force on 1 June 1993; regulations will be laid before the House in good time before then.

Sellafield

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what emergency plans there are for Northern Ireland following an accident at the Sellafield reprocessing plant.

Mr. Atkins: I have been asked to reply.

The operators of the Sellafield plant, as with all operators of nuclear installations, are required as a condition of their site licence, to prepare emergency plans which are subject to approval by the Health and Safety Executive's nuclear installations inspectorate. These plans include a detailed planning zone around each installation and in the case of Sellafied this is 2 km. The boundary of this zone is defined in relation to the accident with the greatest off-site consequences which can reasonably be predicted given the design of the plant, its protective systems and operating limits. These plans also form the basis for an extended response in the very unlikely event that a more severe accident should occur. In the unlikely event of an accident at Sellafield the emergency arrangements detailed in existing plans would be invoked to respond to any off-site consequences. The response would be handled locally and, under existing arrangements, the Department of the Environment for Northern Ireland would be notified.

Well-established procedures for dealing with nuclear emergencies were put in place following the Chernobyl accident in 1986. Northern Ireland is included in the radioactive incident monitoring response network established under the national response for the United Kingdom.

Benzene

Mr. Hall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the benzene content of (a) standard unleaded motor fuel and (b) super unleaded motor spirit; and at what stage additional benzene is added to (a) or (b).

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: As the question falls to the Department of Transport, I have been asked to reply. There is no correlation between benzene content and the grade of petrol. The benzene content of leaded, unleaded and super unleaded petrol is controlled in each case at a maximum of 5 per cent. by volume under EC Directive 85/210. Market surveys show that, in practice, petrol typically contains 2 to 4 per cent. of benzene by volume. Within the European Community the limit of 5 per cent. is being reviewed. Benzene is not added to petrol at any stage during refining, but is produced during the process called reforming, which is used to make high-octane petrol.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Rabbit Phone Points

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Chairman of the Administration Committee if Rabbit phone points will be installed on the parliamentary estate.

Mr. Michael J. Martin: I shall arrange for this matter to be considered by the Administration Committee.

Terrace Refreshment Points

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Chairman of the Catering Committee what discussions have taken place with the City of Westminster planning authorities about the demountable refreshment points reconstructed each year on the terrace of the Palace of Westminster.

Mr. Colin Shepherd: None.

Fire Brigade Inspections

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Chairman of the Accommodation and Works Committee if he will make a statement on the powers of the London Fire Brigade to inspect the Palace of Westminster; when the last inspection was; and if he will place a copy of the report in the Library.

Mr. Ray Powell: The London Fire Brigade has no powers to inspect the Palace of Westminster, nor has it done so. It is, however, invited to the Palace to carry out periodic familiarisation visits and training. The latest of these visits took place on 19 January. Responsibility for fire safety lies with the Crown premises inspection group of the Home Office fire inspectorate, which maintains close contact with the fire safety manager of the Parliamentary Works Directorate.

Lloyd's

Mr. Viggers: To ask the Chairman of the Administration Committee if he has considered an application for an exhibition relating to Lloyd's, "The Heart of the London Market", to be displayed in the Upper Waiting Hall.

Mr. Michael J. Martin: I understand that, under procedures agreed by the Administration Committee, arrangements have been made for the exhibition to be held in the Upper Waiting Hall from 4 to 11 May 1993.

Worldwide Engineering

Dr. Michael Clark: To ask the Chairman of the Administration Committee if he has considered an application for an exhibition relating to worldwide engineering to be displayed in the Upper Waiting Hall.

Mr. Michael J. Martin: I understand that, under procedures agreed by the Administration Committee, arrangements have been made for the exhibition to be held in the Upper Waiting Hall from 10 to 17 May 1993.

Environmental Engineering

Mr. Shersby: To ask the Chairman of the Administration Committee if he has considered an application for an exhibition relating to environmental engineering to be displayed in the Upper Waiting Hall.

Mr. Michael J. Martin: I understand that, under procedures agreed by the Administration Committee, arrangements have been made for the exhibition to be held in the Upper Waiting Hall from 21 to 28 June 1993.

SCOTLAND

999 Calls, Dunbar

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the average time taken between a 999 telephone call from the Dunbar area and the arrival of the patient by ambulance at the accident and emergency department at the Royal infirmary in Edinburgh.

Mr. Stewart: We estimate that on receipt of a 999 call it takes three minutes to activate an ambulance and 13 minutes to travel to the scene. This compares favourably with the national target response time of 18 minutes. Ambulance crews usually spend about 10 minutes at the scene and the average journey time from Dunbar to the accident and emergency department at Edinburgh royal infirmary is 39 minutes. The average total time taken is therefore 1 hour 5 minutes.

Community Care

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what advice has been given to primary care and hospital staff about the joint discharge arrangements between social work departments and health boards.

Mr. Stewart: The management executive of the national health service in Scotland is in the process of producing a guide on the principles of good practice on discharge procedures in hospital. A small multi-disciplinary team has prepared this guidance in a form in which it can be used through the service. The aim is to publish the guidance by week commencing 22 March and for it to be widely distributed to health boards and social work departments.

Committee of the Regions

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what discussions he has held with the Scottish National party concerning the number of Scottish representatives in the United Kingdom delegation to the Committee of the Regions; what undertakings he has offered in relation to separate party political affiliation in its Scottish representation; what criteria he intends to employ in the selection of such representation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stewart: My right hon. Friend has listened with interest to the views expressed by the Opposition parties about Scotland's representation on the Committee of the Regions, including the question of how best to ensure that such representation reflects the diversity of Scottish political opinion.

Community Hospitals

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what finance and other resources are made available to general practitioner-run community hospitals by hospital in each health board.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 4 March 1993]: The information is not held centrally.

Rule 43 Prisoners

Mr. Hood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many (a) men and (b) women were on rule 43 in Scottish prisons in each of the last five years.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 2 March 1993]: The rule 43 referred to is used only in prisons in England and Wales. The nearest equivalent rule in Scottish prisons is rule 36 of the Prisons (Scotland) Rules 1952. The information is not recorded in the form requested. However, as at 2 March 1993 there were 19 male prisoners and one female prisoner held under the conditions of rule 36.

Pupils' Faiths

Lady Olga Maitland: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give a breakdown by region of the faith allegiance of pupils in maintained schools and the percentage of pupils not educated in the maintained sector.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 10 March 1993]: Regional figures on the religious affiliation of pupils in education authority schools in Scotland are not judged to be sufficiently reliable for publication because of substantial survey non-response. I will write separately to my hon. Friend on this matter.

Shetland Oil Spillage

Mr. Norman Hogg: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how and when the results of early monitoring undertaken to assess the immediate impacts of the oil spillage in the Shetland Islands on fish and shellfish will be made available.

Sir Hector Monro [holding answer 5 March 1993]: Detailed weekly bulletins are being issued to fishing interests and others giving the results of monitoring in the waters around Shetland following the oil spill.

Forestry Commission

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list by county the names of and size of all Forestry Commission holdings.

Sir Hector Monro [holding answer 10 March 1993]: The area of land currently managed by the Forestry Commission in each county or region is given in the table. The names and size of each individual Forestry Commission holding could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Secure Units

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) how much capital money has (a) been made available and (b) spent on the provision of secure units for young people in each of the past five years; and if he will make a statement;

(2) how much capital money has (a) been made available and (b) allocated for the provision of secure units in 1992-93; and if he will publish a list of the institutions concerned and the amount of money allocated in each instance.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 15 March 1993]: My right hon. Friend is empowered under the Social Work (Scotland) Act 1968 to pay capital grants to local authorities and voluntary organisations for provision of secure accommodation, taking account of the need for such accommodation over Scotland. Grants made available and spent on the provision of secure accommodation for young people in each of the last five years are given in the table.

Caledonian MacBrayne

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what grant in aid has been provided in each of the past 10 years by way of (a) the Scottish Office and (b) the European Community (i) for the maintenance of the Caledonian MacBrayne passenger ferry fleet and (ii) to provide assistance in relation to the purchase of replacement vessels.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 16 March 1993]: The operating deficit which Caledonian MacBrayne incurs in providing a network of approved services is funded by the Scottish Office by means of an annual revenue deficit grant. CalMac has not to date received central Government grant towards the cost of new vessels although the company has received assistance from the European regional development fund for this purpose. The information requested is set out in the table:

	Revenue deficit grant £ million		ERDF grant £

Dysentery

Mr. Chisholm: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many instances of dysentery have been reported in Scotland in each year since 1988.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 8 March 1993]: The number of cases of bacillary dysentery notified in Scotland since 1988 is as follows:

Year	Notifications
1988	196
1989	154
1990	235
1991	1,526
1992	[1]3,506

Supervisory Orders

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is his estimate of the cost of operating a supervisory order made by a court in Scotland.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 15 March 1993]: Under the 100 per cent. funding arrangements the average cost of providing a community service order which involves supervised work in the community was approximately £1,150 for 1991. This is the most recent year for which information is available. Similar figures are not yet available for the cost of a supervised attendance order.

EDUCATION

Animal Schemes

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will make it his policy to establish a licensing scheme for all visiting animal scheme organisers.

Mr. Forth: No.

Public Bodies

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Education how many appointments to the public bodies listed in "Public Bodies" for his Department were made from names supplied by the public appointments unit; and if he will list them.

Mr. Boswell: It is difficult to ascribe every appointment made to this Department's public bodies to a single source. Members are appointed by the Secretary of State on the basis of their personal qualities in the light of advice from various quarters. The public appointments unit provides names of suitably qualified candidates for consideration for a wide range of appointments and is used to provide information about names suggested by others. Six appointments to this Department's public bodies which are listed in "Public Bodies" are known to have been suggested by the public appointments unit. They are:

Education Assets Board
Mr. K. Bridge
Miss A. Lees

National Youth Agency
Mrs. S. Joiner (nee Gardner)

National Curriculum Council and Schools Examination and Assessment Council
Mr. J. P. Whitehouse

Schools Examination and Assessment Council
Mr. J. Day

Visiting Committee for the Royal College of Art
Mr. D. Nicholls

Learning Disabilities

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Education how many facilities are available in Crewe and Nantwich for the education of children with learning disabilities.

Mr. Forth: Within the area in question Cheshire local education authority maintains one special school and 13 special units, all making provision for children with special educational needs.

Learning Disabilities

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Education how many facilities are available in Cheshire for the education of children with learning disabilities.

Mr. Forth: Cheshire local education authority maintains 21 special schools and 107 special units for children with special educational needs. In addition there are six non-maintained special schools in the county.

Key Stage 1 Tests

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what account will be taken in assessing and reporting the results of the key stage 1 tests for seven-year-olds of the different ages of those taking the tests.

Mr. Forth: All pupils taking the key stage 1 tests this summer should have completed the statutory programmes of study associated with the key stage. The main purpose of testing and assessment is not to rank or label children, but to identify what each child has learnt as a result of following the programmes of study in order to plan future teaching.

The achievements of children who are in the final year of key stage 1 are assessed against the criteria laid down in the national curriculum and the results are reported to parents. The precise age of the child is not a factor in making the assessment, nor are results adjusted to take account of age. The Government have, however, proposed that where test results are included in school performance tables, the accompanying background information about each school should include an indication of the proportion of pupils tested who have been enrolled in primary school for fewer than six full terms.

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what percentage of children who began the key stage 1 tests for seven-year-olds when these tests commenced in February were aged six at that time.

Mr. Forth: This information is not available centrally.

Schools (VAT)

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will make a statement on the effect of (a) opting out and (b) local management of schools on the ability of individual schools to reclaim value added tax.

Mr. Forth: When schools achieve self-governing status they become liable for VAT on supplies and services. They receive a special purpose grant in recognition of this new liability. Local management of schools does not affect the VAT position of those schools maintained by the LEA, which may reclaim any payment of VAT through the LEA.

Teachers' Pay

Mr. Dunn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what was the average pay of (a) primary school teachers, (b) secondary school teachers and (c) all teachers in the last year for which figures are available; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Boswell: In April 1992, the most recent date for which figures are available, average earnings of primary school teachers were £19,339, of secondary teachers £21,221, and of all teachers £20,498.

Schools, Penrith

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Education (1) how many individual written responses he has received (a) for and (b) against the selection on ability of pupils at age 11 years for entry to either of the secondary schools in Penrith; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what evidence he has of backing from the governors and the local community for his policy in respect of Queen Elizabeth school, Penrith.

Mr. Forth: The Education Reform Act 1988 makes provision for any 10 or more local government electors, the governing body of any school affected by the proposals and any local education authority to submit objections to my right hon. Friend to proposals such as those published by the governors of Queen Elizabeth grammar school to introduce selective admission arrangements.

My right hon. Friend received 71 written responses to the proposals published by the governors of Queen Elizabeth grammar school. One of these supported the proposals; the remainder were opposed to them. No proposals concerning selection by reference to ability were published in respect of the other secondary school in Penrith.

I understand that there are over 37,000 local government electors in the district of Cumbria largely served by the Penrith schools, of whom less than 3 per cent. submitted objections to the Queen Elizabeth school proposals. Of the 23 primary schools and one secondary school affected by the proposals, the governing bodies of only eight schools submitted objections.

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what reports he received of the open consultation meeting held at Queen Elizabeth school, Penrith, on 29 April 1992, and of the subsequent consultation meetings with parents, staff and governors of feeder primary schools to Queen Elizabeth school; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Forth: The governors of Queen Elizabeth grammar school submitted to my right hon. Friend two reports on the findings of their consultation exercise conducted prior to the publication of proposals to change the character of the school.

PRIME MINISTER

EC Directives

Dr. Godman: To ask the Prime Minister how many times the United Kingdom Government have appeared at the European Court of Justice in each of the past seven years in order to defend themselves against allegations concerning breaches of EC directives; which Departments of state were directly involved; in which of these cases the decision went against the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: Since 1986, 10 direct actions against the United Kingdom have been brought before the European Court of Justice by the Commission, in accordance with article 169 of the treaty of Rome, involving allegations that the United Kingdom was in breach of its obligations under EC directives. Such actions are addressed to Her Majesty's Government and not to any individual Department, but the Departments with the leading interest in the cases were:

	Number of cases
Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food	1
Her Majesty's Customs and Excise	2
Department of Employment	3
Department of the Environment	2
Department of Trade and Industry	1
Department of Transport	1

Two of the cases were withdrawn before reaching judgment; in three cases the judgment has not yet been delivered. In one of the remaining cases, the court dismissed the application; in the other four the United Kingdom was held to be in breach of the relevant directives.

Further details of cases brought against the United Kingdom are contained in the six-monthly White Papers on developments in the European Community, which also contain details of references to the European Court of Justice from United Kingdom courts under article 177 of the treaty.

Chessington Computer Centre

Mr. Knox: To ask the Prime Minister which Government Minister has responsibility for Chessington computer centre.

The Prime Minister: The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, the Minister of Public Service and Science, is the Government Minister with responsibility for Chessington computer centre.

Maastricht Treaty

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his oral answer to the hon. Member for Faversham (Sir R. Moate) of 9 March, Official Report, column 782 (1) if he will list the provisions of the Maastricht treaty, as it applies to the United Kingdom delay in the implementation of which would lead to loss of foreign investment and jobs;

(2) what estimate he has made of the numbers and categories of jobs which would be lost (a) if ratification of the Maastricht treaty is delayed or (b) if the treaty is not ratified.

The Prime Minister: Various estimates have been made by and for industry of the adverse effect on our economy, inward investment and on jobs if the United Kingdom alone were to fail to ratify the treaty. Most recently the Association of British Chambers of Commerce, which represents more than 240,000 businesses, has made clear that the impact of continuing uncertainty or delay to United Kingdom ratification could only undermine business confidence, which would in turn endanger economic recovery not just here but in the rest of Europe.

The treaty is an important building block of the single market. Among its provisions, early implementation of which has been welcomed by industry, are those giving tougher powers to ensure that other member states stick to their obligations, those strengthening capital liberalisation, and those reversing centralisation by introducing the concept of "subsidiarity" or national preference.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Set-aside Land

Sir Patrick McNair-Wilson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will allow the grazing of sheep on set-aside land; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Curry: Limited grazing of sheep is allowed under the grazed fallow option of the five-year set-aside scheme. The Commission implementing regulations prohibit all agricultural production, including grazing, on land set aside under the arable area payments scheme.

Sir Patrick McNair-Wilson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will allow the use of herbicides on set-aside land; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Curry: The management rules for 1992-93 allow the application of non-residual herbicides by spot treatment or with a wick applicator on land set aside under the arable area payments scheme. It is also open to any grower to ask for a derogation to apply such herbicides by other methods where necessary. We intend to issue a consultation document on the management rules for future years very shortly.

DEFENCE

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will publish the review of medical care needs for the armed forces.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I will write to the hon. Member shortly.

TRIGAT Programme

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the progress of the TRIGAT—third-generation anti-tank guided weapons system programme.

Mr. Aitken: Development of both the medium-range and long-range TRIGAT are continuing to make good progress. A reduced-cost development programme has been implemented for the long-range TRIGAT.

Harrier GR7

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects that the Royal Air Force will take delivery of the advanced mission planning aid for the Harrier GR7.

Mr. Aitken: Towards the end of 1994.

Territorial Army

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the cost of the current series of television advertisements for the Territorial Army.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: A total of £807,000 in financial year 1992-93.

Service Bands

Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 5 March, Official Report, column 342, what are the percentages used to calculate the contribution to public funds by service bands in relation to net earnings; how income is apportioned between performers and individual band funds; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The percentage of net earnings which service bands contribute to public funds from fee-paying engagements normally ranges from 5 to 10 per cent. Individual band funds receive between 5 to 20 per cent, and the musicians 65 to 75 per cent. The balance is due to the director of music and/or conductor.

Southampton University Air Squadron

Mr. Viggers: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what calculations he has made of the cost of moving the flying operations of Southampton University Air Squadron from HMS Daedalus, Lee on Solent, to another location; and if he will give details.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I will write to the hon. Member shortly.

Royal Naval Engineering College

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has regarding the Royal Naval Engineering College at Manadon in Plymouth.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Our review of the future arrangements for training the services' engineer officers is continuing. The review is primarily concerned with the training currently provided at the Royal Naval Engineering College at Manadon and the Royal Military College of Science at Shrivenham. I hope to be able to announce the outcome shortly.

Belize

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow on Wednesday 10 March, Official Report, column 572, if a board inquiry is to be convened in relation to a traffic accident in Belize in December 1992, which caused the deaths of several British soldiers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The circumstances of the road traffic accident referred to were investigated by the service police and considered by the Commander British Forces in Belize, who decided that a board of inquiry was not necessary.

Recruitment

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if he will provide a breakdown by individual Army recruiting office in the United Kingdom of (i) expenditure and (ii) the number of Army personnel recruited; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what is the total expenditure on Army recruiting offices in the United Kingdom; how many Army personnel are recruited from each Army personnel centre in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The available information requested is set out in the table:

Redundancies

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what specific action he intends to take in those communities to which redundant personnel will return to assist with (a) housing, (b) employment and (c) education.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Service personnel selected for redundancy are invited to say where they intend to settle when they leave. The replies from those considered for redundancy in phase 1 indicated that resettlement will be widespread across the country and that there should be no significant additional demands on local community resources. Our resettlement services provide service personnel with a wide range of advice and support on housing, employment and education matters.

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what information he has on the number of Army personnel made redundant due to "Options for Change" who have been unemployed for (a) three months or more, (b) six months or more, (c) nine months or more, (d) one year or more and (e) two years or more.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: No one left the Army on redundancy before April 1992; but over 70 per cent. of those made redundant during 1992-93 have found jobs or moved overseas.

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his latest estimate of the number of service men who will be made unemployed as a result of "Options for Change".

Mr. Archie Hamilton: It is not possible to estimate the number of service personnel who may become unemployed as a result of "Options for Change". Over 70 per cent. of Army personnel who have left on redundancy terms during 1992-93 have found jobs or moved overseas. To date, few naval and RAF personnel selected for redundancy have left the services and it is not yet known whether they have obtained civilian employment.

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is (a) the model age and (b) the average age of redundant Army personnel who are currently serving on retraining schemes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Information is not available in the form requested.

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is (a) the model age and (b) the average age of those who are to be made redundant due to "Options for Change"; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The model and average age of personnel who have left or who are leaving the armed forces on redundancy in phases 1 and 2 under "Options for Change" are as follows:

	Model	Average
Officers	50	45
Other ranks	36	35
Total	36	38

Similar information in respect of civilian personnel is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what are the costs of retraining schemes offered to service men made redundant due to "Options for Change".

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Resettlement training is provided on a tri-service basis for all those being discharged from the services and makes no distinction between redundees and those who have completed their full engagement. An extensive range of training courses is available and the courses are either conducted in-house at MOD training centres, for which no charge is made, or are run externally on a fee-paying basis by educational and training institutions throughout the United Kingdom.

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assistance his Department provides to assist Army personnel in making the transition to civilian life, what special assistance is provided to personnel made redundant; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Throughout their service life personnel are trained in skills which are directly transferable to civilian employment and receive further education leading to recognised qualifications. Prior to discharge, extensive counselling, outplacement services and retraining are provided, along with job-finding support through the services employment network. In addition to receiving enhanced financial settlement terms, redundees are eligible for the full package of resettlement briefing and training measures.

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the average time period between Army personnel being made redundant and securing a place on a retraining scheme.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Resettlement training is provided to service personnel during the last six months of service. Once a date of discharge has been set—those made compulsorily redundant are given one year's notice—personnel can apply immediately for training courses. All personnel can apply for briefings in the last two years of service. In the case of redundees applications are accepted as soon as volunteers have come forward and those made compulsorily redundant are eligible to apply as soon as they have been notified.

Places on briefings or training courses are allocated eight weeks before the start date. Where applications are made at shorter notice they are accepted up to three weeks beforehand where places are available.

There are currently no waiting lists for career briefings or training courses. Following a higher than expected demand for job search briefings additional briefings are being provided.

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the retraining budget for Army personnel made redundant due to "Options for Change"; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Resettlement training is provided on a tri-service basis to all eligible personnel being discharged from the services. It is not possible to identify separately the costs of retraining Army personnel made redundant.

EMPLOYMENT

Workplace Injuries

Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many (a) fatal and (b) serious injuries were caused by the use of electrical equipment in the workplace in the last 10 years.

Mr. McLoughlin: Statistics of accidents caused by use of electrical equipment in the workplace during the last 10 years are not available in the form requested. The Health and Safety Executive (HSE) has extracted from the available statistics those which are most likely to refer to the use of electrical equipment; these are as follows:

Year	Fatal injuries	Serious injuries
1986-87	16	160
1987-88	17	187
1988-89	17	166
1989-90	11	178
1990-91	11	201
1991-92	14	171

Notes:

1. The table provided in this answer provides details of selected types of accidents resulting in fatal and major injuries occurring during the years 1986-87 and 1990-91 and provisional figures for 1991-92 as reported to the Health and Safety Executive's Factory and Agricultural Inspectorates, and to local authorities when they are the enforcing authority. Figures for 1991-92 also include details of reports made to the Health and Safety Executive's Quarries Inspectorate. Detailed analysis is not readily available for those injuries occurring in industries covered by other enforcing authorities or Inspectorates. The selected injuries are those where the agent of the accident is recorded as having been some kind of electrical equipment.
2. The Reporting of Injuries, Diseases and Dangerous Occurrences Regulations 1985 (RIDDOR) which govern the collection of such statistics were not introduced until 1985. Statistics for earlier years would be difficult to retrieve, and would in any case not be on a comparable basis.
3. The figures in the second column refer to major injuries requiring immediate medical treatment or causing loss of consciousness.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many (a) fatal and (b) serious injuries have been caused by fires occurring in the workplace in the last 10 years.

Mr. McLoughlin: The number of fatal and serious injuries caused by fires reported to the Health and Safety Executive's (HSE) factory and agricultural inspectorates and local authorities are as follows:

Year[2]	Fatal	Major[3]
1986-87	6	142
1987-88	14	149
1988-89	10	134
1989-90	11	135
[4]1990-91	10	121
[1][4]1991-92	9	97

[1] Provisional.
[2] Years commencing 1 April.
[3] As defined under the Reporting of Injuries, Diseases and Dangerous Occurrences Regulations, 1985.
[4] Includes reports made to HSE's Quarries Inspectorate.
Note: Injuries caused by fires were not separately identified from those involving explosions prior to 1986-87.

Smoking

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if she will list, for each of her Department's offices, the cost of counselling provided by her Department for employees who smoke and who wish to give up the habit.

Mr. McLoughlin: The Employment Department group has over 66,000 staff employed in a diversity of workplaces. Information on the cost of counselling for each departmental office is not held and could not be obtained without incurring a disproportionate cost. The group encourages managers to offer help to smokers who want to give up, including self-help smoking groups, organised smoking withdrawal courses, health education material, videos and audio-cassettes and cigarette substitutes.

Departmental Spending

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what share of total departmental spending was accounted for by non-departmental public bodies in each year since 1979.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Information is not available in the form requested and could be provided only at disproportionate cost. Information on the spending of non-Departmental public bodies is contained in "Public Bodies" published each year by the Cabinet Office and in the annual appropriation accounts for the Department. Copies of these documents for each year are available in the Library.

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what steps she took to reduce the production costs of her Department's expenditure plans, Cm 2205; and what steps she is taking to increase sales.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Production costs were kept to the minimum necessary to publish a document which is business like in its format and presentation, but provides the information in a way which is accessible to readers. The cost of printing, publishing and distributing the report was borne by HMSO, which aims to recover their costs from sales revenue.

HMSO, as publisher, is mailing a leaflet to potential customers which will promote both individual departmental reports. The Government's expenditure plans 1993-94 to 1995-96—including Cm 2205, and the full set of reports at a special discounted price.

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what changes to the aims and objectives of her Department have been made in the past year; and what effect she expects them to have on future spending plans.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The aim of the Department remains the same, but the objectives have been amended. Both can be found in the latest departmental report, a copy of which is in the Library. The report sets out how the Department's spending plans reflect the new objectives.

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what assumptions she has made in her Department's expenditure plans, Cm 2205, on the implementation of the public sector pay ceiling.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The Department's expenditure on pay will be constrained in accordance with the approach to public sector pay restraint announced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his autumn statement and contained within the public expenditure provision already published.

Labour Statistics

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what percentage of (a) 30 to 40-year-olds, (b) 40 to 50-year-olds and (c) 50 to 60-year-olds apply for employment for (i) skilled and (ii) unskilled positions, but are not hired.

Mr. McLoughlin: This information is not collected centrally.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many people aged (a) 30 to 40 years, (b) 40 to 50 years and (c) 50 to 60 years old were dismissed in the past financial year from a job they had held for more than five years.

Mr. McLoughlin: Information regarding those dismissed within the past financial year from a job held for more than five years is not available. The most recent available estimates relating to dismissals are given in the following table.

Labour Force Survey Summer (June to August) 1992
Great Britain (not seasonally adjusted).
Persons not currently in employment who were dismissed from their last job

Age	Number
30-39	37,000
40-49	26,000

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what percentage of skilled workers aged (a) 30 to 40 years, (b) 40 to 50 years and (c) 50 to 60 years were made redundant in the last financial year.

Mr. McLoughlin: Information relating to skilled workers by age group is not available. Total numbers made redundant by age groups in Great Britain are available from the quarterly "Labour Force Survey" which has been undertaken quarterly from spring 1992. The latest information available is from the spring and summer 1992 surveys and is as follows:

Persons made redundant

Age	Spring 1992	Summer 1992
31-40	64,974	48,121
41-50	65,194	57,726
51-60	49,816	48,710

Labour Statistics

Mr. Hain: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what are the latest figures for the actual and percentage rates of economically inactive adult males for each district in England and Wales; and what was the percentage change in each case since 1979.

Mr. McLoughlin: The information requested is only available from the 1981 and 1991 censuses of population which can be obtained from the NOMIS database in the Library. Comparisons between the 1981 and 1991 censuses of population are not exact because of definitional and boundary changes.

Jobcentre, Liverpool

Mr. Kilfoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many job inquiries are allowed per applicant at the Liverpool, Williamson square, jobcentre; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. McLoughlin: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service Agency under its chief executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from M. E. G. Fogden to Mr. Peter Kilfoyle, dated 17 March 1993.

As the Employment Service is an Executive Agency, the Secretary of State has asked me to write to you direct to respond to your Parliamentary Question to her about how many job enquiries are allowed per applicant at Liverpool, Williamson Square, Jobcentre. This is something which falls within the responsibilities she has delegated to me as Chief Executive of the Agency.

Between 11.30 am and 2.30 pm we arrange up to two job interviews for each jobseeker at Williamson Square Jobcentre. Outside those hours, we will arrange three or even more job interviews if the jobseeker wants us to.

These different approaches reflect the variations in the number of callers over the course of the day at Williamson Square. The office is open Monday to Thursday 9.00 am to 5.00 pm and Friday 10.00 am to 5.00 pm but it gets an unusually high concentration of callers between 11.30 am and 2.30 pm. We aim to give a good service to everyone we see and we also aim to meet the commitment under our Job Seekers Charter that no one should have to wait for more than 10 minutes before they are seen. We achieve that at Williamson Square Jobcentre by using the approach I have described.

As decided by the Administration Committee of the House of Commons, Chief Executive replies to written Parliamentary Questions will now be published in the Official Report. I will also place a copy of this letter in the Library of the House.

Public Bodies

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many appointments to the public bodies listed in "Public Bodies" for her Department were made from names supplied by the public appointments unit; and if she will list them.

Mr. McLoughlin: Since January 1991, the following 17 people have been appointed to public bodies listed in "Public Bodies" for the Employment Department from names supplied by the public appointments unit.

The 17 appointments are:

Mrs. Margaret Exley—Employer Member, Employment Appeal Tribunal (EAT)

Departmental Costs

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is the percentage planned increase in the running costs of her Department between 1992-93 and 1995-96; and what efficiency gains these plans assume.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The percentage planned increase in the Department's running costs is shown in the following table:

Year(s)	Percentage increase
1992-93—1993-94	7·4
1993-94—1994-95	−0·5
1994-95—1995-96	0·8

The percentage planned increase over the period 1992-93—1995-96 is 7·7 per cent. The minimum efficiency savings for the Department is at least 1·5 per cent. for each financial year.

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if she will set out the information in table 1 of her Department's expenditure plans, Cm. 2205, in real terms, and make a statement on the changes made since the previous year's plans.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The following table shows table 1 of the Department's expenditure plans, CM. 2205, in real terms. Changes made to the previous year's plans include the machinery of Government changes made last April; the introduction of departmental responsibility for accruing superannuation liability payments formerly carried out on an allied service basis by the Paymaster General's Office—figures have been adjusted for all years to show comparative provision; increased receipts from the Department of Social Security to offset costs of higher numbers of unemployed people; the transfer to the Welsh Office of responsibility for delivering main training and enterprise programmes in Wales, for years 1992-93 onwards; and the 1992 public expenditure survey settlement for 1993-94 onwards as announced in the autumn statement.

Table prepared using Autumn Statement deflators published 12 November 1992.

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what price deflation her Department uses in planning public expenditure.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: When planning public expenditure the Department does so on a cash basis.

Performance Indicators

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment to what extent the performance indicator and output measures in use in her Department take account of quality of output and services as distinct from quantity.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The Department has a wide range of performance indicators and output measures to support the delivery of its programmes. These include quantitative measures; for example, numbers of people helped; and qualitative measures, for example, national vocational qualifications gained and delivery and speed of benefit payments.

Additionally, under the citizens charter, the Department has developed and published standards which the public can expect of its services. Performance data are already provided on many of the standards and targets set in the ED group's various charter documents.

The Department has also developed customer surveys to measure customer satisfaction levels the results of which are used wherever practicable to inform improvements to the way in which services are delivered.

High Technology Training

Ms Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what assessment she has made of the effect on new university graduates of the new six months' unemployment qualification for courses under the training for work scheme, with reference to the starting dates of high technology training courses.

Mr. McLoughlin: The new training for work arrangements are focused on longer-term unemployed people where the need for help is known to be greatest. Graduates who wish to take up further training before they have been unemployed for six months may wish to apply for a career development loan.

Overhead Railway Cables

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many deaths and serious injuries have resulted from electrical arcing from overhead railway cables in the United Kingdom in the last five years.

Mr. Freeman: I have been asked to reply.

Mr. Hanley: Courses in English as a foreign language are currently being offered in Belfast, Omagh, Ballymena, Coleraine, Lisburn, Down, Newcastle, Castlereagh, North Down and Ards, Lurgan and Armagh colleges of further education.

Further Education

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the teacher-pupil ratio at further education colleges in Northern Ireland for (a) all courses and (b) courses in English as a foreign language.

Mr. Hanley: The student:staff ratio for further education colleges in Northern Ireland was 13.2:1 in the academic year 1991-92. This figure is provisional, pending audit. Information about the student:staff ratio for courses in English as a foreign language is not available.

Ethnic Minorities

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the ethnic minority population in Northern Ireland; how many of these are children of school age; and how many of these are children of pre-school age.

Mr. Hanley: There is no detailed information available on the ethnic population of Northern Ireland, though some studies have suggested a total in the region of 10,000. Information on the number of children is not available.

Department of Finance and Personnel

Mr. Dykes: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the work of the Department of Finance and Personnel since 1979.

Mr. Mates: The Department of Finance and Personnel came into being in 1982 on the merger of functions of the former Departments of the Civil Service and Finance. The main aims of DFP are to deploy and manage the financial resources allocated to Northern Ireland; to give guidance and advice on personnel policy and practice within the Northern Ireland civil service; and to carry out the Government's public sector reform initiatives, in particular the citizens charter.

DFP is responsible for the presentation of Northern Ireland estimates to Parliament and monitoring public expenditure throughout the year. Public expenditure under the control of the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland has increased from £2,489 million in 1979-80 to £7,092 million in 1992-93, an increase in real terms of 18 per cent.

The Department is also responsible for the regional rate. DFP co-ordinates EC structural fund assistance to Northern Ireland. The region continues to be recognised as having objective 1 status within the European Community and DFP is currently preparing a submission for the use of structural funds for the period 1994-99.

In relation to Northern Ireland civil service personnel policy and practice, DFP continues to promote equality of opportunity in accordance with fair employment legislation and the 1984 Northern Ireland civil service equal opportunities policy statement. Goals for increasing the representation of Roman Catholics—25 per cent. by 1996—and women—10 per cent. by 1998—at grades 5 and above have recently been announced.

Following the Chancellor's statement in July 1991, new long-term pay agreements have been put in place for all non-industrial staff with increasing emphasis on performance pay. DFP has also prepared draft legislation corresponding to the Civil Service (Management Functions) Act 1992 which will allow greater delegation of personnel functions to NI Departments and agencies.

In 1991, a unit was set up in DFP to co-ordinate implementation of the citizens charter in NI. Apart from the main NI charter, eight other charters have been published and DFP has a continuing role to monitor performace against published standards.

DFP co-ordinates and takes forward the Government's market-testing programme and its plans for the establishment of executive agencies in Northern Ireland. In 1991, DFP market tested its mainframe computer bureau service and awarded a contract to a private sector facilities management company to which 110 civil servants transferred. Six executive agencies have already been created with a further three to be launched in April 1993. These account for some 9,000—30 per cent. of total—NI civil servants. DFP's first agency—the Valuation and Lands Agency—is due to be launched this year.

The Government Purchasing Service, formerly the Central Unit on Purchasing (NI), operates within DFP and performs a purchasing advisory and monitoring function. In 1991-92 the unit assisted Departments to achieve new value for money savings of £8·2 million on a total spend of £270 million. DFP maintains an up-to-date valuation list for Northern Ireland and provides a comprehensive property advice and agency service to the public sector.

Water

Mr. William O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what has been the full cost of the asset management plan for the water service in Northern Ireland; what has been the cost of the appointment of private consultants; and when the plan is expected to be completed.

Mr. Atkins: The full cost of the Water Executive's asset management plan to date has been £2·27 million. Of this, some £0·74 million has been paid to the AMP consultants. It is expected that the present phase of the asset management plan will be completed by March 1994.

Water Privatisation

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what level of cost benefit analysis has taken place in relation to the proposed privatisation of the water service; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Atkins: None. The Government believe, however, that privatisation of water and sewerage services in Northern Ireland will provide substantial benefits to consumers and taxpayers in the form of increased efficiencies and improved standards. This will be achieved through the introduction of commercial discipline and private sector skills.

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the current timescale for the privatisation of the water service in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Atkins: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the statement made by my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State on 15 July 1992, Official Report, col. 754.

HEALTH

Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act

Mr. Jopling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will list the orders arising from the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 1990 which have been laid, with dates, together with details of those orders which remain to be laid, with reasons for their delay in each case.

Mr. Sackville: The following orders have arisen from the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 1990 as amended by the Human Fertilisation and Embryology (Disclosure of Information) Act 1992:

The Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 1990 (Commencement No. 1) Order 1990. Made 2 November 1990.

The Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 1990 (Commencement No. 2 and Transitional Provision) Order 1991. Made 4 March 1991.

The Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 1990 (Commencement No. 3 and Transitional Provision) Order 1991. Made 16 June 1991.

The Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 1990 (Commencement No. 4 and Transitional Provision) Order 1991. Made 31 July 1991.

The Human Fertilisation and Embryology (Special Exemptions) Regulations 1991, in exercise of the powers conferred by Section 43(1) of the Act. Laid—9 July 1991; Came into force—1 August 1991.

The Human Fertilisation and Embryology (Statutory Storage Period) Regulations 1991, in exercise of the powers conferred by Section 14(5) of the Act. Laid—11 July 1991; Came into force—1 August 1991.

The Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority (Licence Committee and Appeals) Regulations 1991, in exercise of the powers conferred by Sections 9(5) and 10 of the Act. Laid—21 July 1991; Came into force—29 August 1991.

Regulations under section 30 of the Act, relating to the granting of parental orders in surrogacy cases, will be laid as soon as possible. For a report on progress with these regulations I refer my hon. Friend to my reply to his question regarding this matter. There are no plans at this time to introduce regulations under section 31(4)(a) of the Act, which concerns information relating to gamete donors.

In addition, the 1990 Act provides for regulations to be made under sections 3(3)(c) and 4(2) of the Act, allowing for the prohibition of techniques; schedule 2, sections 1(1)(g) and 3(2), allowing for the licensing of techniques not previously covered by the Act; and also under section 1([illegible]G) of the Human Fertilisation and Embryology (Disclosure of Information) Act 1992, allowing for additional exceptions to the restrictions on the disclosure of information. These powers are available for use if changed circumstances make this desirable.

We have today laid before the House the Access to Health Records (Control of Access) Regulations 1993 which preclude access under the Access to Health Records Act 1990 to any part of a health record which would identify a person born as a result of "treatment services" under the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 1990.

Mr. Jopling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment she has made of the reasons for the delays in laying the parental orders arising from section 30 of the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 1990; and whether she will make it her policy that they are laid before Easter.

Mr. Sackville: The preparation of the regulations and rules of court required under section 30 of the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act has proved to be a complex undertaking. Draft regulations should be ready for public consultation next month. Subject to the outcome of this consultation, the Government propose to lay regulations as soon as possible.

Cancer (Nuclear Industry)

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what monitoring Her Majesty's Government are undertaking or funding as a follow-up to the findings of the Imperial Cancer Research Fund's cancer epidemiology unit's survey of the impact of parents' job histories in the nuclear industry on the health of children.

Mr. Sackville: The findings of the Imperial Cancer Research Fund study have been referred to the Committee on Medical Aspects of Radiation in the Environment (COMARE) for advice, which will be published when available. A major study investigating the occurrence of all cancers and the incidence of other illnesses and conditions that could have a genetic cause among children of workers in the nuclear industry is already under way. It is being jointly funded by the Health and Safety Executive and the Department of Health.

Health Authority Personnel

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will make it her policy to restrict gifts which staff, directors and chairmen of health authorities and trusts are permitted to accept to diaries and calendars.

Dr. Mawhinney: The standards of business conduct expected from all national health service staff, including advice on the acceptance of gifts and hospitality, are set out in "Health Service Guidelines", HSG(93)5, a copy of which is available in the Library.

Fund Holders

Mrs. Helen Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what requirement there is for general practitioner fund holders to open their annual accounts to the public.

Dr. Mawhinney: General practitioner fund holder audited annual accounts are public documents.

Mrs. Helen Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to her answer of 1 March, Official Report, column 32, if she will now ensure that information is held centrally of general practitioner fund holders in each region which have exhausted their budgets.

Dr. Mawhinney: Regional health authorities have responsibility for managing the scheme and monitoring all fund holder budgets regularly. I have no plans to duplicate this responsibility centrally.

Drugs (Limited List)

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many new products have been developed in the therapeutic categories already on the limited list.

Dr. Mawhinney: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave the hon. Member for Moray (Mrs. Ewing) on 9 February at column 617.

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will place in the Library a list of the names of each product in each of the 10 therapeutic categories to be included in the selected list.

Dr. Mawhinney: Decisions on which products are to be added to schedule 10 of the National Health Service (General Medical Services) Regulations 1992, which are no longer prescribable under the NHS, will be based on the recommendations of the Advisory Committee on NHS Drugs. I understand that the committee has not yet decided which products it will be formally considering in each of the ten new therapeutic categories.

Redbridge and Waltham Forest DHAs

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the proposed timetable for the merger of the Redbridge and Waltham Forest district health authorities; and if she will outline the statutory procedure which such a merger is required to follow.

Mr. Sackville: The merger of the Redbridge and Waltham Forest district health authorities is included in the National Health Service (District Health Authorities) Order 1993 and the National Health Service (Determination of Districts) Order 1993 which were laid before the House on 11 March. Both orders are effective from 1 April 1993. No other statutory procedures are needed to effect the merger.

Formal consultation took place from 1 September to 30 November 1992 on the proposal to merge the authorities. On 3 March, I announced our decision to merge the two authorities and to appoint Ms Delva Patman as chairman of the new Redbridge and Waltham Forest district health authority.

Perioperative Deaths

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the rate of perioperative deaths in respect of operations carried out by (a) junior doctors and (b) consultants in England.

Dr. Mawhinney: This information is not available centrally. In 1990 there were an estimated 3,112,396 episodes of in-patient care involving surgical procedures. Of these, an estimated 23,816 deaths occurred in hospital within 30 days of an operation.

Registration of Death

Mrs. Helen Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health on what basis a medical practitioner may set the level of his charge for registering a person as dead, and giving the cause of death; and what is the maximum charge which may be levied.

Dr. Mawhinney: Medical practitioners are required by the Birth and Deaths Registration Act 1953 to supply a certificate free of charge to the registrar, giving notification of a person's death.

Drug Costs

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much of the increase in the drugs bill for 1992-93 relative to 1991-92 is due to (a) increased costs charged by the drugs companies, (b) increases in the numbers of prescriptions, (c) general practitioners prescribing different and more expensive drugs, (d) the cost of diphasics and triphasic drugs in fees paid to pharmacists or (e) drugs being used to replace surgery.

Dr. Mawhinney: Expenditure on drugs by the family health services in England is expected to increase by about 14 per cent. in cash terms in 1992-93. Whilst prescription numbers are likely to increase by more than 4 per cent. in 1992-93, no information is yet available on the other factors which contribute to the rise in the drugs bill.

The cost of pharmacists' dispensing fees does not form part of the drugs bill. Information on drugs being used to replace surgery is not available centrally.

Parental Leave Allowances

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are maternity and paternity leave allowances for NHS staff; and what are the maternity and paternity leave allowances for NHS staff who adopt children.

Dr. Mawhinney: Staff who satisfy certain qualifying criteria are entitled to a maximum of 52 weeks maternity leave. Staff may also be eligible for paternity and adoption leave in accordance with arrangements determined locally.

GP Patient Registration

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what guidelines are in force for the registration by general practitioners of people who have no fixed address;

(2) what plans she has to issue guidelines requiring general practitioners to take on any patient requesting registration and living in their practice area when the list is closed and notified as such to the family health service authority.

Dr. Mawhinney: We have no plans to issue such guidelines.

All patients, including people who have no fixed address, have the right to be registered with a general practitioner. This is reaffirmed in the patients charter.

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate she has of the total number of people by region who have not registered with a general practitioner.

Dr. Mawhinney: This information is not available centrally.

Health Care Spending

Mr. Clapham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what is the average amount spent on health care per person in each European Community country;

(2) what is the average amount spent on health care per person in each of the G7 countries.

Mr. Sackville: Total expenditure on the national health service in the United Kingdom is planned to be £37·6 billion in 1993-94, equivalent to £649 per head of population.

Figures for other EC and G7 countries are not available on a comparable basis.

Named Nurses

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what meaning is attached to the concept of the named nurse in the patients charter; and if it is permissible for hospitals to meet this charter standard by designating a ward sister as the named nurse.

Mr. Sackville: The named nurse standard is intended to ensure the continuity of and individual responsibility for patient care. It encourages partnership between the qualified nurse, or midwife or health visitor, and the patient so that care plans can be developed on a joint basis.

There are a variety of nursing methods in operation which can be adapted for use in applying the named nurse standard. In the small number of places where an appropriate scheme is not yet in use, ward sisters are allowed to operate as named nurses as an interim measure. The national health service management executive expects to publish a good practice guide to named nursing in June.

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many nurses who achieved their basic qualification before 30 September in each year since 1987 were (a) in post in the NHS, (b) undertaking further training in the NHS and (c) not employed in the NHS one year after qualification.

Mr. Sackville: This information is not available centrally.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

GATT

11. Mrs. Browning: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will take steps to bring about a swift agreement to the GATT arrangements.

Mr. Heseltine: I am in regular contact with progress on the GATT Uruguay round. I assure my hon. Friend that this Government will continue to do everything possible to bring the round to a successful conclusion.

24. Mr. Cryer: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on the current negotiations on the general agreement on tariffs and trade and the incorporation of the terms of the multi-fibre arrangement.

Mr. Needham: During his visit to Washington, the Prime Minister had very positive discussions with President Clinton on the Uruguay round. The President confirmed his support for a successful conclusion to the Uruguay round and that he will be seeking a renewal of the fast-track authority. This is to be welcomed and we hope that negotiations will resume in Geneva. A successful conclusion to the round would include an agreement on international trade in textiles and clothing which would result in a 10-year phase-out of quantitative restrictions maintained under the multi-fibre arrangement.

Sir Michael Neubert: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when he next expects to meet his United States counterpart to discuss issues of world trade and the conclusions of the GATT round.

Mr. Needham: My right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade expects to meet Mr. Kantor, the United States trade representative, when he visits London at the end of this month.

North America

15. Mr. Elletson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how much of British overseas trade is with North America.

Mr. Needham: Around 13 per cent. of United Kingdom visible exports go to north America. A similar proportion of our imports come from north America. My Department has recently launched a campaign aimed at increasing the United Kingdom's share of imports by north American markets.

Industrial Competitiveness Division

21. Mr. Page: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what steps he is taking to spread the information gathered by the industrial competitiveness division through the sectors of industry.

Mr. Heseltine: The industrial competitiveness division advises me on ways in which Government policies generally can promote the competitiveness of British industry.

The DTI's regional offices, sector divisions, and—once they are established—the one-stop shops, have a vital role in communicating these policies to industry, and in listening to industry's views.

Lorry and Van Production

22. Mr. Cann: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on the prospects for lorry and van production in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Sainsbury: Future prospects are excellent as a result of the Government's long-term commitment to helping United Kingdom manfucturing companies succeed in world markets by creating the domestic climate within which the commercial vehicle and other industries can thrive.

European Structural Fund

23. Mrs. Jane Kennedy: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what steps he is taking to introduce transparency of accounting measures in relation to receipts from the European structural fund.

Mr. Sainsbury: From 1 April the Government will be implementing new arrangements to make available automatically public expenditure cover to account in full for forecast receipts from the European regional development fund.

Travel Companies (Liabilities)

25. Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what steps he is taking to ensure that all travel companies have sufficient bonds to cover their liabilities to package holidaymakers.

Mr. Leigh: The Package Travel Regulations 1992 require all operators of packages to be able to provide sufficient evidence of security for the protection of money paid over in the event of insolvency. The enforcement of the regulations is the responsibility of local authority trading standards departments.

One-stop Shops

26. Mr. Bates: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what progress has been made in the proposal to establish one-stop shops for the co-ordination of business support and enterprise.

Mr. Heseltine: A total of 57 partnerships have submitted bids for funding pilot one-stop shops. A shortlist of 20 have been interviewed by an assessment panel of business men and representatives of TECs, chambers of commerce and other small firms organisations. I intend to announce the winning bids as soon as possible.

Manufacturing Industry

27. Mr. Eastham: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when he last met representatives of the Engineering Employers Federation to discuss DTI assistance for manufacturing industry.

Mr. Sainsbury: My right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade met representatives of the Engineering Employers Federation on 16 February to discuss the federation's proposals for industrial strategy, which include recommendations to improve the competitive performance of British firms.

Aerospace Industries

28. Mr. David Evans: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what discussions he has had with his American counterpart about the aerospace industries.

Mr. Sainsbury: My right hon. Friend has had no direct discussions on this subject with his counterparts in the new United States Administration. However, contacts have continued at official level and through the European Commission on matters of mutual interest.

Miners (Wages)

29. Mr. William O'Brien: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how much British Coal has paid in wages to miners who have attended collieries and been refused work since 13 October 1992; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: This is a matter for British Coal.

Manufactured Goods

30. Dr. Wright: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on Britain's trade in manufactured goods.

Mr. Needham: The volume of United Kingdom exports of manufactures in 1992 was 69 per cent. higher than a decade earlier. Detailed statistics on United Kingdom trade in manufactures are regularly published in the "Monthly Review of External Trade Statistics", which is available in the Library of the House.

Industrial Trends (Europe)

31. Mr. Riddick: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when he last attended a Council of Ministers meeting to discuss industrial trends within Europe.

Mr. Heseltine: I chaired the meeting of the Council of Industry Ministers during the UK Presidency of the EC on 24 November 1992. The meeting discussed a wide range of industrial issues, including Commission ideas on restructuring the Community steel industry and Community policy on small and medium-sized enterprises.

Whale Products

32. Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what whale products have been imported into the United Kingdom during the past 12 months.

Mr. Needham: Information on whale imports is not available. The United Kingdom trade classification does not separately indentify whale products from products derived from other mammals.

Railway Rolling Stock

33. Mr. Bayley: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what steps his Department is taking to promote the export of British-built railway rolling stock.

Mr. Needham: The full range of export services provided by my Department is available to British rolling stock manufacturers. For example, we have supported British bids for the Canton metro by providing substantial financial assistance with bidding costs, have an official working full time on the project and are supporting a very attractive financing offer.

Coal Industry

34. Mr. Mullin: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when he expects to make a statement on the future of the coal industry.

Mr. Heseltine: I refer the hon. Gentleman to my earlier answer to the hon. Gentleman for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron).

36. Mr. Canavan: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what recent discussions he has had with British Coal about the impact of the Government's energy policy review on the coal industry.

Mr. Heseltine: Since establishing the coal review, I have held a number of discussions with British Coal about the issues under consideration.

Torture and Execution Equipment

35. Mr. Bellingham: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when he next plans to meet representatives of Amnesty International to discuss the export of equipment used for torture and execution.

Mr. Needham: I have no plans to meet Amnesty International. When he was Minister for Trade, my right hon. Friend the current Minister for Industry gave the organisation a very full reply to its report on this matter.

Exporters

37. Mr. Jacques Arnold: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on support given to British exporters.

Mr. Needham: The Government are wholly committed to helping more United Kingdom firms to compete effectively in international markets. This is demonstrated by the broad package of advice, information and assistance available to exporters from the Government.

European Steel Industry

Mr. Boyce: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on the restructuring of the European steel industry.

Mr. Sainsbury: EC Ministers have agreed a package of measures to assist restructuring based on a voluntary programme of capacity reductions.

Since the United Kingdom industry has already undergone substantial restructuring and rationalisation, I would expect future capacity reductions predominantly in other EC countries.

Relocation

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what information he has on the number of companies which have relocated from Great Britain to the Republic of Ireland in the last three years.

Mr. Sainsbury: Information about the number of companies which have relocated from Great Britain to the Republic of Ireland in the last three years is not readily available.

Import Substitution

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on his strategy for encouraging import substitution.

Mr. Sainsbury: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer I gave him on 5 March, Official Report, column 350.

Nuclear Industry

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what consideration in respect of his competition responsibilities he has given to BNFL's position in the market for Magnox nuclear fuel services in relation to its ability to secure contracts for reprocessing Nuclear Electric's AGR spent fuel.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: I have not specifically considered this. Under competition legislation, the Director General of Fair Trading is responsible for investigating possible monopoly situations and anti-competitive practices.

Working Practices

Mr. Butterfill: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what assessment he has made of the impact of United Kingdom working practices on the competitiveness of British industry.

Mr. Sainsbury: Many factors affect the competitiveness of British industry, including working practices. In order to be competitive, industry needs a labour market which is flexible. One of the key aims of this Government is therefore to encourage greater flexibility in the labour market, for example by lifting the burdens on employers who wish to take on labour and encouraging the abolition of restrictive labour practices. Reforms of industrial relations and trade union law have helped to correct previous imbalances of power between unions and employers and to introduce more democratic procedures into unions. Greater flexibility has been introduced into pay bargaining arrangements. The unemployed are being helped to compete effectively in the labour market and to provide industry with the skills it needs. My Department will continue to work closely with the Department of Employment to ensure that British industry continues to benefit from these reforms.

European Coal and Steel Community Reserves

Mr. Morgan: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what discussions he has had with the member of the European Commission responsible for regional affairs concerning the utilisation of European Coal and Steel Community reserves when the ECSC is wound up; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Sainsbury: None, but the future of ECSC financing activities, including use of the reserves, was among subjects discussed at the November 1992 Industry Council attended by Vice President Bangemann and chaired by my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade at which I represented the United Kingdom.

Electronic Equipment Recycling

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what recent meetings he has had with the Industry Council for Electronic Equipment Recycling; and what recent representations he has received from it.

Mr. Eggar: A director of my Department's environment division spoke at the launch of ICER in October last year, and has since corresponded with the organisation's chairman. Before that, officials in the division were closely involved in the CEST study which preceded the setting up of ICER, and also commissioned from the Department's Warren Spring laboratory a major study of electronic scrap recycling.

Iraq and Iran (Export Controls)

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what recent communication he or officials of his Department have had with the United States department of commerce's bureau of export administration in regard to implementation of export controls to (a) Iraq and (b) Iran.

Mr. Needham: None so far this year relating specifically to these destinations.

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what meetings Ministers or officials of his Department have had with the subgroup of nuclear export co-ordination of the United States bureau of oceans and international environmental and scientific affairs in regard to export control policy for (a) Iraq and (b) Iran.

Mr. Needham: None.

Uranium

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will request the United Kingdom Permanent Representative to the International Atomic Energy Agency in Vienna to seek to obtain documentation produced by the agency on the levels of safety applied to the Rössing uranium mine in Namibia in the production of uranium exported to the United Kingdom.

Mr. Eggar: No. The final report of the expert mission to the Rössing uranium mine is in confidence between the International Atomic Energy Agency and the Government of Namibia.

Departmental Spending

Dr. Wright: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what percentage share of total departmental spending was accounted for by non-departmental public bodies in each year since 1979.

Mr. Eggar: The percentage share of total departmental expenditure accounted for by grants to executive non-departmental public bodies by the DTI and the Department of Energy was as follows:

	Per cent.
1982-83	9·6
1983-84	9·5
1984-85	5·8
1985-86	11·4
1986-87	2·2
1987-88	4·6
1988-89	3·9
1989-90	1·1
1990-91	1·6
1991-92	1·2

Figures for earlier years are not available.

Silk Textiles

Mr. Evennett: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what progress has been made in agreeing harmonised European Community rules on imports of silk textiles from state trading countries under autonomous arrangements; what interim measures he has taken in the meantime; and what representations he has received about the need for rapid agreement on a definitive solution.

Mr. Needham: The European Community has not yet managed to agree harmonised rules for imports of silk textiles from state-trading countries for 1993 and onwards. In the interim, and following representations from a number of trade associations and commercial interests, the United Kingdom has provisionally rolled over into 1993 the national arrangements that were in force in 1992 but has applied them on a quarterly basis.

Wave Energy

Mr. Spellar: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when he expects to publish the final report of the review of wave energy.

Mr. Eggar: The report "A Review of Wave Energy" —ETSU-R-72, was published on 17 December 1992 and copies placed in the Library of the House.

Car Dealership Franchises

Mr. Cousins: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what action he has taken to implement the recommendations of the Monopolies and Mergers Commission on ending trade restraints built into car dealership franchises.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: In May 1992, my right hon. Friend invited the Director General of Fair Trading to negotiate with the car suppliers with a view to obtaining undertakings to implement the recommendations contained in the Monopolies and Mergers Commission's report on the supply of new motor cars in the United Kingdom. The Director General has concluded that satisfactory undertaking on all of the Commission's recommendations could not be obtained from all the suppliers. My right hon. Friend is currently considering options for taking further action on this report.

Business Names Act

Mr. Bayley: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, pursuant to his answer of 26 February, Official Report, column 776, with which (a) educational bodies and (b) other bodies he corresponded before approving the use of the name Somerset University under the Business Names Act 1985.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: There was no correspondence between the Secretary of State and any educational or other bodies before the name was approved. The name was approved on the basis that there was evidence that it had been in use prior to 1 January 1983 when the regulations controlling the use of the word university came into force. Consequently there was no requirement to consult any other bodies before approving the name.

Manufacturing Exports

Mr. Milburn: To ask the President of the Board of Trade which five manufacturing industries have been the largest exporters in each United Kingdom region in each year since 1985.

Mr. Needham: Analysis of export statistics by United Kingdom region are not available.

Assisted Areas

Mr. Hain: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will take account of the level of economically inactive adult males when determining assisted area status; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Sainsbury: The consultation paper for the assisted areas map review jointly issued by the Welsh and Scottish Offices and my Department in June last year set out the criteria for designation. This stated that statistical measures of unemployment would be the major components in the review. A number of other factors to be taken into account was also listed in the paper. These included activity rates.

Coal Imports

Mr. Hardy: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is his estimate of the price paid during the last quarter of 1992 for steam coal imported into the United Kingdom from (a) Colombia, (b) Poland, (c) Germany, (d) the CIS, (e) South Africa and (f) the United States of America; and what was the cost of similar coal produced by British Coal deep mines.

Mr. Eggar: The average price paid for steam coal imported into the United Kingdom during the last quarter of 1992 was as follows.

Country of origin	Cost per tonne[1] £
Colombia	31
Poland	54
Germany	46
Former USSR	28
South Africa	32
United States of America	36

Source: HM Customs and Excise.
[1] Includes the cost of insurance and freight.

Comparable information for steam coal produced in the United Kingdom is not held centrally.

EC Funds

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on his discussions with Commissioner Millan on additionality and bringing matching European funds to the United Kingdom.

Mr. Sainsbury: As agreed with the Commission the treatment of receipts from the European regional development fund in the United Kingdom's public expenditure system will be made more transparent. From 1 April public expenditure cover will be made available automatically and in full for all forecast receipts.

Commissioner Millan wrote on 8 February seeking assurance that full arrangements will be in place to implement the agreement. He has been so assured.

China

Mr. Adley: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what steps he is taking to improve trade with China.

Mr. Needham: A much stronger United Kingdom commercial presence in China is a high priority for my Department. I have visited China three times since last July. There is growing United Kingdom business interest in the massive opportunities in that market, for profitable infrastructure, machinery, consumer goods and services business. We are carrying out a programme of activities with British business to help to improve the United Kingdom's performance, targetting in particular major projects, small and medium-sized United Kingdom exporters and the services sector, including retailing and distribution.

Import Substitution

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make it his policy, in association with representatives of British manufacturing industry, to seek to establish a task force on import substitution in order to identify areas in which such substitution is feasible.

Mr. Sainsbury [holding answer 9 March 1993]: Government activities which seek to discriminate in favour of United Kingdom producers against exporters from other Community member states are precluded by the treaty of Rome. Nevertheless, my Department is continually working to assist United Kingdom firms to exploit market opportunities at home and abroad. The recent fall in the value of the pound against the currency of our major competitors provides plenty of scope for United Kingdom businesses to gain a larger share of the domestic market.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement providing details of those initiatives which have been taken by his Department in order to identify areas in which import substitution is a feasible option; if he will list the categories of goods which have so far been identified by those initiatives; and what action he has taken to draw each area of potential import substitution to the attention of British manufacturers.

Mr. Sainsbury [holding answer 9 March 1993]: My Department is continually working to assist United Kingdom firms to identify market opportunities both at home and abroad. In particular, the new DTI sector divisions work closely with their industries to help business take advantage of the opportunities created by the recent fall in the value of sterling. Her Majesty's Customs and Excise provides the names and addresses of United Kingdom importers for each classification of imported goods through appointed marketing agents.

EC Maritime Policy

Mr. Hutton: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what discussions he has had with his European counterparts on the development of a new maritime policy for the Community; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Norris: I have been asked to reply.

The report of the maritime forum, which dealt with all aspects of maritime policy, was presented to a meeting of Industry Ministers chaired by my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade on 24 November last year.

Malaysia

Mr. Elletson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement about the soft loan which the United Kingdom is making to Malaysia to help pay for the international airport near Kuala Lumpur.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: I have been asked to reply.

We have told the Malaysian Government that we are setting aside a sum of up to £42 million of grant finance from the aid and trade provision budget to be used in association with export credits for contracts which may be awarded to British companies of up to £120 million worth of United Kingdom goods and services for the planned new international airport outside Kuala Lumpur. A firm financial commitment to support the project is subject to completion of the Overseas Development Administration's and the Export Credits Guarantee Department's usual appraisal procedures and to consulting OECD partners in accordance with the recent international agreement in the use of tied aid credits.

Travel Documents

Mr. Olner: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will abolish family passports and introduce the requirement that all children be issued with their own travel documents.

Mr. Charles Wardle: Family passports, which included details of the holder and spouse, were discontinued in 1988, though those issued previously remain valid until their normal date of expiry. Children under the age of 16 can still be included in the passport of a parent or other appropriate adult or can be issued with their own passport.

If the facility to have children included in a parental passport were abolished, this could lead to inconvenience and additional expense.

Gambling

Mr. Riddick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will outline the statutory or licensing restrictions which apply to gambling in pubs or other licensed premises; and what consideration is being given to amending them.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Section 6 of the Gaming Act 1968 permits, in public houses and hotels licensed for the sale of liquor, the playing of dominoes, cribbage and any other form of equal chance game authorised by the appropriate liquor licensing authorities. To prevent abuse, the justices are empowered as a safeguard to impose conditions that forbid play for high stakes or stop the gaming from becoming a primary inducement to custom; and people under 18 are debarred from play.

Child Abduction

Mr. Olner: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proposals he has to improve training for immigration officers in the area of child abduction.

Mr. Charles Wardle: There are no plans to alter the training that immigration officers already receive in this area.

Forensic Scientists

Mr. Spellar: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will set up a national register of qualified forensic scientists.

Mr. Jack: We will look at this area carefully in the light of the conclusions of the Royal Commission on criminal justice. We shall also take account of the report on forensic science of the Select Committee on Science and Technology in another place published on 4 March.

Czech and Slovak Citizens

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many Czech and Slovak citizens have been refused entry to the United Kingdom at the channel ports in each of the last three years.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The information requested is given in the table.

Czechoslovak nationals refused leave to enter and removed from channel ports[1]

1991	414
1992	244

Passport Control

Mr. Olner: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will provide telefax facilities for notifying passport control of portstops with photographs.

Mr. Charles Wardle: My right hon. and learned Friend is aware of the recommendation for the provision of telefax facilities made in the recent report of the parliamentary working party on child abduction. The allocation of resources, though for the provision of such equipment is a matter for the chief officers of individual police forces to decide.

Dr. Kypros Loucas

Mr. Gerrard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Members for Makerfield (Mr. McCartney), for Sheffield Brightside (Mr. Blunkett), and for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley), on 17 December 1992, Official Report, column 450, if the investigations referred to have been completed; and if he will make a statement on the employment of Dr. Kypros Loucas at Wormwood scrubs prison.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health has drawn to the attention of the General Medical Council allegations made about Dr. Loucas's conduct before he took up his appointment at Wormwood Scrubs. Any further investigation will be a matter for the council. The Wormwood Scrubs appointment is under review. In the meantime, the suspension of Dr. Loucas's visits to the prison continues.

Urban Crime Fund

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what criteria have been used for selecting those areas to benefit from the urban crime fund.

Mr. Jack: Areas were chosen that had a diverse range of urban crime problems in which innovative crime prevention measures involving local communities could be trialed.

Correspondence

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will reply to the hon. Member for Liverpool, West Derby's letter of 11 February respecting Mr. Paul Malone, currently held at Frankland prison, Durham.

Mr. Jack: I replied to the hon. Member on 16 March.

Secure Training Units

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 10 March, Official Report, column 557, when he expects to be able to give the global sum (a) needed and (b) available in 1993-94 towards providing the secure training units for 11 to 15-year-olds announced on 2 March.

Mr. Jack [holding answer 17 March 1993]: I have nothing at present to add to the reply given to a similar question from the hon. Member on 16 March, at column 169.

Mr. Basharat Ali Khan

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when a decision is to be taken on the application from Basharat Ali Khan, Ref: K218950, to join his father in the United Kingdom, referred by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office to his Department on 6 December last; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Charles Wardle [holding answer 24 February 1993]: We hope to reach a decision shortly, and I will then write to the hon. Member.

Sir John Cope: I have been asked to reply.

I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the member for Clwyd, North-West (Mr. Richards) on 17 February, Official Report, column 209.

DEFENCE

Public Bodies

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many appointments to the public bodies listed in "Public Bodies" for his Department were made from names supplied by the public appointments unit; and if he will list them.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Seven of the appointments listed in "Public Bodies" are currently filled by individuals whose names were supplied by the public appointments unit: six to the Advisory Committee on Conscientious Objectors and one to the Review Board for Government Contracts.

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what share of total departmental spending was accounted for by non-departmental public bodies in each year since 1979.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Information is not held in the form requested and could be provided only at disproportionate cost. Information on the expenditure of NDPBs is however published in "Public Bodies": for 1991-92 the total MOD grant in aid to NDPBs was £38 million—some 0·16 per cent. of total defence expenditure.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: No request for such assistance has been received.

Trident

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many missiles will be deployed on each of Britain's Trident submarines.

Polaris Missiles

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence on what dates United Kingdom Polaris missiles have been test fired since May 1987.

Mr. Aitken: There have been no United Kingdom Polaris missile test firings since May 1987.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his Department's assessment of the ability of Russian intelligence-gathering satellites to identify the number of missiles that are carried on the United Kingdom's Polaris submarines.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Russia operates a number of satellites with an intelligence-gathering capability. We are confident however, that these cannot identify the number of missiles carried by Polaris submarines.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to increase the number of warheads deployed on the Polaris fleet during the remainder of its operational life.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: It has been the practice of successive Governments not to specify publicly the number of nuclear warheads deployed on our ballistic missile submarines.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many of the United Kingdom's Polaris Missiles have been test fired since the missiles were purchased from the United States of America.

Mr. Aitken: There have been 42 such test firings.

Nuclear Warheads

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what recent changes there have been to the United Kingdom's strategic nuclear targeting policy that have required changes in the numbers of warheads deployed.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Successive United Kingdom Governments have always declined to make public their nuclear targeting policy and plans.

Vulcan Aircraft

Mrs. Angela Knight: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has for the disposal of Vulcan aircraft XH 558.

Mr. Aitken: Following evaluation of the returned tenders for the sale of the Vulcan XH 558, the aircraft will be sold to C Walton Ltd. (Aircraft Division) at Bruntingthorpe aerodrome in Leicestershire. The new owners will preserve the aircraft as a museum exhibit.

[3] New rate of 3 per cent. introduced with effect from 1 January 1993.

Financial Services Act 1986

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer who has the responsibility for ensuring the enforcement of section 47 of the Financial Services Act 1986; what action each enforcement agency has taken in the last two years; and in what form the efficacy of enforcement is reported to Parliament.

Mr. Nelson: The Treasury is responsible for the overall framework of the Financial Services Act. Responsibility for instituting proceedings under section 47—misleading statements and practices—lies primarily with the President of the Board of Trade, the Director of Public Prosecutions and procurators fiscal in Scotland.

Post and Telecommunications

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the import, export and balance of payments in respect of postal and telecommunications services each year from 1982, expressing those payments both in cash and current price terms.

Mr. Nelson: The current price, or cash, value of postal and telecommunications services imports and exports for 1982 to 1991 can be found in table 3.6 of the 1992 edition of the Central Statistical Office's United Kingdom balance of payments publication—the Pink Book. Copies of the Pink Book are available in the Library of the House; alternatively the data can be found on the CSO database which can be accessed through the Library. For 1992, it is estimated that exports of postal and telecommunication services were £905 million and imports were £950 million. These series are not available at constant prices.

Political Parties (Funding)

Mr. Rogers: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether funds brought into the United Kingdom and used for day-to-day expenditure of political parties are subject to tax.

Mr. Dorrell: Remittances of income from overseas by a resident of the United Kingdom are subject to tax. In general, remittances of capital are not subject to tax.

Capital Gains Tax

Mr. Rogers: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what were the preliminary estimates made by the Board of Inland Revenue of the capital gains tax lost due to overseas ownership of United Kingdom assets in each of the years from 1988 to 1989.

Mr. Dorrell: In common with most other countries, the United Kingdom does not in general tax capital gains made by non-residents. Information on which to estimate the effect of a change in the law in this respect is not available.

Premium Bonds

Mrs. Helen Jackson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many individuals bought premium bonds each month for the last year; and how much was invested.

Mr. Nelson: National Savings can give information only about the number of purchases of premium bonds, not the number of individuals making them. Following is the information.

National Savings

Mrs. Helen Jackson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what changes have been made to the minimum payments, and on what dates, into (a) national savings accounts or (b) premium bonds, over the last three years.

Mr. Nelson: There have been three changes in minimum deposits and purchases for national savings bank accounts and premium bonds since 1990. From 1 February 1993, the minimum deposit required for a national savings ordinary account rose from £5 to £10 and that for the investment account from £5 to £20. On the same day, the minimum purchase of premium bonds for children rose from £10 to £100.

Mrs. Helen Jackson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many individuals invested in national savings accounts in each of the last three years.

Mr. Nelson: National Savings retains information about accounts, not individuals. The following is the number of ordinary and investment accounts with at least one deposit in a year.

	Ordinary accounts (thousands)	Investment accounts (thousands)
1990	1,781	2,110
1991	1,657	1,964

Taxation of Trusts

Mr. Burns: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement about the outcome of consultation on the document "Trusts: The Income Tax and Capital Gains Tax Treatment of UK Resident Trusts".

Mr. Dorrell: The Government have decided not to implement the central proposals in the consultative document on trusts published in March 1991.

The main option discussed in the consultative document was a proposal to integrate the income tax and capital gains tax treatment of trusts. As for individuals, trustees' income and chargeable gains would have been added together, with gains being treated as the top slice of income, and taxed at the basic rate up to a certain threshold and then at the higher rate.

The response to the document was varied, but a common concern was that treating capital gains as the top slice of income would adversely affect beneficiaries entitled to trust capital, because gains more than income would tend to be charged at the higher rate. In the light of the representations received, the Government have concluded that the proposal to integrate the income tax and capital gains tax treatment of trusts should not be pursued.

The Government are continuing to consider the responses on some of the more detailed issues discussed in the consultative document.

Economic and Finance Council

Mr. Burns: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the outcome of the latest meeting of the European Community's Economic and Finance Council.

Sir John Cope: The Economic and Finance Council of the European Community—ECOFIN—met in Brussels on 15 March. I represented the United Kingdom.

The Council approved the Commission's annual economic report for 1993. The report includes the Commission's forecast that the United Kingdom economy will grow faster in 1993 and 1994 than any other major EC country; and set the background for a discussion of national measures to promote economic recovery arising from the initiative launched by my right hon. Friends the Prime Minister and Chancellor at the Edinburgh European Council. The Council decided to reconsider national action to promote recovery and the related measures at Community level at its meeting in April, when it will also be possible to reflect the measures to reduce unemployment and promote sustainable growth announced in my right hon. Friend the Chancellor's Budget statement on 16 March. There was also some discussion of the wider international context to the Community's initiative to promote growth and I gave a report of relevant discussions at the meeting of G7 Finance Ministers in London on 27 February.

The Council examined and endorsed the programme for economic convergence submitted by Greece covering the period 1993-99. The Council welcomed achievements in structural reform and fiscal consolidation made by the Greek Government during 1992 and emphasised the importance of taking the action necessary to meet the ambitious targets it had set itself for the future.

Following a presentation by the president of the European Court of Auditors on the 1991 Community Budget, the Council agreed a recommendation to the European Parliament on granting the Commission a discharge on its implementation of the 1991 budget. I stressed the importance that the United Kingdom Government and Parliament attach to the work of the Court of Auditors and the need to ensure high standards of financial management in the Community's activities.

The Council had a brief discussion of a report from the presidency on progress in discussions between officials on the Commission's proposal for a carbon/energy tax. The German delegation also tabled a paper on its ideas for a harmonised system of withholding tax on interest from bank deposits. It was agreed that this paper would be discussed further at official level before being considered by the Council.

Council Tax

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many properties in England, Wales and Scotland have been listed as composite properties on the council tax valuation list in accordance with the valuation regulations in the categories of (a) shops and commercial premises, (b) public houses and other licensed premises, (c) dwellings used in agriculture and (d) others.

Mr. Nelson: [holding answer 8 March 1993]: The information for England and Wales is not currently held centrally, and in order to compile it disproportionate costs would be incurred. Different regulations exist in Scotland to reflect legal differences. The oversight of these is the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland.

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) how many domestic properties located on registered agricultural holdings in each of the valuation districts in England, Wales and Scotland have been listed as composite properties on the council tax valuation list in accordance with the valuation regulations;

(2) how many domestic properties located on registered agricultural holdings in England, Wales and Scotland have been listed as composite properties on the council tax valuation list in accordance with the valuation regulations; and what proportion this number represents of the total number of such holdings.

Mr. Nelson [holding answer 8 March 1993]: Neither the Valuation Office agency nor the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food keeps a register of agricultural holdings. In order to collect the information requested disproportionate costs would be incurred.

Bank Lending

Mr. Hain: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give figures for the percentage growth in bank lending to (a) manufacturing companies and (b) property companies for each year since 1979 and cumulatively over that period.

Mr. Nelson [holding answer 12 March 1993]: The information requested is set out in the table.

WALES

Youth Crime

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list (a) the outreach youth work programmes, (b) the youth activity units, (c) summer holiday schemes, (d) Alto projects and (e) training schemes within Wales which have stated the reduction of crime as one of their aims; and how much financial assistance has been granted by his Department for each project in the current financial year.

Sir Wyn Roberts: Welsh Office support for youth work and training is concerned primarily with the social development of young people and the provision of skills which employers require. While these activities can be expected to bring positive social benefits they are not specifically aimed at reducing crime. The Department has, however, supported a number of crime prevention initiatives which are targeted at young people.

Urban programme support for crime prevention projects amounts to some £500,000 a year. For example, in 1992-93 capital expenditure of £100,000 was approved for the establishment of a youth centre in Aberdare which is intended to divert young people away from crime. In addition, nearly £74,000 in approved costs has been made available for schemes which, by providing young people with guidance and training in the maintenance and proper use of motor vehicles, helps divert them from car crime.

In recent years the Department has funded the National Association for the Care and Resettlement of Offenders to undertake crime prevention projects in south-east Wales.

Film Companies (Location Shooting)

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what efforts are currently being undertaken by his Department to encourage international film production companies to shoot on location in Wales.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The Department has taken no initiatives in this area.

Novo Pen Kits

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make it his policy to place Novo pen dispensing kits on the approved list of items for supply on prescription under the national health service; what representations he has had from the British Diabetics Association and the British Medical Association in relation to the right to prescribe the Novo pen kit on the national health service; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: Health departments are considering the financial case for authorising GPs to prescribe insulin injection pens and needles for diabetics. Their inclusion in the GP prescribable list must, like other new additions to the list, be subject to the availability of resources. The Department has received representations from secretaries of local branches of the British Diabetic Association and from a dozen individuals; no representations have been received from the British Medical Association.

Public Bodies

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what percentage share of total departmental spending was accounted for by non-departmental public bodies in each year since 1979.

Mr. David Hunt: The figures are set out in the table. Figures for the years 1979-80 and 1980-81 are not available.

Teacher Placement Scheme

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many teachers from Wales have gained placements with the teacher placement scheme in each year since 1989.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The total number of teachers in Wales who received a placement through the teacher placement service for the years requested is shown in the table:

Year	Number of teachers
1989	305
1990	1,150
1991	2,602
1992	2,252

The figure for 1989 refers to the period from September 1989 only, when the service first began its operations.

Health Promotion Authority

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will place a copy in the Library of the Bettinson report evaluating the aims, objectives and performance of the Health Promotion Authority for Wales.

Mr. David Hunt: I expect to be able to reach a decision on the publication of this report shortly.

Japan Investment Mission

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what consultations he has had with the chairman of the Welsh Development Agency in relation to the reasons for the cancellation of the inward investment mission to Japan from 7 to 14 March.

Mr. David Hunt: None.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is his current estimate of the cost of arranging and aborting the chairman of the Welsh Development Agency's inward investment mission to Japan from 7 to 14 March; and how many individual meetings with companies had been arranged.

Mr. David Hunt: I understand that the inward investment mission has been postponed and not aborted.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will give details of each of the meetings arranged between the chairman of the Welsh Development Agency and the Japanese business leaders which were to take place during the chairman's inward investment mission to Japan from 7 to 14 March; if he will make it his policy to write personally to each of those business leaders to give an explanation for their cancellation; and what proposals he has to rearrange such meetings for a later date.

Mr. David Hunt: No. Such meetings are commercially confidential. I understand that the visits are to be rearranged.

Welsh Development Agency

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what consultations he has had with the Welsh Development Agency concerning the resignation of Linda Gilbody-Wood, the director of the skills development unit; what proposals there are to replace her; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: None. Staffing matters are for the agency's management.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to his answer of 4 February, Official Report, columns 340-41, if he will make it his policy in appointing a new chairman for the Welsh Development Agency to give due priority to the willingness of the appointed candidate to adhere to arranged itineraries and timetables in the course of inward investment missions abroad.

Mr. David Hunt: My policy is to appoint the best candidate for the job.

Directors of Education

Mr. Richards: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will give the full details and the financial settlements for the early retirement of each of the four directors of education who have retired in the last six months in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Wyn Roberts: [holding answer 1 March 1993]: Eligible employees over 50 with two or more years' reckonable service who are made redundant or who leave in the interests of the efficiency of the service are entitled to immediate payment of the local government superannuation scheme retirement pension and retirement lump sum. Additionally, councils have discretion to enhance the pension and lump sum for those over 50 with five or more years' service by the award of up to 10 extra added years, according to various criteria. These are, however, matters for the local authorities concerned.

Mr. Rhodri Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to the answer from the Secretary of State for National Heritage to the hon. Member for Falmouth and Camborne (Mr. Coe) of 9 March, Official Report, columns 512-13, what changes he proposes in the funding of the Welsh National Opera company.

Sir Wyn Roberts: None.

Wages Councils

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many jobs are covered currently by the wages councils in Wales.

Mr. McLoughlin: I have been asked to reply.

It is estimated that in 1992 there were about 120,000 workers in Wales in Wages Council industries.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Japanese Investment

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what percentage of inward direct investment into the United Kingdom from Japan was in manufacturing industry in each year since 1987.

Mr. Sainsbury: According to Japanese Ministry of Finance figures, the percentage by value of inward direct investment into the United Kingdom from Japan in manufacturing industry in each financial year since 1987 was as follows:

	Per cent.
April 1987 to March 1988	11·7
April 1988 to March 1989	8·5
April 1989 to March 1990	22·4
April 1990 to March 1991	29·4
April 1991 to March 1992	25·2

The cumulative percentage for the period since records began to date —1951 to financial year 1991-92—is 19·8.
Source: Japanese Ministry of Finance.

Condoms

Mr. Cousins: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will publish a table showing the retail cost of condoms since 1988 in as an index of (a) cash prices and (b) in 1993 prices; and what steps he has taken to monitor and enforce the price formula set by the Monopolies and Mergers Commission.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: The retail cost of condoms is published in the monthly "Chemist & Druggist Price List". Responsibility for monitoring the price control undertaking given by the London Rubber Company rests with the Director General of Fair Trading.

Mr. Cousins: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will publish a table showing the value of (a) home production, (b) home sales, (c) imports, (d) exports, in cash and constant prices and (e) the share of home sales of imports of condoms in each year since 1988.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: The only publicly available information covers the import and export of hygienic and pharmaceutical articles, including contraceptive sheaths, teats, droppers and hot water bottles, and is as follows:

	Imports £ million	Exports £ million
1988	10·5	9·7
1989	8·8	10·6
1990	12·3	12·1
1991	11·4	13·4

Further information may of course become available once the Monopolies and Mergers Commission has reported on its investigation into the market for contraceptive sheaths.

Standing Committee on Intellectual Property

Mr. Cousins: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list the names of members of the standing committee on intellectual property, the enterprises, agencies and institutions with which the members are connected and their date of appointment.

Mr. Leigh: The following organisations are members of the departmental standing advisory committee on industrial property—SACIP:

the Institute of Patentees and Inventors, the Trade Marks, Patents and Designs Federation, the Confederation of British Industry, the British Retail Consortium, the Incorporated Society of British Advertisers, the Chartered Society of Designers, the Chartered Institute of Patent Agents, the Institute of Trade Mark Agents, the Association of British Chambers of Commerce, the Consumers' Association, the National Consumer Council, the Federation of Small Businesses, the Licensing Executives Society, the Law Society, the Bar Council, the Law Society of Scotland and a representative of the academic world, currently Queen Mary and Westfield college intellectual property law unit.

Each organisation selects a suitable individual to deal with business and represent it at meetings; these representatives can vary for each meeting and may be selected according to the subject matter of the agenda.

The chairman of the committee is Mr. David Lewis OBE, who was appointed chairman for three years when SACIP was set up in October 1988, and reappointed in 1991. Mr. Lewis does not represent a particular organisation.

The member organisations joined by invitation from the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Industry and Consumer Affairs when SACIP was set up, with the exception of the Law Society of Scotland and the Licensing Executives Society—which were invited to join in November 1991—and the Federation of Small Businesses—which replaced the previous small firms representative in October 1992.

Mr. Cousins: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how often the Standing Committee on Intellectual Property has met since April 1992; when it next proposes to meet; and what is its current work programme.

Mr. Leigh: The departmental standing advisory committee on industrial property has met three times since April 1992. Two meetings are planned for the near future, one to consider the Patent Office's corporate plan for 1993 and various other matters of interest to users of the Patent Office's services—date not yet fixed—and another on 28 April to consider proposals from the World Intellectual Property Organisation for a treaty on the harmonisation of patent law.

SACIP does not have a detailed work programme. Its function is to advise on policy and practice and it therefore responds to issues when they arise—for example, in the European Council work on industrial property. However, during the last year, issues that SACIP has considered include revision of United Kingdom trade mark law, the draft EC regulation on the Community trade mark system, proposals for an international treaty on the harmonisation of trade mark law, the European Commission green paper on designs, the EC directive for the protection of biotechnological inventions, patenting of lifeforms, industrial property aspects of the human genome project and the biodiversity convention, and supplementary protection certificates for pharmaceuticals.

Union of Democratic Mineworkers

Sir Keith Speed: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when he last met officers of the Union of Democratic Mineworkers; and what plans he has for a future meeting.

Mr. Eggar: My right hon. Friend and I met representatives of the Union of Democratic Mineworkers on 20 January. I subsequently met representatives of the union on 4 March. Future meetings will be arranged as necessary.

Coal Industry

Sir Keith Speed: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what representations he has received from members of the Confederation of United Kingdom Coal Producers about the future of their members' contracts with the electricity generators after 31 March.

Mr. Eggar: Future coal supply arrangements are a matter for the companies concerned.

Vehicle Engine Technologies

Mr. Robert Ainsworth: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what industry lead research projects into the development of vehicle engine technologies his Department is supporting; and how much money has been spent in the last five years.

Mr. Leigh: My Department is currently funding vehicle engine technologies into improved engine efficiency and emission control with grants amounting to over £2·5 million.

Because the information on engine research is recorded as part of the Department's overall vehicle technology support, it has not been possible separately to identify an accurate figure for engine research or for any other specific area without incurring a disproportionate cost. However, over the last five years—1987-88 to 1991-92—the Department's overall support for vehicle engine technologies exceeded £5 million of a total of £10·389 million grants for vehicle research.

Gas Consumption

Mr. Hardy: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is his estimate of the volume of gas consumption which will be met from United Kingdom resources in 2000.

Mr. Eggar: United Kingdom gas reserves are estimated to be sufficient to meet all our likely needs to and beyond the year 2000, but their precise contribution to consumption in that year will depend on a number of factors, including the rate of offshore exploration, appraisal and production, the development of gas trade, and the level of demand, all of which will depend in turn, on the price of gas and alternative energy sources.

Manufacturing Industry

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what assessment he has made about the competitiveness of British manufacturing industry.

Mr. Sainsbury: The competitiveness of manufacturing industry, and its individual sectors, can be assessed against many criteria and over different timescales. DTI Ministers receive a number of such assessments, including from the private sector.

Electricity Interconnector

Mr. Patrick Thompson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will publish a summary of the legal advice he has received on trade in electricity across the interconnector with France.

Mr. Heseltine: I have today placed copies of that summary advice in the Library of the House.

Stock Exchange (Computer System)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will set up an inquiry into the Taurus stock exchange computer system; what is his estimate of losses incurred as a result of the delays in implementing the system; and if he will indicate on whom the losses will fall.

Mr. Nelson: I have been asked to reply.

Taurus was a private sector project managed by the stock exchange to modernise the equities settlement, registration and transfer systems in the United Kingdom. The priority now is to identify the best way forward to ensure the continued efficiency and competitiveness of our equity markets. I welcome the immediate establishment, by the governor of the Bank of England, of a task force on securities settlement, on which the Treasury is represented, to review the possibilities and to recommend a way foward.

Building Societies

Mr. Cousins: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what provisions govern the reporting by building societies of their use, and the results of use, of section 23 of the Building Societies Act to their members or shareholders; which agency is responsible for monitoring the use of building societies' powers under section 23; how this agency has exercised these powers in the last two financial years; and in what form the efficacy of this monitoring is reported to Parliament.

Mr. Nelson: I have been asked to reply.

A building society wishing to adopt the power to hedge under section 23 of the Building Societies Act 1986 must first obtain the approval of its members, by special resolution, to include that power in its memorandum. There is no statutory requirement for subsequent reporting to the members on the exercise of the power, but directors could choose to do so.

The Building Societies Commission is responsible for the regulation and prudential supervision of building societies. It has issued a prudential note—PN 1989/3—on balance sheet mismatch and hedging, which gives guidance to societies on the risks arising from balance sheet structure, and sets out requirements for management, systems and the prudent use of hedging instruments.

The Commission reports annually to Parliament, in accordance with section 4 of the Building Societies Act 1986.

Manufacturing Investment

Mr. Spellar: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what has been the inward manufacturing investment, including that from other European Community countries, in each of the last five years in (a) the United Kingdom, (b) France and (c) Germany.

Mr. Nelson: I have been asked to reply.

The latest information on the amount of inward manufacturing direct investment in the United Kingdom is contained in Business Monitor MA4 1990 "Overseas Transactions". Comparable information for France and Germany is not available.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Gosport Magistrates Court

Mr. Viggers: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will make a statement outlining how the objective in the citizens charter relating to accessibility of the courts to all who have to use them has been met and will be met in relation to Gosport magistrates court.

Mr. John M. Taylor: The Lord Chancellor has not yet reached a decision on the appeal by Hampshire county council against the Hampshire magistrates courts committee's proposal to close the Gosport courthouse. A number of factors, including the case of access to the building, the amenities and facilities available, and the distance that court users would have to travel to the next courthouse if Gosport were to be closed, will be taken into account before a final decision is reached.

In general terms, accessibility of the courts in the context of the citizen's charter relates as much to the access to the court process as to the location of individual courthouses. Accessibility therefore includes information being sent to court users in advance of their appearance to explain what can be expected; adequate help and advice on their arrival on the day; and good standards of facilities and amenities within each building, including provision for the disabled and separate waiting facilities for victims and witnesses when required.

Legal Aid

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department in what circumstances legal aid is given in cases of medical negligence; and how many cases of medical negligence were supported by legal aid in each of the last three years.

Mr. John M. Taylor: All applicants for legal aid must have reasonable grounds for taking or defending a court action and must qualify financially. The upper financial limit for all personal injury cases, including medical negligence, is higher than that for other categories of case.

Applicants for legal aid for personal injury cases qualify with assessed disposable income up to £7,500—£6,800 for other cases—and with disposable capital up to £8,560—£6,750 for other cases. The number of certificates issued to plaintiffs in medical negligence actions are as follows:

	Number
1989-90	6,439
1990-91	8,870
1991-92	18,658

Magistrates

Mr. Nigel Evans: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what is the number of stipendiary magistrates as a percentage of all magistrates; and what measures are being taken to increase this figure.

Mr. John M. Taylor: The number of authorised stipendiary posts as a percentage of active lay magistrates as at 1 January 1993 was 0·3 per cent. Stipendiary magistrates are appointed by the Lord Chancellor to support lay magistrates where there is a clear need and normally after a request has been made locally. Consideration is being given to seeking parliamentary approval to an increase in the statutory maximum of 40 stipendiary appointments outside the inner London area imposed by section 13(4) of the Justice of the Peace Act 1979 so that further stipendiary appointments can be made to support the lay magistracy as appropriate.

Mr Nigel Evans: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department, what was the number of serving magistrates in each year since 1979.

Mr. John M. Taylor: The number of serving magistrates for the areas covered by the Lord Chancellor and the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster in each year is:

	Number
1979	24,021
1980	24,684
1981	25,435
1982	25,665
1983	25,934
1984	25,778
1985	27,244
1986	27,687
1987	27,650
1988	27,926
1989	28,211
1990	28,667
1991	29,062
1992	29,441
1993	29,686

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT ADMINISTRATION

Horn of Africa

Mr. Paice: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what contributions Her Majesty's Government will make to the special emergency programme for the Horn of Africa 1993 appeals for Eritrea, Ethiopia, Kenya and Sudan.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: My right hon. and noble Friend the Minister for Overseas Development has this week approved a total British contribution of £19·35 million to these appeals. The contribution is made up as follows:

Country	Food Aid (tonnes)		Non-Food (£ million)
Eritrea	5,000	(Approximately	2·0
Ethiopia	13,000	£8·85 million)[1]	3·5
Kenya	15,000		1·5
Sudan	—		3·5

[1] includes £0·5 million to transport and distribute food in Sudan.

This pledge is additional to the £221 million, including 310,000 tonnes of food aid and our share of EC emergency aid, which we have committed for humanitarian relief in the Horn of Africa since the present crisis began in September 1990.

Know-how Funds

Mr. Paice: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress is being made with the know-how fund for central and eastern Europe and the former Soviet Union; and if he will give details of specific projects so far approved this year for each eligible country.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Since my last answer of 27 October 1992, at column 552, the know-how fund has continued to do extremely well. The amount spent or committed is now at over £100 million for more than 700 projects. An updated list of activities has been placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

TRANSPORT

Transport Council

Mr. Dunn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what was the result of the Transport Council held in Brussels on 15 March.

Mr. MacGregor: The Transport Council met in Brussels on 15 March. The Council agreed conclusions on external aviation relations, reached political agreement on air traffic control equipment and confirmed its agreement to the two-year infrastructure programme at the October 1992 Council, with a slightly increased budget. My right hon. Friend Lord Caithness and I attended on behalf of the United Kingdom.

The Council had a first discussion of the Commission's whtie paper on a common transport policy. Themes were the need to ensure effective liberalisation in the transport sector, infrastructure, cost recovery, transport safety, and the environment.

The Commission's communication on maritime safety for which the United Kingdom pressed strongly for some time, was welcomed by the Council. The central issues of improved implementation of International Maritime Organisation standards and a stricter line on sub-standard shipping were widely supported. There was also support for action in training, environmental protection and vessel traffic service, which facilitate control of coastal traffic.

The Council confirmed the text of the draft regulation on EC finance for transport infrastructure, which followed political agreement at the October 1992 Council, with an increased two-year budget of 325 mecu. The Council agreed that the presidency should now contact the European Parliament to commence the conciliation procedure requested by the Parliament.

The Council discussed the Commission's proposals for trans-European networks for combined transport, roads and inland waterways. It agreed that further work on the proposals would be undertaken by COREPER for ministerial decision at the June Council.

The Council agreed conclusions emphasising member states' continuing responsibilities for bilateral relations in aviation.

It was agreed to set up a Council working group to consider the practical implications of conducting any future negotiations at Community level.

Political agreement was reached on a directive on the harmonisation of air traffic control equipment which will give the force of Community law to air traffic control equipment standards developed by Eurocontrol. Formal adoption depends on receipt of the European Parliament's opinion.

The presidency reported on the work of the working group on the Commission's proposals on airline computer reservation systems.

There was majority support for building on the UK presidency's proposals last year on national road user charges on heavy lorries.

The Council agreed that the signing of the transport agreement with Slovenia should take place at the same time as the signing of the trade and co-operation agreement and the financial protocol. The transport agreement will now be put to the European Parliament and the Economic and Social Council.

The Commission outlined its aim of negotiating liberal road transport agreements with third countries, bearing in mind the economic situation of the Community's transport industry. We argued that in this field as in aviation the rights of member states under existing bilaterals should not be prejudiced.

Greater Manchester Relief Road

Mr. Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to open public consultation on the Greater Manchester western and northern relief road section M62 to M66.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: Later in the year.

M4 Extension (Detectives)

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what procedures were followed for authorising the employment of detective agencies in surveillance of those opposed to the construction of the M4 motorway extension across Twyford Down; what was the total cost involved; and what criteria were used to select the detective agencies used.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: Brays Detective Agency (Southampton) Ltd was appointed by the Department's south-east construction programme division on the recommendation of the engineer for the M3 Bar End to Compton scheme. The agency has been employed to serve papers on people trespassing on the Department's land at Twyford Down and to photograph trespassers. To date they have been paid approximately £7,000.

Road Haulage (Environmental Effects)

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what steps his Department has taken, and is proposing to take, to enable an accurate assessment of the total costs of all environmental impacts associated with road haulage; and what is his policy towards harmonising the relationship between vehicle weights and duty levels with other EC member states.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: As I explained in my answer to the hon. Lady on 12 March, official Report, columns 769-70, a substantial research programme is required to develop reliable monetary values for environmental impacts. As a first step, we have let a research contract to attempt to derive monetary values for traffic nuisance experienced in the home. We expect a report in autumn 1994. As results emerge from this work, we shall decide on the possibility of valuing other environmental effects on traffic. Separate research is in hand to improve our general understanding of emissions from heavy goods vehicles.

Under the United Kingdom presidency last year, the EC Transport Council came close to agreeing proposals for a common structure and minimum rates of vehicle taxation for heavy goods vehicles, as part of wider package on taxing and charging such vehicles. Consideration of this package continued at the Council's meeting on 15 March. As with other taxation, the United Kingdom does not favour complete harmonisation, and it is evident from the discussions in the Council that in any case it could not be achieved in the foreseeable future.

Channel Tunnel Rail Link

Mrs. Helen Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to ensure that the northern regions of the United Kingdom have a modern link to the channel tunnel through an expanded King's Cross terminal.

Mr. Freeman: I refer the hon. Member to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer's statement to the House on 16 March, at column 194. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will make a full statement very soon.

Highway Closures

Mr. Hendry: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the statutory consulation procedure between local authorities regarding the closure for repairs of principal highways connecting them.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: Under section 59 of the New Roads and Street Works Act 1991, highway authorities are required to use their best endeavours to co-ordinate the execution of works of all kinds, including their own repair works, in roads for which they are responsible. The duty includes co-ordination with other highway authorities where works have an effect beyond the local authority boundary. There is no set procedure for co-ordination but advice is given in the code of practice on co-ordination which the Secretary of State has approved under the Act.

Telephone Lines

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the minimum height that a telecom phone line must reach when crossing a major road.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: The licences issued to operators of telecommunications systems under section 7 of the Telecommunications Act 1984 require lines installed above the carriageway of a maintainable highway to be placed at a height of not less than 5·5 m. In the case of a designated high load route the requirement is for a height of not less than 6·5 m or, in some cases, 6·7 m.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Citizens Charter

Mr. Ronnie Campbell: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what was the cost to his Department of the implementation of the citizens charter in each year since its inception; and if he will give a breakdown of those costs.

Mr. Jackson: During 1991-92 the charter unit spent £1·6 million on the following:

The launch of the citizens charter, including producing, publicising and distributing the citizens charter White Paper (Cm1599) and the guide to the citzens charter—£916,000

The launch of 1992 charter mark scheme—£320,000

Staff, general administrative expenses and capital expenditure —£346,000

The charter unit expects to spend £2·1 million in 1992-93 on the following:

Running 1992 charter mark scheme and launch of 1993 scheme—£600,000

Charterline market research, and development work on pilot project—£250,000

Publicising citizens charter first report and producing summary guide, ethnic minority versions and versions for the partially sighted—£420,00

Part payment of customer survey—£30,000

Staff, general administrative expenses and capital expenditure —£800,000

Mr. Ronnie Campbell: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will outline the main successes of the citizens charter since its introduction and list the benefits of the charter to date.

Mr. Jackson: The citizens charter first report (Cmnd 2101), published November 1992, shows considerable progress in raising the standards of public services and making them more responsive to the needs and concerns of their users. We have met, or put in hand, over 90 per cent. of the policy commitments set out in the initial citizens charter programme of action (Cmnd 1599). These include:

The publication of 30 charters setting demanding, but realistic, standards for health, education, public transport and other important public services;

The introduction of outpatient appointment times, and of a maximum 2-year waiting time for hospital admission;

The publication of comparative performance data on schools and local authorities;

The provision of annual written reports on each child's school performance;

The introduction of legislation to strengthen regulators' powers; to increase information given to parents on each child's and school's performance; and to prepare the way for detailed reporting on local authority performance;

The strengthening of Inspectorates of schools, the police, prisons and social services through greater independence; lay involvement; and openness;

The introduction of new compensation schemes for British Rail and London Underground; and

The introduction of the national Charter Mark awards scheme to recognise excellence in public service.

The citizens charter is a long term programme for improvement in public service. Following the ministerial seminar held on 17 February to review progress and set future agenda, we announced plans to:

Extend the patients charter to primary care;

Set a standard 18-month waiting limit for hips, knees and cataract operations;

Publish further and higher education charters setting service standards for students;

Publish comparative information on further education;

Revise and update the parents charter;

Publish a charter for the Child Support Agency to be launched in April;

Develop the Benefits Agency one-stop shop programme;

Appoint a new complaints adjudicator for the Inland Revenue;

Appoint new lay inspectors to the inspectorate of constabulary;

Introduce a housing corporation ombudsman to handle tenants' complaints;

Establish the Charterline service to provide information on the charter initiative, on published charters and service standards, and on complaints systems where things go wrong;

Include charter standards in British Rail franchises contracts;

Establish a complaints task force to look at the effectiveness of public service complaints procedures; and Conduct a national survey of people's priorities for future charter development.

EDUCATION

National Curriculum

Sir Thomas Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what timetable he now envisages for the introduction of the key stage 3 English test.

Mr. Forth: The first statutory tests in English for 14-year-olds will be held on 7 and 9 June this year, as planned.

HEALTH

Traffic Casualties

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much has been raised in each year since 1980 in current and cash terms by each district health authority and in total by charging patients when they are involved in road traffic accidents (a) for all patients and (b) for inpatients and outpatients, separately.

Mr. Sackville: The information requested could be compiled only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are the present rules governing the recovery of the costs of treatment for victims of road traffic accidents from their personal or car insurance; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Sackville: Hospitals or general medical practitioners may collect an emergency treatment fee—currently at a flat rate of £20.10—for immediate medical examination or treatment required as a result of a road accident, and charges for subsequent in-patient or out-patient hospital treatment, up to specified ceilings. General medical practitioners may also claim a mileage allowance.

The emergency treatment fee is payable by the user of the vehicle irrespective of who caused the accident and must be covered by motor insurance policies. The charges for subsequent hospital treatment are levied directly on insurance companies but only in cases where companies make third party payments.

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will publish a list showing the prescribed brands of topical anti-rheumatics; and what is the price of a month's supply.

GP Fund Holders

Mrs. Helen Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many general practitioner fund holders in each region have had their fund-holding status withdrawn.

Dr. Mawhinney: One practice in the Trent region has had fund-holding status withdrawn.

Mrs. Helen Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how frequently the accounts of general practitioner fund-holding practices are checked by (a) the regional health authority and (b) the family health services authority.

Dr. Mawhinney: Each fund-holding unit is required to provide monthly accounts to the family health services authority. Regional health authorities are responsible for monitoring the scheme and request reports as necessary.

Mrs. Helen Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will introduce into the patients charter a requirement that patients registered with a fund-holding general practitioner are notified as soon as the general practitioner's budget for any element of national health service provision is exhausted.

Dr. Mawhinney: No.

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will place in the Library a copy of each Audit Commission report on general practitioner fund-holding practices.

Dr. Mawhinney: The auditors appointed by the Audit Commission examine general practitioner fund holders' accounts annually and issue and audit certificate, but have not published any formal audit reports on fund-holding practices.

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what specific conditions are laid down relating to the contractual arrangements between general practitioner fund-holding practices and private health providers wholly or partially owned by partners in the fund-holding practice.

Dr. Mawhinney: These arrangements are governed by the National Health Service (Fundholding Practice) (General) Regulations 1991 and Amendment regulations of 1992. An amendment to these regulations was laid before the House on 10 March 1993, to come into effect on 1 April 1993. This amendment provides that payments from the fund to GP fund holders for providing services other than general medical services to patients of their practice, will be made directly to the medical practitioner who provides the services or to the partnership of which he is a member, rather than through a third party such as a limited company.

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what regulations or guidelines she has issued regarding the circumstances in which, and the grounds on which, regional health authorities may remove recognition from members of a fund-holding practice.

Dr. Mawhinney: The circumstances in and grounds on which a regional health authority may remove recognition from a fund-holding practice are set out in the General Practitioner Fundholding General Regulations, 1991.

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what guidelines she has issued to regional health authorities concerning the supervision and monitoring of general practitioner fund-holding practices with regard to the quality of service and financial management.

Dr. Mawhinney: The following guidance has been issued:

Management Allowance, EL(90)P84.
GP Fundholding: Financial Matters, EL(91)36.
Joint Guidance to Hospital Consultants on GP Fundholding, EL(91)84.
Contracting for 1992-93: Involvement of GPs (including GP Fundholders), EL(91)120.
The Patient's Charter: monitoring and publishing information on performance, HSG(92)36.
GPFHs Public Availability of Contracts, EL(92)68.
GPFH: Guidance on setting budgets for 1993-94, EL(92)83.
The Manual of Accounts.
Copies are available in the Library.

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what training her Department and regional health authorities provide to members of general practitioner fund-holding practices to help them effectively manage their budgets.

Dr. Mawhinney: Training is a matter for regional health authorities who provide training to reflect local needs.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what guidance she has issued in respect of general practitioner fund-holders buying services from members of their own family; and if she will make a statement.

Dr. Mawhinney: The National Health Service (Fund-holding Practices) (General) Regulations 1991, issued at the commencement of the GP fund-holding scheme, provide that regional health authority consent is required where a fund holder proposes to purchase services from a family member.

Psychiatric Care

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will list the health authorities and local authorities who do not provide care programmes for all those under the care of a consultant psychiatrist who live within the community in general.

Mr. Yeo: All authorities have implemented the Care Programme Approach.

Public Bodies

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many appointments to the public bodies listed in "Public Bodies" for his Department were made from names supplied by the public appointments unit; and if she will list them.

Mr. Sackville: The public appointments unit provides names of suitably qualified candidates for consideration for a wide range of appointments. Information on the source of names of individual appointees to public bodies could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what percentage shares of total departmental spending was accounted for by non-departmental public bodies in each year since 1979.

Mr. Sackville: The Department of Health came into existence in April 1988, having previously been a part of the Department of Health and Social Security. Figures for the period 1988-89 to 1991-92 are shown in the table; those for 1992-93 are not yet available.

Year	Total expenditure by non-departmental public bodies £ million[1] (a)	Total departmental spending £ million[1] (b)	(a) as a percentage of (b)
1988-89	180	18,460	0·98
1989-90	190	19,970	0.95
1990-91	220	22,470	0.98
1991-92	240	25,560	0·94

[1] Rounded to the nearest £10 million.

Consultants

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the average age at which doctors achieve consultant status in England; and what comparable information she has in respect of each of the other EC countries.

Dr. Mawhinney: The median age of consultants appointed during the year ending 30 September 1991 in England was 37. The equivalent data are not available in respect of other EC countries.

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the ratio of consultants per head of population in England; and what information she has about comparable figures in other EC countries.

Dr. Mawhinney: As at 30 September 1991 there were 3,300 people per consultant in England. The equivalent data are not available in respect of other EC countries.

Bone Marrow Transplants

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action she is taking to protect bone marrow transplant services for children with metabolic disorders in the Westminster area; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Sackville: Children with metabolic disorders are able to receive these services if clinicians agree that a bone marrow transplant is an appropriate course of treatment and a suitable donor is available. The location at which such procedures are carried out is determined by the availability of the necessary expertise.

Dental Care

Mr. Clapham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the average amount spent on dental care per capita in each of the G7 countries.

Dr. Mawhinney: The latest available information is for 1991 and shows that in England the average expenditure per head on national health service dental care was £25·66. Information relating to Wales, Scotland, and Northern Ireland is a matter for my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Wales and Scotland and my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland. We do not have comparable information for the other G7 countries.

Child Abduction

Mr. Olner: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what services are made available for parents and children suffering the effects of child abduction.

Mr. Yeo: There is no separate requirement upon local authorities to provide services for parents and children suffering the effects of child abduction except in so far as these children fall within the definition of "children in need" as defined by section 17(10) of the Children Act 1989. In these circumstances local authorities are required to provide a range and level of services appropriate to the needs of the children and their parents identified within their area.

Competitive Tendering

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations she has received from the Cleaning and Support Services Association in relation to the Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations 1981 and compulsory competitive tendering by health authorities.

Mr. Sackville: We have received a number of representations from the Cleaning and Support Services Association over the past months seeking clarification of the implication of Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations 1981 for the national health service market testing programme. I refer the hon. Member to the reply my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State gave my hon. Friend for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells) on 11 March at column 713. A copy of the guidance has been passed on to the association.

Infertility

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps she has taken to remove the inconsistency between the provisions of the Access to Health Records Act 1990, the Data Protection Act 1984 and the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 1990 with regard to information about certain infertility treatments.

Mr. Sackville: On 17 March, we laid before the House the Access to Health Records (Control of Access) Regulations 1993 which preclude access under the Access to Health Records Act 1990 to any part of a health record which would identify a person born as a result of "treatment services" under the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 1990. Section 33(8) of that Act contains provision, subject to certain safeguards, in particular counselling, for obtaining access via the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority to information relating to such treatment.

Access to health records generally is governed by the Data Protection Act 1984, for computerised health records, and the Access to Health Records Act 1990, for written records. Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 1990 modified the Data Protection Act 1984 to provide that access to information held on computer relating to treatment services is to be afforded under the 1990 Act rather than the 1984 Act. These new regulations will similarly preclude access under the Access to Health Records Act 1990 to written records relating to treatment services. Access to such records will then be available only on application to the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority under section 33 of the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 1990.

GP Surgeries

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for health if she will make it her Department's policy to oblige general practitioners to include details of the accessibility of their surgeries in information for their patients.

Dr. Mawhinney: General medical practitioners are obliged by their terms of service to make available a practice leaflet to each patient on his or her list. This leaflet must specify whether the doctor's practice premises have suitable access for all disabled patients and, if not, the reasons why they are unsuitable for particular types of disability.

Drug Prescribing

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will make it her Department's policy to oblige pharmacists to inform a patient if an item on a prescription may be obtained more cheaply over the counter.

Dr. Mawhinney: When a doctor prescribes an item which can be bought over the counter at a cost which is less than the prescription charge, there is no objection to the pharamacist selling it to the patient.

Nursing Home Residents

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what advice she has issued to family health service authorities to deal with the de-registering or the refusal by general practitioners to register elderly residents of nursing homes.

Dr. Mawhinney: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Makerfield (Mr. McCartney) on 12 March at column 759.

Physiotherapy

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will make it her Department's policy to ensure that all general practitioners have direct access for their patients to open access physiotherapy.

Dr. Mawhinney: Direct access to physiotherapy is increasingly available. The precise mix of local services is a matter for health authority purchasers, in consultation with general practitioners, and for GP fund holders.

"Caring for People"

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many copies of "Caring for People" were published; how much each cost; what was the overall cost; and to whom the publication was sent.

Mr. Yeo: A total of 61,000 copies of the caring for people information pack for the voluntary and private sectors were printed at a cost of £105,706. A loose leaf version was produced at a unit cost of £4·80 and distributed to national, regional and local advice centres. A bound version was produced at a unit cost of £1·13. It was sent to registered residential care and nursing homes in England and made available to the voluntary sector and others with an interest in the community care reforms. Copies were also sent to directors of social services, health authorities, national health service trusts and all right hon. and hon. Members representing English constituencies.

Locums

Mr. David Young: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what checks into the medical background of doctors hired as locums are made by health authorities.

Dr. Mawhinney: Employing bodies are responsible for deciding, in consultation with their occupational health advisers, what health checks are required of locum doctors.

Doctors (AIDS)

Mr. David Young: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if she will make it the duty of a practice employing a doctor with AIDS to inform the district health authority of his condition;

(2) if she will make a statement on the case of the doctor with AIDS who was employed by Bolton health authority as a locum on casualty; and what measures she will take to ensure that such a case does not recur.

Dr. Mawhinney: The United Kingdom health departments' guidance to health care workers, who perform or assist in invasive procedures and know or suspect that they have been exposed to HIV, states that they must obtain occupational advice on the possible need to alter their work practices and remain under close medical supervision if they continue to work. Ethical guidance from the professional bodies makes clear that health care workers have an overriding duty to put their patients' interests first. Failure to follow this guidance would raise the question of serious professional misconduct.

The chief professional officers to the Department of Health will meet the General Medical Council, the General Dental Council and the United Kingdom Central Council for Nursing, Midwifery and Health Visiting on 19 March to consider further steps that can be taken to ensure that their guidance in relation to health care workers and their ethical duties towards patients is known and understood by all health care workers.

Mr. David Young: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will take steps to release the name of the Bolton doctor who died of an AIDS-related disease, with details of all his previous work in the NHS; and if she will make appropriate counselling available to all his previous patients.

Mr. Sackville: Bolton health authority has released the name of the health care worker involved, and the health boards for which he worked. It has set up a helpline to offer reassurance through counselling and if requested, testing. All patients seen by the doctor at Bolton royal infirmary have been identified and are being contacted. The two health boards in Northern Ireland have similarly set up helplines and are contacting former patients whose treatment by the health care worker involved invasive procedures.

Mr. David Young: To ask the Secretary of State for Health under what guidelines the condition of a doctor with AIDS can be known to his colleagues in the practice but withheld form patients treated by the doctor.

Dr. Mawhinney: All medical information is confidential except for well defined circumstances where there is a risk to the public health. The United Kingdom health departments' guidelines "AIDS—HIV Infected Health Care Workers" requires health care workers who know or suspect they have been exposed to HIV to seek medical and occupational advice on the need to modify their work practices and refrain from invasive procedures.

In cases where the health care worker has performed invasive procedures and a study is needed, involving contacting former patients, his employer is necessarily involved. Wherever possible the identity of the health care worker is kept confidential.

AIDS Grant (Bromley)

Mr. Dowd: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to her answer of 14 January, Official Report, column 800, upon which date a further decision was taken with regard to HIV/AIDS support grant in 1992-93 for the London borough of Bromley; and what are the details of that decision.

Mr. Sackville: The London borough of Bromley was notified on 12 March that the Department was able to offer it funding from the AIDS support grant scheme. Bromley has been awarded £10,500 towards the costs of the authority's contract with the Terrence Higgins Trust for the provision of services for people with HIV/AIDS.

Cystic Fibrosis

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many people in the United Kingdom presently suffer from cystic fibrosis;

(2) how many babies are born each year with cystic fibrosis;

(3) how many people die each year because of cystic fibrosis;

(4) what is the current average lifespan of a cystic fibrosis sufferer; and what was the figure in 1979.

Mr. Sackville: The latest Office of Population Censuses and Surveys information is that 110 people were certified as having died from cystic fibrosis in England in 1991. The other information requested is not available centrally. The report "Cystic Fibrosis in Adults" published by the Royal College of Physicians in November 1990 includes estimates for the prevalence of the disease and survival rates, a copy of which is available in the Library.

AIDS (Hospital Beds)

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is (a) the total number of hospital beds in London currently available for people with AIDS and (b) the number that will remain following implementation of the recommendations of the report "Making London Better"; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Sackville: The number of beds currently available in London is not collected centrally. Whilst some hospitals have beds specifically designated for AIDS patients, the vast majority of beds used are not reserved solely for this purpose.

After the implementation of the recommendations set out in the report "Making London Better", the Thames regions will continue to determine the level of provision for people with AIDS, in the light of guidance issued by the Department.

Regional Health Authorities

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps she is taking to reorganise regional health authorities; what is the timetable for reorganisation; and if she will make a statement.

Dr. Mawhinney: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced in a speech to the National Association of Health Authorities and Trusts on 23 February, a copy of which is available in the Library, that regional health authorities would continue to form part of the National Health Service's organisational arrangements until all providers are trusts and the NHS reforms have been fully implemented. RHAs will continue to be responsible for delivering NHS objectives in their region. They will manage purchasers and concentrate on the development of effective purchasing. They will maintain strategic oversight in their region to ensure that a comprehensive range of NHS services remains available.

RHAs must embrace change so that they can work more easily with the grain of the NHS reforms. We have advised RHAs that typically they should employ a maximum of 200 people.

There will be a review of the functions and manpower of the present intermediate tier of NHS management and its interrelationships with the NHS management executive. Substantial progress will be made by the review by the summer.

The timetable for change will depend on RHAs own plans for slimming down, some of which are well developed, and on the conclusions reached by the review.

South Yorkshire Ambulance Service

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health, the hon. Member for Bolton, West (Mr. Sackville) last communicated with the chairman of the South Yorkshire ambulance service; what subjects were raised; and if she will make a statement on the performance and response times of that ambulance service.

Mr. Sackville: I have had no correspondence with the chairman of South Yorkshire metropolitan ambulance and paramedic service—SYMAPS—national health service trust. I have written to the chairman of Trent regional health authority on 9 February about the response time achieved by SYMAPS against the patients charter standard. The management of SYMAPS and the four South Yorkshire purchasing districts have been closely monitoring response times and are working to bring the accident and emergency performance standards into line with the patients charter.

Anti-diarrhoeals

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 18 March.

The Prime Minister: This morning, I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Prime Minister which Departments of State have had to defend themselves at the European Court of Human Rights over the past 12 years; what pronouncements were made by the Court in these cases; and what changes in procedures, or other steps were instituted by Her Majesty's Government as a result.

Political Parties (Funding)

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Prime Minister if he will introduce legislation whereby political parties represented in the House would be required to publish detailed annual accounts of their finances.

Mr. Rogers: To ask the Prime Minister if he will introduce legislation to require political parties to disclose funds held abroad and to disclose the source of those funds.

The Prime Minister: I have no plans to do so.

Mr. Rogers: To ask the Prime Minister if he will introduce legislation to prevent the use of back-to-back loans from offshore companies to political parties in the United Kingdom.

The Prime Minister: The various ways in which funds may be remitted to the United Kingdom were considered in a consultative document issued by the Inland Revenue in 1988 "Residence in the United Kingdom—The Scope of United Kingdom Taxation for Individuals". This included proposals for changes in the tax treatment of non-domiciled individuals who are resident in the United Kingdom. In the light of the responses received, including a representation from the hon. Member's own party, it was announced that the Government did not intend pursuing these proposals on 15 March 1989 at columns 501-2.

South Africa

Mr. Rogers: To ask the Prime Minister what steps the Government are taking to investigate shipments of United Kingdom arms to South Africa in the period 1980 to 1991.

The Prime Minister: The Government have no reason to make any investigations at the present time. If there is any evidence to support allegations that United Kingdom arms have been shipped to South Africa unlawfully, it should be passed on to the appropriate authorities.

Public Services, Gloucestershire

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make a statement concerning public services in Gloucestershire.

The Prime Minister: I am satisfied that the local government finance settlement that the House approved on 3 February 1993 will enable authorities if they are efficient, including Gloucestershire, to provide a good level of services in 1993-94.

Honours

Ms Hoey: To ask the Prime Minister how many advisory committees there are advising on suitable recipients for honours; who are their members; and when they last met.

The Prime Minister: My honours recommendations are my personal responsibility. Any advice given in formulating these recommendations is confidential.

Taxation

Mr. Rogers: To ask the Prime Minister what studies were proposed by the board of Inland Revenue into the tax position of overseas owners of United Kingdom assets between the years 1984 and 1987; what action was taken; and what information relating to these studies was disclosed to officials of the Conservative party.

The Prime Minister: In 1988 the Inland Revenue issued a consultative document "Residence in the United Kingdom—The Scope of UK Taxation for Individuals". This included proposals for changes in the tax treatment of non-domiciled individuals who are resident in the United Kingdom. In the light of the responses received, including a representation from the hon. Member's own party, it was announced that the Government did not intend pursuing these proposals on 15 March 1989 at columns 501-2.

Civil List

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his answer of 5 March, Official Report, column 306, if he will bring forward legislation to amend the Civil List Audit Act 1816 to ensure that the accounts and reports on how civil list payments are spent are published and presented to Parliament.

The Prime Minister: As I explained to the House on 11 February 1993, at column 1116, I have no plans to change the audit arrangements for the civil list.

India (Detainees)

Mr. Madden: To ask the Prime Minister what representations he made to the Indian authorities during his recent visit about the case of David Ward and Steve Hillman, detained in India; and if he will make a statement.

The Prime Minister [holding answer 15 March 1993]: I raised the case of David Ward and Stephen Hillman during my recent visit to India and have written to the Indian Home Minister to follow up. I made clear our concern at the long period they had spent in detention and urged that they should either be charged or released. I am glad to say that charges against David Ward and Stephen Hillman were dropped by the Indian authorities. They returned to London on 17 March.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Public Bodies

Dr. Wright: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many appointments to the public bodies listed in "Public Bodies" for his Department were made from names supplied by the public appointments unit; and if he will list them.

Mr. Curry: Our officials regularly consult the public appointments unit for names of suitable, qualified candidates for public appointments. Of the appointments made by my right hon. Friend since 1 April 1992, three were made from names supplied by the public appointments unit.

Fish

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will set up an inquiry into the current disparity between the wholesale price of fish and the price being paid for fish and fish products by the consumer.

Mr. Curry: No. I do consider, however, that dialogue is needed between catchers and processors. A feature of the present market situation appears to be that United Kingdom catchers are landing fish which are not wanted by processors and attract low prices, while processors continue to pay higher prices for supplies from third country sources. Catchers and processors should have a mutual interest in working to develop a more rational use of resources and to encourage a revival of customer demand.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will consider setting up a Fisheries

Council to bring together all sections of the United Kingdom fishing industry and fisheries ministers to develop a co-ordinated approach to the management and conservation of United Kingdom fisheries.

Mr. Curry: Existing arrangements already ensure a co-ordinated approach between Departments, and my colleagues and I have regular contacts with the industry on a range of issues. In addition, I hope shortly to launch a series of in-depth dialogues on technical measures involving all parts of the United Kingdom industry together with our scientists and administrators.

Rabbits

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what application has been made for a veterinary products licence to produce a vaccine for viral haemorrhagic disease in rabbits for the United Kingdom market.

Mr. Soames: One such application was submitted and subsequently withdrawn during 1992. Although officials in the veterinary medicines directorate are holding discussions with that applicant and with other companies, no further application has been received.

Agriculture Council

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the outcome of the Agriculture Council held in Brussels on 16 and 17 March; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: I represented the United Kingdom at the meeting of the Agriculture Council on 16 and 17 March, together with my hon. Friend the Minister of State.

The main issue on the Council's agenda was a further discussion of the Commission's farm price proposals for 1993-94. No decisions were possible, in the absence of the European Parliament's opinion. But, at my strong urging, the Council and Commission made a declaration that it would not be appropriate to bring linseed into the set-aside arrangements for 1993-94. This removes the damaging and unnecessary uncertainty that linseed growers had been facing as a result of the Commission's proposals.

To avoid milk quotas expiring at the end of the month, the Council agreed provisionally to roll them forward for 1993-94 at their existing levels. The Council also declared that the milk co-responsibility levy would be abolished as from 1 April 1993, as part of its decisions on the price package as a whole.

The French Government requested the Council to approve national assistance for their sheep producers, whose returns they believed to have been adversely affected by imports. I made it clear that I would only agree in exchange for an assurance that the French Government would take all necessary steps to secure the free flow of goods, particularly fish, within the single market. The French Minister of the Interior has promised that his Government would do this: and that instructions to this effect had gone to the prefectures concerned.

Along with several other members of the Council, I pressed the Commission to bring forward measures to protect the welfare of animals in transit, and the Commission agreed to do so.

Live Animals Directives

Ms Walley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what progress has been made with European directives on live animals; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Soames: New Community rules for the protection of animals during transport came into force on 1 January 1993. Commission proposals are awaited on further detailed measures including rules on feeding, watering and rest intervals, and vehicle standards. In their absence national rules continue to apply and we have set the maximum feeding and watering interval at 15 hours for all livestock journeys.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Tourism

10. Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what studies his Department has undertaken into the development of tourism in Northern Ireland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Atkins: In 1989 the Department published a strategic review of the industry and it has, in conjunction with the Northern Ireland tourist board, also commissioned reports by consultants on the employment and wealth-creation opportunities of tourism and the quality of tourist accommodation.

Prescription Charges

11. Mr. O'Hara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on prescription charges in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Hanley: Prescription charges are the same throughout the United Kingdom, and in Northern Ireland nine out of 10 items on prescription are dispensed free, as opposed to eight out of 10 in Great Britain, which means that 60 per cent. of the population receive exemption against 50 per cent. in Great Britain.

Hospitals

12. Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will undertake a regional review of hospital provision in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Hanley: The Government have already set out their policy for hospital services in their regional strategy for health and personal social services which was published in November 1991. Boards are working with this policy framework in drawing up their plans for hospital services.

Employment Discrimination

13. Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the workings of the mechanisms in Northern Ireland to attempt to eliminate problems of employment discrimination betweeen Catholics and Protestants.

Mr. Atkins: The Fair Employment (Northern Ireland) Act 1989 set up the Fair Employment commission and the Fair Employment tribunal. It also placed new statutory responsibilities on employers including a requirement to register with the commission, to monitor the composition of their work forces and to review their employment practices and procedures at least every three years. I am pleased to report that the commission and the tribunal are working well and employers have complied with their requirements to a very satisfactory degree.

Anglo-Irish Agreement

14. Mr. McFall: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what discussions he has had with the Irish Foreign Minister on the issue of the Anglo-Irish Agreement.

Sir Patrick Mayhew: The Irish Foreign Minister, Mr. Spring and I last met at the Anglo-Irish intergovernmental conference in London on 3 February and I shall be meeting him again at a further meeting of the conference next week. Both the British and Irish Governments remain fully committed to the Anglo-Irish Agreement. We have also made clear that we would be prepared to consider a new and more broadly based agreement or structure if this can be arrived at through direct discussion and negotiation between all of the parties concerned.

Security

15. Rev. Ian Paisley: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the security situation in Northern Ireland.

20. Mr. Cyril D. Townsend: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on security in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Mates: I refer the hon. Gentleman and my hon. Friend to the reply I gave earlier today to the right hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Molyneaux).

Play Care

16. Ms Hoey: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what initiatives are in place to support the expansion of out-of-school play care in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Atkins: The Training and Employment Agency is considering the need for a scheme similar to that announced for Great Britain on 16 December. The agency has been in close contact with the Employment Department and will be circulating a discussion paper to interested parties through the Playboard organisation.

President Clinton (Representative)

17. Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what recent representations he has received concerning the proposals made by President Clinton of a representative to examine and comment upon inter-community relations in Northern Ireland and relations with the Republic of Ireland; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Patrick Mayhew: This has been raised by hon. Members in the House and in correspondence. The US Administration have made clear that they fully support the talks process.

Inter-party Talks

18. Mr. Sykes: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the future of inter-party talks in the Province.

19. Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the latest talks he has held with the Irish Government about the future of Northern Ireland.

21. Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the latest position regarding talks over Northern Ireland.

Sir Patrick Mayhew: I refer hon. Members to the answer I gave earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Mid Staffordshire (Mr. Fabricant).

Transport Links

22. Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what proposals he has to improve transport links between business locations in Northern Ireland and the port of Dover to facilitate exports by Northern Ireland businesses.

Mr. Atkins: A programme of improvements to Northern Ireland's ports, airports, road and rail systems commenced in 1989. The programme's main aim is the improvement of Northern Ireland's transport links with Great Britain and the continent. It will run until the end of this year by which time some £180 million will have been spent, of which £120 million is being contributed by the European Community through the Northern Ireland transportation operational programme. Northern Ireland businesses will benefit from the enhancements to the region's road and rail networks and ports and airports.

Glass-fronted Fires

23. Mr. A. Cecil Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what representations he has received about problems relating to glass-fronted fires in Housing Executive houses.

Mr. Atkins: The Government have received representations from Members of Parliament, a general practitioner and a private individual. These representations were concerned mainly about possible effects on health. The most recent representations to the Department were in October 1991.

Homelessness

24. Ms Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many people are currently homeless in Northern Ireland; and what action the Government are taking to provide accommodation for the homeless.

Mr. Atkins: It is not possible to give a figure for the total number of homeless people in Northern Ireland at any specific point in time. However, I am advised by the chief executive of the Northern Ireland Housing Executive that at 5 March 1993 the number of households living in temporary accommodation secured for them under the homeless provisions of the Housing (Northern Ireland) Order 1988 was 370.

The Housing Executive has statutory responsibility for dealing with homelessness, and arranges both temporary and permanent accommmodation throughout Northern Ireland. Its housing selection scheme gives top priority particularly to families accepted as homeless. In addition, the Housing Executive and other local bodies provide extensive advice to those who are homeless, or are threatened with homelessness.

Balance of Trade (Republic)

25. Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the balance of trade between the Republic of Ireland and Northern Ireland in the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. Atkins: The information requested is not available from United Kingdom Government sources. However, I refer my hon. Friend to tables 9A and 9B of Trade Statistics (December 1991) published by the Central Statistics Office, Dublin, a copy of which is in the Library.

General Practitioners

26. Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is that latest estimate of the number of general practitioners in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Hanley: As at 1 March 1993 there were 948 general practitioners in Northern Ireland.

Electricity Privatisation

27. Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he expects to announce arrangements for the privatisation of Northern Ireland Electricity.

Mr. Atkins: Arrangements for the privatisation of NIE are kept under constant review and I hope to be able to make an announcement about this in the near future.

Eastern Health Board

28. Sir James Kilfedder: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will establish a full and public inquiry into the finance and administration of the Eastern health board.

Mr. Hanley: My noble Friend has no plans to establish such an inquiry.

Constitutional Talks

29. Mr. Soley: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what discussions he has held on the future constitutional position of Northern Ireland with representatives of (a) the Irish or (b) the United States Government.

Sir Patrick Mayhew: I met the Irish Foreign Minister, Mr. Spring, on 22 January and, in a formal intergovernmental conference, on 3 February. On both occasions constitutional issues were among the subjects we discussed. I have had no discussions with representatives of the United States Government on the future constitutional position of Northern Ireland.

The United Kingdom Government's position is widely understood: the present status of Northern Ireland as a part of the United Kingdom will not change without the consent of a majority of the people who live there.

Health Service

Ms Rachel Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will review the proposal of the Eastern health board to move the maternity service from the Jubilee unit in Belfast City hospital.

Mr. Hanley: The Eastern health and social services board is presently consulting the public on its purchasing intentions for acute hospital services. If these consultations result in firm recommendations from the board for major changes in the provision of services, including maternity services, these will require the endorsement of my noble Friend, Lord Arran, before they can be implemented.

Ms Rachel Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will (a) remove the Eastern health board from health care planning and (b) establish an independent inquiry into the health care needs of the people in the area of the Eastern health board.

Mr. Hanley: The Eastern health and social services board has direct responsibility as an agent of the Department of Health and Social Services for the health and personal social care of the residents in its area. There are no plans to remove the board from health care planning.

There is no need for an independent inquiry into the health care needs of the people in the area of the Eastern board. The board is required to assess the health of its population in devising its purchasing plans and I am content that it does so satisfactorily.

Departmental Functions

Mr. Duncan: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the work of the Department of Health and Social Security (Northern Ireland) since 1979.

Mr. Hanley: Since 1978-79, expenditure on health and personal social services in Northern Ireland has increased by 38 per cent. after allowing for general inflation. Cost improvement programmes have also generated savings of nearly £83 million for investment in services to patients and clients.

Over the same period, levels of activity have increased by 33 per cent. Since 1981 the number of hospital in-patients has risen by 12 per cent. from 249,198 to 278,960; the number of day cases has increased sixfold, from 9,853 to 60,094; the number of operations has risen by 29 per cent.; and the number of out-patient attendances has risen by 17 per cent., from 1·7 million to 2·0 million. Considerable investment has been made in key regional services including cardiac surgery, orthopaedics and the treatment of end stage renal failure.

There have also been substantial increases in the numbers of professional staff; there are now 19 per cent. more doctors and dentists; 53 per cent. more general dental practitioners; 17 per cent. more hospital doctors; 28 per cent. more general practitioners; 5 per cent. more nurses and midwives; and 111 per cent. more qualified social workers. Particular emphasis has been placed on the training and development of professional staff. The training budget currently stands at £15 million a year.

Since 1979, perinatal and infant mortality rates in Northern Ireland have been reduced from 16·6 and 14·8 to 8·4 and 7·3 respectively. A confidential inquiry into stillbirths and deaths in infancy to reduce further the numbers of stillbirths and deaths in infancy was launched in January 1993.

Through the emphasis on developing community services, there has been a reduction of 37 per cent. and 38 per cent. respectively in the number of patients in psychiatric and mental handicap hospitals.

A code of practice under the Mental Health (NI) Order 1986 was published in 1992. This gives guidance in relation to the admission of patients to hospitals and the reception of patients into guardianship under the order and in relation to the medical treatment of patients suffering from mental disorder.

A major study was commissioned to evaluate the outcome of community care for long stay patients discharged from psychiatric and mental handicap care since 1987.

Implementation of the major reforms flowing from "Promoting Better Health", "Working for Patients" and "People First" will lead to better management of the resources available and better services to patients and clients.

Six health and social services trusts will become operational from 1 April 1993 and four more have been approved but must await a change in legislation before they can be set up. A further three units have been invited to develop applications for a third round.

Twenty GP fund holders will begin to manage their own budgets from 1 April 1993 and a further 34 have expressed an interest in a second wave.

The charter for patients and clients published in March 1992 provides a framework for action to raise the quality of health and personal social services and to make these more responsive to the needs of patients and clients.

The social security benefits system has been maintained and reformed on the same basis as in the rest of the United Kingdom. The cash value of pensions and other long-term benefits have been secured in real terms.

In July 1991 a Social Security Agency was established as part of the next steps initiative, and in 1992 it published a customer charter setting out the standard of service the public has a right to expect. The agency attracted around 850 jobs to Northern Ireland provided services to the benefit network in Great Britain.

A child support agency for Northern Ireland is being established from 5 April 1993. Also, a regional child support agency centre is being established to provide back office services to Great Britain in relation to the assessment and collection of child maintenance.

Adoption law and practice were brought broadly into line with the rest of the United Kingdom. A major new guide on the management of child abuse was issued to health and social services boards in 1989.

Since 1979 aid to the voluntary sector has been increased by 228 per cent. in real terms. The Department has taken responsibility for the community volunteering scheme since April 1992. It was previously administered by the Department of Economic Development.

In 1992 the Registered Homes (NI) Order set out new legislation on the registration and inspection of private and voluntary sector residential care homes and nursing homes.

ENVIRONMENT

Urban Regeneration

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list for each year since 1981 (a) at year-on-year prices and (b) at current prices, the total amount of moneys made available to (i) urban programme authorities for urban regeneration in the categories (1) urban development corporation, (2) urban programme, (3) city grant, or urban regeneration grant or urban development grant, (4) derelict land grant, (5) city challenge, (6) housing action trusts, (7) estate action, (8) safer cities, (9) urban crime fund, (10) task forces, (11) city action teams, (12) transport policies and programme, (13) supplementary transport grant and (14) other programmes available relating to linkage between economic, social and physical regeneration.

Mr. Robin Squire: Several Government Departments contribute to urban regeneration through a wide range of programmes under the action for cities initiative. Since 1981, my Department's own programmes have spent as follows:

Local Government Finance

Mr. Trotter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the difference in the level of Government grant and business rates per head of the population and per household between Hampshire county council, Basingstoke and Deane district, and Newcastle metropolitan authority.

Mr. Robin Squire: The amounts of revenue support grant (RSG) and income from the uniform business rate (UBR) per head of resident population and per household for 1993-94 for the authorities requested are as follows:

Local Authority	RSG £ per head	RSG £ per household	UBR £ per head	UBR £ per household
Hampshire	214	558	205	537
Basingstoke and Deane	26	71	35	94
Newcastle upon Tyne	408	1,001	213	521
Tyne and Wear Fire and Civil Defence Authority	19	47	8	20
Northumbria Police Authority	23	58	20	49

The total support for a metropolitan area includes the RSG and UBR given to the relevant fire and civil defence and police authorities. The household figures are taken from the 1991 census results.

Council Tax

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the number of properties in council tax H band and the percentage of the total in (a) Pendle, (b) the City of Westminster, (c) Wandsworth and (d) Ribble Valley.

Mr. Robin Squire: The information requested is as follows:

Local Authority	Number of dwellings in council tax band H	Percentage of dwellings in counci tax band H
Pendle	67	0·2
Westminster	13,829	13·0
Wandsworth	1,668	1·4
Ribble Valley	263	1·3

Notes: The figures shown above are based upon the number of dwellings on the proposed valuation list provided to local authorities between 15 November and 1 December 1992.

Public Bodies

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many appointments to the public bodies listed in "Public Bodies" for his Department were made from names supplied by the public appointments unit; and if he will list them.

Mr. Howard: "Public Bodies 1992" identifies 3,287 appointments to public bodies sponsored by my Department. Of these nearly 2,400 appointments are to valuation tribunals, members of which are appointed by local authorities. For the remainder, the public appointments unit is usually asked to supply names for consideration alongside names offered by other sources, including professional and representative groups and self-nominations. No central record is maintained of the sources of names of appointees. In some cases appointees were nominated from more than one source but, from the information readily available, it appears that the following appointments were principally from names supplied by the public appointments unit:

London Docklands Development Corporation
Mr. J. M. Pickard (Chairman)
Lord Cocks
Sir Christopher Foster
Mr. R. Rankin

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what percentage share of total departmental spending was accounted for by non-departmental public bodies in each year since 1979.

Mr. Howard: The percentage share of total expenditure by my Department accounted for by non-departmental public bodies since 1986-87 was as follows:

Year	Percentage
1986-87	10·8
1987-88	11·1
1988-89	10·0
1989-90	12·7
1990-91	7·1
1991-92	5·9

Information before 1986-87 is not readily available on a consistent basis.

Redundant Service Men

Ms Janet Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what assessment he has made of the possible additional demands on local housing authorities and housing associations from redundant British service men and women returning home from overseas; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Baldry: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Gosport (Mr. Viggars) on 27 January 1993, Official Report col. 763.

Travellers

Mr. Robert Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to make a statement following the appeal on the proposed gipsy site at Bickerton, near Wetherby.

Mr. Baldry: A local inquiry was held in October last year into the compulsory purchase order for acquisition of this site. The inspector's report has been received and is currently being considered. I expect the decision to be issued shortly.

Rent Deposit Schemes

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the local authorities in England which have operated a rent deposit scheme since May 1992; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that my hon. Friend gave to the hon. Member for Dulwich (Ms Jowell) on 16 March 1993 Official Report, column 82.

Compulsory Competitive Tendering

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he had received from the Cleaning and Support Services Association in relation to the Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations 1981 and compulsory competitive tendering by local authorities.

Mr. Robin Squire: My right hon. Friend has received a number of written representations from the Cleaning and Support Services Association, and officials from my Department have also met with the director general to discuss his association's concerns.

The association has been sent a copy of the statement and guidance note on the Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) (TUPE) Regulations 1981 which my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster issued on 11 March Official Report, columns 648-49) and a copy of the statement on TUPE in relation to compulsory competitive tendering by local authorities made by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on the same day (Official Report, columns 662-64).

Business Rates

Mr. James Hill: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what proposals he is making to introduce modifications to the uniform business rate to help small business.

Mr. Robin Squire: As announced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his Budget statement on 16 March, we propose in 1993-94 to freeze in real terms the rates bills of those ratepayers whose bills would otherwise increase under the transitional arrangements. This change is worth £320 million to businesses in 1993-94 and £220 million in 1994-95. It follows the £1.25 billion package which the Government announced last year to relieve the burden of rates on businesses, many of which will see reductions in their rate bills in 1993-94 as their remaining gains from the 1990 reforms come through.

Commercial Peat Extraction

Mr. Kevin Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his answer of 8 December, Official Report, columns 575-76, what action he will take to ensure that the sites involved in the English Nature-Fisons agreement are not subject to further damage from further commercial peat extraction.

Mr. Maclean: This is a matter for English Nature and I am confident that it is pursuing it vigorously. The vegetated areas previously planned for peat extraction on Thorne and Hatfield moors, Wedholme flow and Glasson moss are intact and intended to remain so. Water levels have been successfully raised and the prime areas of these SSSIs are now in much better condition than before negotiation started. Peat excavation has now ceased on SSSI areas owned by Fisons in Somerset and plans to raise water levels are well advanced. The agreement with Fisons will be designed to minimise damage to those areas where peat excavation may continue.

Mr. Kevin Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his answer of 8 December, Official Report, column 575, what progress has been made in finalising the agreement between English Nature and Fisons to secure areas of lowland peatland of conservation importance including Thorne and Hatfield moors; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maclean: English Nature and Fisons are reaching the final stages of discussions to conclude the leaseback arrangements on the land being worked for peat. They have agreed outline heads of terms for an agreement relating to the future moors management to accompany the leaseback and terms concerning the conveyance of Fisons' currently unworked peatlands to English Nature. Because of the complexity of this transaction the legal stages in the conveyance may be lengthy.

Aluminium Sulphate

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what regulations exist, laying down safety standards for the production of aluminium sulphate and emissions from that process into the atmosphere.

Mr. Maclean: Emissions from the production of aluminium sulphate are subject to control under part III of the Environmental Protection Act 1990 if they give rise to a statutory nuisance. Exposure to aluminium sulphate at the workplace is subject to the general provisions of the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974 and, in particular, the Control of Substances Hazardous to Health Regulations 1988. Under these regulations, aluminium sulphate has been assigned an occupational exposure standard of 2mg/m³, averaged over an eight-hour period.

City Challenge

Mr. Betts: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how much (a) public and (b) private expenditure has been invested to date in each of the city challenge areas in schemes associated with city challenge.

Mr. Robin Squire: Latest estimates are as follows:

City Challenge Pacemaker	Expenditure £000's Private sector 1992-93	Public sector 1992-93
Bradford	10,195	7,629
Dearne Valley	6,428	24,889
Lewisham	16,955	4,286
Liverpool	20,200	7,775
Manchester	6,250	16,300
Middlesbrough	3,035	2,900
Newcastle	2,927	8,916
Nottingham	1,950	936
Tower Hamlets	7,691	8,538
Wirral	32,482	14,000
Wolverhampton	9,500	4,800

Note:
Public sector excludes £7·5 million City Challenge annual funding in each area.

These are the latest estimates supplied by city challenge pacemakers for the year ending 31 March 1993. Final outturns will be available from annual reports, due in September 1993.

Chemical Plants (Pollution)

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what regulations exist to protect adjoining residents from pollution by chemical plants.

Mr. Maclean: Under part I of the Environmental Protection Act 1990, prescribed processes require authorisation by Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution, and chemical plants fall into this category. In granting authorisation, the enforcing authority must seek to ensure that the best available techniques not entailing excessive cost, are employed to prevent or minimise the release of any substance prescribed for any medium.

HMIP has prepared guidance in the form of process guidance notes for inspectors, on the standards to be applied to the processes it controls. The first nine notes in the chemical sector which, cover organic chemical processes were published on 27 January in preparation for the processes coming under integrated pollution control from 1 May 1993. These notes are publicly available for the benefit of operators and other interested parties. Further guidance notes for the chemical sector will be published during 1993.

Copies of the guidance notes have been placed in the Library.

London Forum

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what functions, responsibilities and overall remit have been given to the London Forum; and who drew up the brief;

(2) what expenses will be paid to members of the London Forum; what staff are at their disposal; and where the forum will be based;

(3) to whom the London Forum will report; and what arrangements are being made for Parliament to consider the forum's work;

(4) if he will give details of the budget allocated for the London Forum;

(5) what targets he has set for the London Forum to achieve in terms of increasing tourism and employment in London;

(6) why he considered it necessary to set up the London Forum;

(7) what consideration was given to choosing members of elected local authorities to serve on the London Forum;

(8) if meetings of the London Forum will be open to the public and press; and if he will make a statement;

(9) who chose the members of the London Forum; and what criteria were used in determining membership.

Sir George Young: My right hon. Friend is convening the London Forum. It will be a private sector company which will look to the private sector for its funding.

Sir Allen Sheppard was invited by my right hon. Friend to be chairman. Members from the private sector have been invited to join the board by Sir Allen, following consultation with interested parties including the CBI, the London Chamber of Commerce and Industry, and my right hon. Friend. As a private sector company it will be for the Forum to draw up its business plan and to decide its working methods.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment who is paying for the launch of the London Forum at the Regent hotel on 29 March; and what is the cost.

Sir George Young: My Department will meet the costs of the launch event for the London Forum, which are estimated to be around £15,000.

Housing, Manchester

Mr. Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what proportion of the sums announced in the autumn statement for the purchase of existing houses was allocated to housing associations in Greater Manchester.

Mr. Baldry: Allocations were not made to particular local authority areas, but rather to housing associations working in larger areas, who were asked to ensure a reasonable distribution of purchases across local authority areas. A total of 6·8 per cent. of funds have been allocated to the Housing Corporation's north west region.

Housing Associations

Mr. Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the total number of houses acquired by housing associations using the sums allocated in the autumn statement from (a) unsold houses from builders, (b) unsold houses from owner/occupiers and (c) repossessions.

Mr Baldry: Of the 12,611 properties purchased by 12 March 6,891 were bought from builders or developers, 4,824 were private treaty sales, and 559 were repossessed properties purchased from lenders.

Mr. Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the total number of house bought by housing associations using the sums allocated for this purpose in the autumn statement (a) nationally and (b) in Greater Manchester.

Mr. Baldry: Of the 12,611 properties purchased in England by 12 March, 691 were in Greater Manchester.

Waste Trade

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what estimate he has made of the annual value of the trade in waste.

Mr. Eggar: I have been asked to reply.

The total value of United Kingdom trade for trade commodity headings containing an element of waste was £770 million in exports and £1,090 million in imports during 1991. The vast majority of this material was non-hazardous.

Local Authority Employees

Mr. Nigel Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the total number of full-time equivalent local authority employees in England, in each financial year since 1979-80, stating separately how many of the total were teachers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Robin Squire [holding answer 12 March 1993]: The information is as follows:

Year (at March)	FTE's—All Services (000s)	FTE'S Lecturers and Teachers (000s)
1980	1,960	538
1981	1,924	528
1982	1,891	520
1983	1,890	516
1984	1,893	514
1985	1,892	509
1986	1,903	507
1987	1,918	508
1988	1,936	510
1989	1,921	504
1990	1,900	484
1991	1,890	478
1992	1,866	475

Source: Joint Staffing Watch for England.

Notes: 1. In April 1989 approximately 23,000 full-time equivalent lecturers and teachers were lost from local authority employment when polytechnics and further education institutions transferred to the private sector.

2. Between January 1990 and January 1992 approximately 7,000 full-time equivalent teachers have been lost to the local authority sector because schools have opted to become self-governing state (grant-maintained) schools.

Housing Benefit

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on his assessment of the effect of benefit tapers on low wage earners and of the effects on the unemployed and low wage earners of changes in levels of subsidy to the social housing sector.

Mr. Burt: I have been asked to reply.

Benefit tapers ensure that low wage earners who are able to increase their income by working harder, or for longer hours, do not lose all or more of any increase in earnings because of the withdrawal of income-related benefits. The current system of tapers concentrates help on those at the bottom of the income scale.

Housing benefit is available to people who are in or out of work, to meet reasonable rents or reasonable rent increases.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what action the Government are taking to prevent an increase in the number of unemployed people dependent on housing benefit to pay their rent.

Mr. Burt: I have been asked to reply.

We have no plans to change the rules for housing benefit.

NATIONAL HERITAGE

Royal Opera House

Sir Thomas Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what progress has been made towards agreeing the future financing of the royal opera house; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: It is for the Arts Council of Great Britain to decide on appropriate funding for the three companies which make up the royal opera house. In 1993-94 it will receive a grant of £19,521,000.

International Initiatives Fund

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Falmouth and Camborne (Mr. Coe) of 9 March, Official Report, columns 512-13, what proposals he has in relation to the funding of and responsibility for the international initiatives fund, as regards its repartition between English, Scottish and Welsh arts organisations.

Mr. Brooke: From 1994-95 the funding for the international initiatives fund, which is currently administered by the Arts Council of Great Britain, will be shared out amongst the English, Scottish and Welsh arts councils in the following proportions: England 83·7 per cent, Scotland 10·45 per cent. and Wales 5·85 per cent.

Arrangements will be put in place to facilitate policy and executive coherence between the three arts councils on international work.

TV Licence Evasion

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how many persons were proceeded against for television licence evasion in (a) Inverclyde, (b) Strathclyde region and (c) Scotland as a whole in each of the past seven years.

Mr. Brooke: The information is not available in the form requested. Statistics on prosecutions for television licence evasion are recorded for each TV licensing enforcement office (TVLEO) area. Glasgow TVLEO area covers Inverclyde and most of Strathclyde, but statistics specifically for Inverclyde and Strathclyde are not separately recorded. Information covering the Glasgow TVLEO area and Scotland as a whole in the years for which figures are available is set out in the table.

Year	Number of Prosecutions
	Glasgow TVLEO area	Scotland
1988	2,675	12,185
1989	3,754	12,937
1990	2,563	11,736
1991	3,899	16,998
1992	3,895	15,102

Museums

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what support his Department gives to museums concerning (a) the second world war and (b) the intelligence services.

Mr. Key: The Department of National Heritage provides grant-in-aid in support for national museums and galleries including the Imperial War museum, which holds collections associated with the second world war and the intelligence services. The Government also provide support to the museums in the regions through the Museums and Galleries Commission and its network of area museum councils, which may assist museums holding such collections.

EMPLOYMENT

Unemployment Benefit

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how much money in unemployment benefits is paid in total to unemployed persons between the ages of (a) 20 to 30 years, (b) 31 to 40 years, (c) 41 to 50 years and (d) 51 to 60 years.

Mr. Burt: I have been asked to reply.

The information is not available in the form requested.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Public Bodies

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many appointments to the public bodies listed in "Public Bodies" for his Department were made from names supplied by the public appointments unit; and if he will list them.

Miss Widdecombe: None.

Pensions

Mr. Knox: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will publish figures for 1992 showing the numbers and percentages of (a) men and (b) women who reached state pension age with entitlement to (i) a full category A old age pension or national insurance invalidity pension, (ii) a full category B old age pension or NI invalidity pension equivalent and (iii) no basic old age or invalidity pension.

Miss Widdecombe: The information is not available in the form requested.

The available information regarding recipients of retirement pension resident in Great Britain at 31 March 1992 is in the table:

thousands

	Men aged 65	Women aged 60
Full category A retirement pension	180·0	46·1
Full category B retirement pension (widow/widower)	—	4·0
Full category B retirement pension (married woman)[1]	n.a.	23·1

Notes:

1. The standard rate of category B retirement pension payable to a married woman is approximately 60 per cent. of the full category A rate.

(i) Information regarding the individual ages and rates of notional entitlement to retirement pension is not available in respect of invalidity benefit recipients who have attained pensionable age.

(ii) The following main categories of benefit recipients are not shown in the table:

people receiving pension at less than the full rate;
women receiving pension partly on their own and partly on their husbands' contributions; people receiving invalidity benefit post-pensionable age.

Provisional population estimates for mid-1991, the latest date for which information is available, show 264,300 men aged 65 and 297,300 women aged 60 resident in Great Britain.

European Community (Incomes)

Mr. Knox: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the most recent estimate of the number of (a) families and (b) people in each member state of the EC with incomes below 50 per cent. of average earnings; and what are the comparable figures for 1975 and 1985.

Mr. Burt: Information comparing incomes with average earnings is not available. Information on the distribution of people below fractions of average income in the United Kingdom is available in my Department's publication "Households Below Average Income: A Statistical Analysis 1979-1988-89", copies of which are in the Library. Mr. Knox: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer of 15 February to the hon. Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) Official Report, column 100, on claims for income support in 1992-93, what percentage of families claimed income support, distinguishing between families above state pension age and those of working age, and showing two-parent families with children and one-parent families, separately.

Mr. Burt: The latest available information is in the table.

Family type	Percentage of all IS recipients
All Families	37·0
Families over Pension Age	2·6
Families under Pension Age	34·4
All Couples with children	9·4
Couples over pension age, with children	0·1
Couples under pension age, with children	9·3
All Lone Parents	20·0
Lone Parents over pension age	0·1
Lone Parents under pension age	19·9

2. Percentages quoted are those of the Income Support caseload. It is not possible to give percentages of the total population for each of the specified groups.
3. Pension age is defined as 65 for men, 60 for women. Only the age of the claimant has been taken into account for this reply.
4. Temporarily separated cases have been treated as single.

Child Benefit

Mr. Olner: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security in what circumstances child benefit is continued after a child is abducted and taken out of the United Kingdom by one of its parents.

Mr. Burt: There is nothing in child benefit legislation relating specifically to child abduction cases. When a child and one parent leave the United Kingdom permanently child benefit normally ceases from the date of departure; after eight weeks if the absence is temporary. Exceptions are that child benefit might be payable to parent abroad with the child if the parent has gone to work in a European Community country, or a country with which the United Kingdom has a reciprocal social security agreement, and remains liable to pay United Kingdom national insurance contributions; also if they have gone abroad temporarily and remain liable to pay United Kingdom income tax.

Lone Parents

Mr. Knox: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what percentage of families with children were one-parent families, in each member state of the EC, in 1975 and the latest date available.

Mr. Burt: In Great Britain the proportion of families with dependent children headed by a lone parent has increased from 10 per cent. in 1975 to 19 per cent. in 1990 —source: "General Household Survey". Comparable figures are not available for 1975 for other EC countries.

Table 1 provides the best available estimates of the proportion of all families with children aged under 18 headed by a lone parent at the end of the 1980s. The estimates were published in a report to the European Commission in 1992. They should be treated with caution because the information and definitions used to derive them are not completely comparable.

Mr. Hall: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what percentage of lone parents in the area of the Benefits Agency office which includes Warrington, South claimed income support at the latest available date.

Mr. Burt: The administration of income support is a matter for Mr. Michael Bichard, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member with such information as is available, and a copy will be placed in the Library.

Letter from Michael Bichard to Mr. Mike Hall, dated 17 March 1993:

As Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency it is my responsibility to answer questions about relevant operational matters. I am therefore replying to your recent Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Social Security asking what percentage of lone parents in the area of the Benefits Agency Office which includes Warrington, South claimed Income Support at the latest available date.

The Income Support Management Information Statistics for the end of February 1993 show that 7,120 customers within the Benefits Agency's North Cheshire District, which includes the constituency of Warrington, South, received the Lone Parent Premium within their Income Support entitlement. However, general population statistics on lone parents are only available for Great Britain as a whole. We are therefore unable to express this number of customers as a percentage of the total number of lone parents in the District's catchment area.

I hope you find this reply helpful. A copy of this letter will appear in the Official Report and a copy will be placed in the Library.

Independent Living Fund

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what provision has been made for those people who are eligible for the independent living fund but have missed the deadlined for final applications.

Mr. Scott: No specific provision has been made. Local authorities have primary responsibility for providing care for all disabled people.

The Independent Living (1993) Fund will be open to new applications from 1 April.

Social Security Expenditure

Mr. Knox: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will show expenditure on social security as percentages of gross domestic product in each member state of the EC in 1975, 1985 and the latest year available.

Mr. Burt: Information is not available to compare social security expenditure in each member state of the EC. Comparisons are made of social protection expenditure, which embraces a greater range of functions and includes items such as the supply of health services. A comparison of social protection expenditure is in the table.

Expenditure on social protection as percentage of GDP

Part-time Study

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will review the 21 hours rule regarding eligibility for payment of benefit to those wishing to study for fewer than 21 hours per week and who are out of work.

Mr. Burt: The 21-hour rule enables unemployed claimants of income support to follow part-time education courses while continuing their search for work. We have no plans to review this rule.

Social fund

Mr. Fabricant: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what the 1993-94 gross budget for the discretionary part of the social fund will be.

Mr. Scott: I am pleased to announce that the social fund gross discretionary budget for 1993-94 will be £346 million. £95 million will be allocated to grants, £250 million to loans and £1 million will be held as a contingency reserve. The new allocations represent an overall increase of £44 million—nearly 15 per cent—over the gross budget at April 1992.

The social fund continues to provide valuable help to large number of people. Between April 1992 and January 1993 almost 1·5 million non-repayable grants and interest-free loans were made. This is nearly 200,000 more than during the same period last year—an increase of 14 per cent. the increase from April will allow even more people to be helped. Details of the allocations for individual districts will be announced shortly.

Animal Carers

Mr. Sproat: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he expects to receive the report from the inquiry into the self-employed status of animal carers and the firm, Animal Aunts.

Miss Widdecombe: We hope to receive the inquirer's report by the end of this month.

Housing Benefit

Mr. George Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) if he will provide for each district and islands council in Scotland for each year since 1990-91 (a) the numbers and amounts of discretionary payments and their percentage in relation to total housing benefit expenditure and (b) the numbers and amounts of housing benefit overpayments and the amount as a percentage of the authority's overall housing benefit expenditure;

(2) if he will provide for each district and islands council in Scotland for each available year from 1990-91 (a) a breakdown of the numbers of housing benefit claimants, by rent rebate and rent allowance categories and the total amounts paid under each heading and (b) the numbers and amounts of backdated housing benefit payments and the amount paid as a percentage of each local authority's housing benefit expenditure.

Mr. Burt: [holding answer 11 March 1993]: The available information has been placed in the Library.

SCOTLAND

Consultant Posts

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the number of vacant consultant posts in (a) mental illness, (b) child and adolescent psychiatry, (c) forensic psychiatry, (d) mental handicap, (e) old age psychiatry and (f) psychotherapy; and if he will give the number of vacant posts as a percentage of all posts in these specialties.

Mr. Stewart: Information on the total number of vacant consultant posts is not available centrally. The table shows information collected about consultant posts which had been vacant for six months or longer in the year ended 30 September 1991, the latest date for which information is available.

Long-term vacancies in consultant posts by selected specialty; numbers at 30 September 1991.

Specialty	Number	Long-term vacancies as per cent of all consultants in post
General psychiatry	5	2
Child and adolescent psychiatry	2	5
Forensic psychiatry	1	9
Mental handicap	1	7
Old age psychiatry	2	29
Psychotherapy	1	11

Long-term vacancies are defined as established paid posts which have been unoccupied for a period of at least six months during the year up to 30 September.

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many consultant posts in (a) mental illness, (b) child and adolescent psychiatry, (c) forensic psychiatry, (d) mental handicap, (e) old age psychiatry and (f) psychotherapy, have been vacant for (i) longer than one year and (ii) longer than two years.

Mr. Stewart: The information requested is not available centrally.

Community Care

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make available to the public information on the arrangements made between health boards and social work departments concerning care in the community.

Mr. Stewart: Leaflets describing the changes which will take place in community care arrangements are currently being widely distributed.

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what guidance has been given to local authorities to ensure than an individual's right to choose to be placed in residential or nursing home care is observed, when assessed under care in the community provisions.

Mr. Stewart: The draft of "Direction on Choice of Residential Accommodation and Associated Guidance" has been sent to local authorities and others for comment. Following consideration of the comments the direction and guidance in final form will be issued shortly.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what advice has been given to primary care and hospital staff about the joint discharge arrangements between social work departments and health boards; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stewart: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mrs. Fyfe) on 17 March at column 275.

Children (Legal Procedures)

Mr. Olner: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will seek to amend the Family Law Act 1986, to make court orders to hand over children directly enforceable throughout the United Kingdom without the need for further enforcement proceedings and applications for leave aid.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The current procedures set out in the Family Law Act 1986 are based on well-researched recommendations made by the Law Commission and the Scottish Law Commission in their joint "Report on Custody of Children—Jurisdiction and Enforcement within the United Kingdom" (Law Com No. 138) (Scot Law Com No. 91). As the Family Law Act 1986 has application in the various jurisdictions throughout the United Kingdom any proposal to change the rules in Scotland would require consideration at the same time within the other jurisdictions. I have no evidence that the current arrangements are not working satisfactorily or that they give rise to unnecessary delays.

Mr. Olner: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps are being taken to ensure that in all proceedings relating to child abduction—article 12 of the United Nations convention on the rights of the child—are applied with respect that the wishes of the child should be ascertained by appropriately trained professionals and given consideration, if necessary, through separate legal representation in the light of the child's age and understanding.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: It is already the practice of the Scottish courts, in considering any matter which relates to the welfare of a child, to afford the child the opportunity in appropriate cases of putting his or her views to the court, and to seek a report from a trained professional.

In its report on "Family Law" (Scot Law Com No. 135), the Scottish Law Commission, among other matters, recommends that in considering whether to make an order relating to parental responsibilities or rights, or guardianship, a court should be required to give due consideration to any relevant views of the child concerned which are properly before it, taking account of the child's age and maturity. The commission also recommends that rules of court should ensure that a child who is capable of forming his or her own views and who wishes to have his or her views put directly before a court in any proceedings relating to parental responsibilities or rights, or guardianship, has a readily available procedural mechanism for doing so. We are currently giving careful consideration to these recommendations.

Mr. Olner: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will extend the passport office's powers to block the issue of a passport to cover objections made by the reporter to the children's panel on the basis of a children's hearing supervision requirement.

Mr. Charles Wardle: I have been asked to reply.

United Kingdom passports are issued in the United Kingdom at the discretion of the Home Secretary exercising the royal prerogative. The Passport Agency will accept an objection to the issue of a passport from the reporter to the children's panel if a warrent for the apprehension of a child has been issued with a view to detention in a place of safety.

Council House Sales

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the information that he has received from East Lothian district council and other sources about proxy purchasing of council houses by tenants who qualify for high discounts on behalf of third parties; and if he will introduce amendments to the Housing (Scotland) Act 1987 to prevent such practices.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: East Lothian district council wrote to the Scottish Office Environment Department last month referring to two cases which the council believes represent an abuse of the right-to-buy legislation. The Department is currently considering the information provided, and the council will receive a reply as soon as possible.

Scottish Homes

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received on behalf of Scottish Homes tenants who want to choose their local district or islands councils as alternative landlords; and if he will introduce an amendment to the Housing (Scotland) Act 1987 to include that option in the choices available to tenants.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: My right hon. Friend has received about 20 individual representations on this matter. He has no plans to make any changes to the present arrangements regarding sales of Scottish Homes' stock to alternative landlords under large scale voluntary transfer procedures or individual tenants' choice provisions. It has been made clear in guidance to Scottish homes that large scale sales of Scottish Homes' stock to a local authority should be considered only where there are special circumstances which do not compromise the Government's and Scottish Homes' policy objective of tenure diversification. It is expected that such circumstances will rarely arise.

Magazines

Mr. McFall: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will introduce legislation to make it illegal to distribute magazines depicting illegal and offensive weapons.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: It is an offence, under section 141 of the Criminal Justice Act 1988, to offer for sale or to expose or possess for the purpose of sale any weapons of a description specified by statutory instrument. We are willing to consider expanding the list of weapons so specified if we are notified of additional items that have no legitimate uses and can be clearly defined in law.

We have no plans at present to prohibit all advertising of illegal or offensive weapons or the distribution of such advertisements.

School Budgets

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received about difficulties faced by school boards in meeting their statutory duty to approve school budgets prior to the start of the financial year.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The only statutory obligation on school boards in relation to school budgets is the duty imposed by section 9 of the School Boards (Scotland) Act 1988 to approve a headteacher's proposals as to how funds provided by the education authority for the purchase of books and other teaching materials should be spent. No representations have been received on this subject.

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps he will take to ensure that information on resources allocated to a school in a financial year is available to the school's board prior to the start of that financial year.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Education authorities have a duty, under section 17(4) of the School Boards (Scotland) Act 1988 and the School Boards (Financial Information) (Scotland) Regulations 1990, to provide a budget statement to school boards by 5 April for the following financial year. I shall shortly be issuing guidelines for schemes of devolved school management which will involve further information on resources being made available to school boards.

Education Authorities

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish a list of education authorities in Scotland with the total number of pupils for which each education authority is responsible.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information requested was published in the Scottish Office Education Department statistical bulletin, "Schools, Pupils and Teachers in Scotland" (Edn/A11993/1, tables 3, 5, 7 and 9). A copy of the bulletin is in the House of Commons Library.

Class Sizes

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what measures he has taken recently to reduce the number of school classes to below 30 per teacher; and what pupil-to-teacher ratio he has as an educational policy objective.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Responsibility for the size of classes in Scottish schools rests with education authorities, in consultation with headteachers, and not with central Government. The current class size maxima are set out in the "Scheme of Conditions of Service for Teachers". The normal maximum for single stage primary classes and stage S1-S2 in secondary schools is 33 pupils per class, and 30 per class in S3-S6.

The latest available statistics (school census 1991) indicate that 87 per cent. of primary and 99 per cent. of secondary classes have 30 or fewer pupils.

The latest pupil to teacher ratios in Scottish primary and secondary schools are 19·5:1 and 12·4:1 respectively. We have no set target or objective but these figures can be compared with the equivalent ratios of 20·3:1 and 14:1 of 10 years ago.

Medical Negligence

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland in what circumstances legal aid is given in cases concerning complaints of medical negligence; and how many cases of medical negligence were supported by legal aid in each of the past five years in (a) Strathclyde region and (b) Scotland as a whole.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Legal aid is available for cases of medical negligence subject to the standard tests of reasonableness, probable cause and financial means. As with other cases involving personal injury, the maximum disposable income entitling an applicant in a medical negligence case to civil legal aid is £7,500 per year, as compared with £6,800 per year for other civil cases.

In 1991-92, 1,843 grants of civil legal aid were made in reparation cases, which include cases involving allegations of medical negligence. No further breakdown of cases within that category, or by location, is available.

EC Committee of the Regions

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what consultations he has held in relation to the setting up of meetings with interested parties concerning Scottish representation in the United Kingdom delegation to the Committee of the Regions; what provisions he is considering for the funding of a secretariat and other ancillary services; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stewart: The Government are considering the arrangements for nominating the United Kingdom representatives on the Committee of the Regions and what arrangements should be put in place to keep them informed of United Kingdom policy interests.

Secure Units

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what recent assessment he has made of the effectiveness of existing secure facilities for young people; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stewart: Secure accommodation has to be approved by the Secretary of State and for this purpose each unit is inspected formally every three years by the social work services inspectorate of the Scottish Office and by Her Majesty's inspectors of schools. During these inspections regard is paid to the care plans for each child, educational provision, scope for social development, etc. Follow-up monitoring visits are paid. In addition to these inspections a review of the provisions of secure accommodation throughout Scotland and the way in which it is meeting current needs will be carried out in the course of the current year.

Children's Homes

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what recent reports he has received concerning the management and functioning of children's homes in (a) Strathclyde and (b) Scotland as a whole; what plans he has to change the way in which such institutions are managed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stewart: A recent review of residential child care throughout Scotland was conducted by the Scottish Office's chief inspector for social work services. His report "Another Kind of Home" was published in December 1992 and its recommendations, including those on the training and recruitment of staff for children's homes, will be taken into account in the forthcoming White Paper on child care policy and law.

Nursing Homes

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to ensure that all elderly residents in nursing homes are registered with locally based general practitioners; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stewart: All nursing home residents have the right to seek the services of the general practitioner of their choice. The Nursing Homes Registration (Scotland) Regulations 1990 require the registered person to maintain a register of all patients which includes details of the resident's general medical practitioner. The health board, as the registering authority, is responsible for ensuring that requirements of the regulations are met.

Defendants (No Fixed Address)

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many persons ordered to appear at district courts in Strathclyde were of no fixed address in the latest year for which figures are retrievable.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information requested is not collected centrally.

Pupil Exclusions

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what educational options are available to those schoolchildren who have been (a) temporarily and (b) permanently excluded from their schools because of anti-social behaviour.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: This is a matter for parents, who have a duty to provide efficient education for their child, and for education authorities, which have a statutory duty to ensure the provision of adequate and efficient education for all children of school age in their areas. Options which may be appropriate, according to the individual circumstances, can include home tutoring, transfer to another school or entry to a special or independent school.

NHS Charges

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to introduce a system of charging patients for elements of care while in NHS hospitals; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stewart: My right hon. Friend has no plans to introduce such a system. The purpose of the NHS in Scotland is to provide health care on the basis of clinical need, irrespective of the individual's ability to pay.

Crime, Strathclyde

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many criminal offences were committed in total and by category of offence in Strathclyde region in each of the six months up to the latest available date.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The available information for April-September 1992 is given in the table.

Police Officers, Strathclyde

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list for each of the past 10 years the number of police officers in the Strathclyde police force area per head of population, together with the actual numbers.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information requested, for the most recent 10-year period for which population figures are available, is set out in the following table:

Year	Population of Strathclyde Region	Ratio of Police Officers to population of Strathclyde Region	Actual strength of Strathclyde Police as at 31 December
1982	2,398,938	1:351	6,833

Nursing Home Residents

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the guidelines about the degree to which palliative treatment ought to be given by general practitioners to elderly residents of nursing homes.

Mr. Stewart: The Scottish Health Service Advisory Council report "The Care of the Dying and Bereaved in Scotland", published in 1991, sets out general guidelines for good practice in the care of the dying. Health boards, as the registering authority under the Nursing Homes Registration (Scotland) Regulations 1990, expect nursing homes to follow central guidelines as a condition of their registration.

Integrated Administration and Control System Scheme

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he intends to issue details of the integrated administration and control system scheme; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Hector Monro: On current printing schedules, the issue of details of the integrated administration and control scheme to Scottish farmers will commence on Monday 22 March. Most farmers will have the literature on or before 26 March.

Children in Care

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many complaints he has received in each of the past five years concerning the treatment of children in care; on how many occasions in such cases he has ordered an inquiry to be made; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stewart: Most complaints relating to the treatment of children in care are directed to the relevant local authority which has statutory responsibility for dealing with such complaints under section 5B of the Social Work (Scotland) Act 1968. Where individuals have brought matters to the attention of my right hon. Friend, officials of the Scottish Office will generally make informal inquiries, but there have been no more than two or three minor complaints in each of the past few years. There have been two formal inquiries under section 99 of the Children Act 1975 in the last five years, following complaints made to the Secretary of State: the inquiry into child care policies in Fife and the Orkney inquiry.

Textbooks

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the amount spent on textbooks per pupil in (a) primary schools and (b) secondary schools in each year since 1983 in real terms.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information is contained in the following table. It has been compiled from local authority financial returns, which do not distinguish between text and library books.

Expenditure per pupil on text and library books adjusted to 1991-92 prices using the GDP deflator.

	Primary £	Secondary £
1983-84	14·32	21·26
1984-85	14·47	20·96
1985-86	12·81	19·36
1986-87	15·22	23·21
1987-88	12·21	17·07
1988-89	13·82	22·83
1989-90	13·89	20·08
1990-91	14·45	22·90

Housing

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what proposals he has made about the charter programme for a complaints procedure for housing tenants, for people on waiting lists and for homeless applicants; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The tenants charter for Scotland was published in December 1991 and includes a section entitled "If Things Go Wrong". Complaints by public sector tenants or people on waiting lists should be taken up with the relevant landlord, and each landlord should have a proper complaints procedure. Local authorities have a statutory duty to notify homeless applicants in writing of their decision on applications for housing, giving reasons for a refusal; and the homelessness code of guidance recommends an appeals procedure. If people are not satisfied with the way a complaint has been dealt with by a public sector landlord, they can ask for their case to be investigated by the local government ombudsman.

Bridges, River Clyde

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what proposals he has for the construction of road bridges across the River Clyde.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: My right hon. Friend has no proposals for the construction of trunk road bridges over the River Clyde. However, I understand that Strathclyde regional council, which is the local roads authority for the area, has proposals for two new low-level bridges adjacent to the Kingston bridge.

Water and Sewerage Services

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what (a) telephone communications, (b) written correspondence and (c) discussions have taken place between each of the 10 regional water companies in England and Wales and any of their subsidiaries and (i) himself, (ii) other Scottish Office Ministers and (iii) Scottish Office officials on his consultative document on the future of water and sewerage services in Scotland; and if he will provide details of the dates when such contacts took place.

Mr. Lang: Three of the 10 water and sewerage companies in England and Wales responded to the consultation paper "Investing For Our Future". A meeting was subsequently held by officials with representatives of one of those companies, at the company's request. Comprehensive records of telephone calls are not kept.

Fraud

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many prosecutions have been brought in Scotland in respect of fraud cases in each year since 1985 in (a) each sheriffdom and (b) in the High Court.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 15 March 1993]: The information requested is given in the table:

DEFENCE

Service Bands

Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 5 March, Official Report, column 342, why the band of the Prince of Wales's Own Regiment is not due to deploy with the regiment to Bosnia; what duties bandsmen of the Cheshire Regiment have carried out in Bosnia; who will carry out those duties during deployment of the Prince of Wales's Own Regiment; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Bandsmen of the Cheshire Regiment, deployed in Bosnia with the battalion, are being used primarily as medics and drivers. As an integral part of the battalion, the tasking and deployment of the band of the Prince of Wales's Own Regiment is at the discretion of the commanding officer. In this case, he has decided to employ the band on rear party duties as he has sufficient drivers and medics elsewhere in the battalion.

Missiles Programme

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what representations he has received about the future of the United Kingdom medium-range surface-to-air missile programme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Aitken: A number of representations have been received. Work on the evaluation of MSAM tenders was completed last September and we are now assessing the options in the context of our overall defence requirements. No decision has yet been made.

Nuclear Weapons Testing

Mr. Hutton: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what payments have been made by Her Majesty's Government to the United States Government in each year since 1979 in respect of the environmental costs of the British nuclear weapons testing programme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Aitken: The United Kingdom pays the cost levied by the United States authorities for each test on an individual basis. Included in the costs are payments covering arrangements for the management and disposal of radioactive wastes associated with the test, but none are made specifically in respect of environmental issues. The wastes are disposed of by the United States under recognised procedures.

Military Service

Sir John Hunt: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what steps he is taking to make the terms of military service more attractive.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: My Department remains committed to ensuring that the terms and conditions of service for the regular and volunteer reserve forces are designed to attract the highly motivated men and women who are required by the armed forces and are seeking a rewarding and challenging career.

WEU Reserve Forces

Sir John Hunt: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make it his policy to co-ordinate policy towards improving conditions for reserve service men among the member states of the Western European Union.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: There is already discussion on and co-ordination of policy towards reserve service men between the United Kingdom and its allies, including the member states of the Western European Union. This takes place under the auspices of the Western European Union, the National Reserve Forces Committee, and the Interallied Confederation of Reserve Officers.

Service Housing

Ms Janet Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what information he has about the housing needs of redundant British service men and women returning home from overseas; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: All service personnel selected for redundancy are invited to say where they intend to settle when they leave and what their housing intentions are. The replies from those made redundant in 1992-93 indicated that some 50 per cent. of personnel already owned their own homes and that the majority (over 75 per cent.) were confident about their housing arrangements. The replies also indicated that resettlement will be spread across the country and that the number of housing applications to individual local authorities is unlikely to be significant. For those with no firm plans for housing arrangements, the joint services housing advice office can provide comprehensive guidance on housing options. We will continue to monitor the situation.

Gulf War

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his latest assessment of the number of Iraqi (a) military personnel and (b) civilians killed during the Gulf war.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: My Department has no authoritative information on which to assess the number of casualties sustained by Iraq during the Gulf conflict.

Eurofighter 2000

Dr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects a contract to be placed for the development of a laser warner for Eurofighter 2000.

Mr. Aitken: Following a review of the operational requirement, we have concluded that a laser warner is a necessary part of the defensive aids suite for the RAF's Eurofighter 2000 aircraft. Following an international competition, Eurofighter GmbH will be awarding a sub-contract for development of the equipment to GEC-Ferranti. The order, which will be worth nearly £20 million, will support some 100 jobs in the Edinburgh area. At the moment this is a United Kingdom-only requirement, although Spain will be retaining the option to fit the equipment later.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Public Bodies

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many appointments to the public bodies listed in "Public Bodies" for his Department were made from names supplied by the public appointments unit; and if he will list them.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Details of the appointments for which my Department is responsible which have been made from names supplied by the public appointments unit are not readily available. My Department regularly consults the public appointments unit for names of suitably qualified candidates for consideration for a wide range of appointments.

Departmental Spending

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what percentage share of total departmental spending was accounted for by non-departmental public bodies in each year since 1979.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The percentage of total Home Office expenditure accounted for by grant funding to non-departmental public bodies is as follows:

Financial year	percentage
1979-80	2·0
1980-81	2·1
1981-82	1·5
1982-83	1·6
1983-84	1·7
1984-85	1·6
1985-86	1·7
1986-87	1·8
1987-88	1·8
1988-89	2·0
1989-90	2·0
1990-91	2·3
1991-92	2·6

Racehorse Doping

Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will call for a report from the chief constable of Devon and Cornwall police on the progress of his inquiries into the doping of the racehorse Her Honour;

(2) if he will call for a report from the chief constable of Surrey on the progress of his inquiries into the doping of the racehorse Flash of Straw at Yarmouth in 1992;

(3) when his Department was informed about the circumstances surrounding the doping of the racehorses Norwich and Bravefoot at Doncaster in 1990;

(4) when his Department was informed about the circumstances surrounding the doping of the racehorse Flash of Straw at Yarmouth in 1992;

(5) if he will call for a report from the chief constable of South Yorkshire on the progress of his inquiries into the doping of the racehorses Norwich and Bravefoot at Doncaster in 1990;

(6) what proposals he has to amend the law relating to the doping of racehorses for gain;

(7) when his Department was informed about the circumstances surrounding the recent doping of the racehorse Her Honour.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave to his questions on 15 March at column 43.

I have no plans to call for reports from the police.

As to the law, there is no offence of illegal doping as such. The question of criminal charges would be a matter for the prosecuting authorities, depending on the circumstances of the case.

Immigration Appeals

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the current number of outstanding appeals to the immigration appeals tribunal and the immigration tribunal.

Mr. John M. Taylor: I have been asked to reply.

As of this month, there were 750 applications for leave to appeal outstanding before the immigration appeals tribunal, and 177 appeals. There were 19,077 cases outstanding before the immigration adjudicators; of those, 11,334 are estimated to be cases where the parties have not yet indicated their readiness to proceed, and 364 cases are estimated to be paper cases, which will not require an oral hearing.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Departmental Spending

Dr. Wright: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what percentage shares of total departmental spending was accounted for by non-departmental public bodies in each year since 1979.

Mr. John M. Taylor: Figures for the period 1979 to 1983 are not available. The percentage shares of total departmental spending accounted for by non-departmental public bodies in each year since are: 0·85 per cent. in 1983-84; 0·65 per cent. in 1984-85; 0·71 per cent. in 1985-86; 0·8 per cent. in 1986-87; 1·15 per cent. in 1987-88; 57·88 per cent. in 1988-89; 60·93 per cent. in 1989-90; 61·93 per cent. in 1990-91 and 60·45 per cent. in 1991-92 the last financial year for which figures are available. The substantial increase from 1988-89 onwards is as a result of the setting up of the Legal Aid Board, which has assumed responsibility from the Law Society for the administration of the legal aid fund. Expenditure in relation to legal aid for 1983-88 is not included in the figures above since this was not expenditure accounted for by an NDPB.

House Repossessions

Mr. Hall: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many house repossession orders were made in the county courts in each year since 1978-79 involving houses in the Warrington South constituency.

Mr. John Taylor: The earliest year for which information is available is 1987. The table shows the total number of mortgage possession orders made in Warrington county court during each year from 1987 to 1992. These figures cover properties throughout Warrington. They do not indicate how many houses have been repossessed through the courts as not all of the orders will have resulted in the issue and execution of warrants of possession. The figures relating solely to properties in the Warrington South constituency could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. The 1992 figures are provisional and are liable to revision to take account of late amendments.

Probate Service

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department, pursuant to his answer of 26 October, Official Report c. 436-37, what progress has been made in relation to the improvements in the probate service referred to; when a report on these improvements will be available; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John M. Taylor: Following the report by the Comptroller and Auditor General of February 1992, a review of the organisation and working methods of the probate service is being undertaken internally. The review is expected to be concluded shortly.

Public Bodies

Dr. Wright: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many appointments to the public bodies listed in "Public Bodies" for his Department were made from names supplied by the public appointments unit; and if he will list them.

Mr. John M. Taylor: Six of the current appointments made by the Lord Chancellor to bodies listed in "Public Bodies" are people whose names were suggested by the public appointments unit. They are:

Mr. M. Acland, Mr. D. Sinker and Ms V. Boakes (Legal Aid Board).
Mrs. J. O'Dell OBE (Authorised Conveyancing Practitioners Board).
Mr. W. Hyde (Council on Tribunals).
Ms. U. Prashar (Advisory Committee on Legal Education and Conduct).

Embryology

Mr. Jopling: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what delays there have been in producing guidance for the courts by his Department in connection with section 30 of the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 1990; and what steps he is taking to ensure that no further delays are caused in completing the work.

Mr. John M. Taylor: Before the court rules can be drafted the policy in respect of the regulations on which the court rules are based has to be settled. The complexity of this has meant that this has only recently been achieved. Work is now proceeding with a view to the rules coming into force as soon as possible.

Legal Aid

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many applications have been made in the last two months for legal aid for immigration casework.

Mr. John M. Taylor: The information requested is not available. However, in January and February this year the Legal Aid Board paid 2,358 and 4,100 bills respectively, for work done on immigration and nationality matters under the green form scheme.

ENVIRONMENT

Housing

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what proposals he has under the charter programme for a complaints procedure for tenants, for people on waiting lists and for homeless applicants.

Sir George Young: The council tenants charter sets out how a tenant or an applicant for housing can make a complaint about his or her authority. Complaints can be made by using an authority's complaints procedure or by making representations to their local councillor.

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what proposals he has under the charter programme to guarantee citizens basic rights to housing when in need.

Sir George Young: Local authorities do have a duty under part III of the Housing Act 1985 to secure accommodation for particular categories of homeless household.

Parliamentary Questions

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment on how many occasions in the current Session two or more questions by an hon. Member have been linked together for written answer.

Sir George Young: This information can be provided only at disproportionate cost.

New Build, Ealing

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his answer of 15 March, if he will instruct the Housing Corporation to cease purchasing newly built properties in the London borough of Ealing; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Baldry: The guidelines described in my answer of 15 March are still in place. I have no plans to request the Housing Corporation to vary them. Of the 198 purchases approved in the London borough of Ealing by 26 February, the latest date for which a breakdown by vendor type is available, 18 were new properties purchased from builders or developers.

Environmental Protection Act 1990

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he intends to publish the consultation paper reviewing the coverage of the controls under part I of the Environmental Protection Act 1990.

Mr. Maclean: This consultation paper meets a commitment in the White Paper to review the scope of the controls under part I of the Environmental Protection Act. It invites comment on some suggestions for rationalising the coverage of the controls and clarifying certain process definitions in the regulations.

I am looking forward to receiving comments from the wide range of industry and trade associations, environmental groups, and enforcing authorities who are being sent copies.

A copy of the consultation paper has been placed in the Library of both houses.

The consultation paper, entitled "Environmental Protection Act 1990 Part I, review of the prescribed processes and substances regulations", is available from room B350, Romney house, 43 Marsham street, telephone 071 276 8322. Comments are invited by 31 May and should be sent to the same address.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will take steps to ensure that the resources available within capping limits to any one local authority are equal to the total sum of its respective standard spending assessments.

Mr. Robin Squire: My right hon. and learned Friend does not intend to cap any authority budgeting at or below the level of its standard spending assessment.

House Renovation Grant System

Lady Olga Maitland: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment on what date he plans to introduce changes to the house renovation grant system.

Sir George Young: We now plan that the changes will take effect on 5 April to coincide with adjustments to housing benefit on which the means test for house renovation grants is based. Amending regulations to implement changes to the means test to improve targeting of resources on low income applicants and to make consequential changes to the prescribed application forms were laid before Parliament on 15 March. An order introducing a limit of £50,000 on mandatory renovation grants and amending regulations revising the cost limits for minor works assistance were also laid.

These changes will be separately notified to local housing authorities and a departmental circular will be issued shortly.

Property Services Agency

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will place in the Library a copy of his Department's investigation unit's report into fraud, tax evasion and security lapses in the PSA Building Management South-East Contracting, Southwark; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Redwood [holding answer 18 March 1993]: The central inquiry unit within PSA's internal audit department is conducting an investigation into various allegations made about the Building Management South East's contracting division which deals with directly employed labour throughout the BM south east area.

The investigation has not so far revealed any evidence of fraud, apart from the discovery of a small piece of undercharged work which is to be the subject of disciplinary proceedings. It has, however, revealed that there were departures from good practice in terms of management and personnel controls. The financial and administrative management of the division has been strengthened and the contracts of two temporary staff are being terminated. The inquiry is continuing to see whether there were any irregularities in contract letting and breaches of security and I shall make a further statement when it is complete.

It is not normal practice to put internal audit reports in the Library.

Chinchilla

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment in what circumstances an application for a licence or planning permission has to be made to local authorities in respect of commercial or large-scale keeping and breeding of chinchilla.

Mr. Baldry [holding answer 16 March 1993]: There is no separate licence required for the keeping of chinchilla. Nor is there any additional stipulation under planning legislation beyond the normal requirement for planning permission which applies to any development of land.

City Challenge

Mr. Betts: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many jobs have been created to date in each of the city challenge areas by schemes associated with city challenge.

Mr. Robin Squire [holding answer 18 March 1993]: I will write to the hon. Member.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Members' Staff

Mr. Meacher: To ask the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed, as representing the House of Commons Commission, what is the number of whole-time equivalent staff employed by the Fees Office to administer pension arrangements for hon. Members' staff; and what was, for the latest year for which information is available, the cost of these staff including non-salary costs and office costs.

Mr. Beith: Two full-time members of the Fees Office work exclusively on administering the pension arrangements for hon. Members' staff. The salary costs for these staff are £38,591 pa. In addition, managerial staff are involved from time to time, but no separate record of this work is kept. The non-salary and office costs are not separately maintained.

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Lord President of the Council if he will give for the latest available year (a) the number of staff employed by hon. Members and paid through the office costs allowance and (b) the number of hon. Members employing one, two, three, four, five and five or more members of staff who are paid through the office costs allowance.

Mr. Newton: As at 28 February 1993, the latest date for which figures are available, a total of 1,607 separate employments were authorised by hon. Members to be paid from the office costs allowance.

At the same date the number of hon. Members employing staff paid directly from the office costs allowance can be classified as follows:

118 Members employ 1 staff
230 Members employ 2 staff
193 Members employ 3 staff
72 Members employ 4 staff
21 Members employ 5 staff
6 Members employ 6 staff
3 Members employ 7 staff

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Lord President of the Council if he will give for the latest available year (a) the maximum sum available to an hon. Member to make pension contributions in respect of a person employed by him/her and paid out of the office costs allowance, (b) the amount paid out in respect of this provision, (c) the number of staff for whom pension provision is made and (d) the number of (i) pension contracts or schemes and (ii) pension companies into which payments are made.

Mr. Newton: For the year ended 31 March 1992, the latest year for which details are available, the information requested is as follows:

(a) £2,899 subject to a limit in respect of each person employed of 10 per cent. of the salary paid to that person, (b) £1,037,001, (c) 994, (d) (i) this information is not held, (d) (ii) 55.

Older People (Exhibition)

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Chairman of the Administration Committee if he has considered an application for an exhibition relating to the Abbeyfield Society and the European Year of Older People to be displayed in the Upper Waiting Hall.

Mr. Michael J. Martin: I understand that under procedures agreed by the Administration Committee arrangements have been made for the exhibition to be held in the Upper Waiting Hall from 5 to 9 July.

Departmental Returns

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Lord President of the Council if he will estimate the annual number of reports or returns made to Parliament by Departments of state consequent to the requirements in Acts of Parliament, or instruments arising therefrom, listing them so far as possible.

Mr. Newton: Information supplied from the Library for Session 1991-92 is as follows:

	Number

TRANSPORT

Traffic Calming Measures

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many local roads are considered to require traffic calming measures; and what is his estimate of when all these measures will be completed at the current rate of progress.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: It is for local highway authorities to determine which of their local roads would benefit from traffic calming, and the rate at which measures can be introduced.

Hereford Bypass

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what was the cost of promoting and developing plans for the A49-A465 Hereford bypass.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: The Department has to date charged about £3·6 million to the Roads Vote in the course of promoting and developing plans for this bypass. This sum has mainly been spent on consultant's fees and the purchase of land. Departmental staff costs could be produced only at disproportionate cost.

Selby Bypass

Mr. Alison: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what stage has been reached in his Departmental key event programme for the construction of the Selby bypass as published in September 1987; and what slippage has occurred.

Mr. Keneth Carlisle [pursuant to his reply of Tuesday 16 March 1993 Vol. 221 c. 148].

The publication of a draft compulsory purchase order is expected to occur in the summer of 1994.

EMPLOYMENT

European Social Fund

Ms Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is the average length of time taken within the United Kingdom for processing European social fund applications.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Applications for assistance from the European social fund (ESF) are now generally processed by the Department's ESF unit within six weeks of receipt. We have put a good deal of effort into improving performance in this area over the past few years.

PRIME MINISTER

General van der Westhuizen

Mr. Rogers: To ask the Prime Minister which Government officials have meetings with or conducted business with General van der Westhuizen in South Africa or Chile in each year since 1980.

The Prime Minister: The United Kingdom military attachés in Pretoria were in contact with Lieutenant-General Pieter van der Westhuizen, as chief of staff intelligence (South African military intelligence service), in the normal course of their duties, until their withdrawal in 1985. Our ambasador in South Africa also had occasional contacts during General van der Westhuizen's period as secretary to the State Security Council between 1985 and 1987.

During the period of Lieutenant-General van der Westhuizen's appointment as South African ambassador to Chile from 1987-91, our ambassador in Santiago had occasional contacts with him as a colleague on the diplomatic circuit.

DTI (Security Services)

Mr. Rogers: To ask the Prime Minister what is the policy of the Government in relation to the transfer of secret intelligence service or security service personnel to the Department of Trade and Industry; and if he will make a statement on the range of functions those personnel carry out in the Department of Trade and Industry.

The Prime Minister: It is not the Government's policy to comment on staffing arrangements with respect to the security and intelligence services. Members of these services would, however, be regarded no differently from other Crown servants for the purposes of transfer to employment elsewhere in the public service.

Citizens Charter

Ms Hoey: To ask the Prime Minister which Cabinet Committees deal with the citizens charter programme.

The Prime Minister: Citizens charter issues requiring collective discussion would normally fall within the remit of the Ministerial Committee on Home and Social Affairs. In addition, I chair six-monthly ministerial meetings to monitor progress and agree future priorities for the charter programme.

EDUCATION

Education Authorities

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will publish a list of education authorities in England with the total number of pupils for which each education authority is responsible.

Mr. Forth: The latest figures available are for January 1992, when the number of special and mainstream school pupils of compulsory school age for which each local education authority in England was responsible, excluding sixth form college students, was:

Engineering and Science

Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what percentage of British students in higher education establishments in England, Scotland, Ireland and Wales are currently pursuing courses of study in (a) engineering and (b) a pure science.

Mr. Boswell: The proportion of United Kingdom domiciled undergraduates in each country studying engineering and science in the academic year 1991-92 were:

	Engineering	Percentages science[1]
England	13	25

Secondary Schools, London

Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Education (1) for each of the London boroughs, how many children failed to get into any secondary school in the borough in which they live for the 1992-93 academic year; and what percentage of the total number of schoolchildren in London who started at secondary school in the 1992-93 academic year have had to go to school in neighbouring boroughs;

(2) how many children in each of the London boroughs failed to get into their first choice of secondary school for the academic year 1992-93.

Mr. Forth: This information is not collected centrally.

Grant-maintained Schools

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education, pursuant to his answer of 6 November, Official Report, column 478, what is the latest information he has on how many (a) primary and (b) secondary schools in each local education authority in England are eligible to apply for grant-maintained status; how many in each case have held ballots under section 61 of the Education Reform Act 1988; and how many ballots in each case resulted in votes to seek grant-maintained status.

Mr. Forth: All maintained primary, secondary and middle schools are eligible to apply for self-governing (grant-maintained) status. The table gives estimated numbers of eligible schools by LEA, and for each LEA the number of schools which have balloted and the number of yes votes. Middle schools are divided into primary and secondary schools as deemed.

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education how many ballots in England on grant-maintained status have resulted in participation rates (a) above 79 per cent., (b) between 70 and 79 per cent., (c) between 60 and 69 per cent., (d) between 50 and 59 per cent. and (e) below 50 per cent.

Mr. Forth: Participation rates for ballots on grant-maintained status in England are given in the table. Where a second ballot has been held following a first ballot with a turnout of under 50 per cent, only the participation rate of the deciding ballot is included.

over 79 per cent.	113

60-69 per cent.	350
50-59 per cent.	246
under 50 per cent.	29

Teacher Training

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education which schools have offered to take over teacher training; and on what basis.

Mr. Boswell: A number of primary and secondary schools have expressed an interest in bidding for funds to provide school-based training for teachers under the arrangements outlined in my right hon. Friend's announcement of 4 March. The text of that announcement was placed in the Library.

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education on what basis the City Technology College Trust will be given responsibility for school-based training of technology teachers; what financial arrangements he has made with the Smallpeice Trust and the City Technology College Trust for their participation in such training; and what is the proposed relationship between institutions of higher education and the trusts in respect of the training carried out.

Mr. Boswell: My right hon. Friend announced on 4 March that he has agreed to provide funds for the City Technology College Trust to organise and finance postgraduate school-based training for technology teachers in secondary schools. These funds will supplement those made available by the Smallpeice Trust. The courses will provide training in accordance with my right hon. Friend's requirements for the accreditation of initial teacher training.

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education of he will publish all the advice received by him to date from the Council for the Accreditation of Teacher Education in respect of the discussion paper, "Curriculum Organisation and Classroom Practice in Primary Schools."

Mr. Boswell: The Council for the Accreditation of Teacher Education (CATE) submits its advice to my right hon. Friend in confidence and it is not normally published. CATE's advice will contribute to proposals for the initial training of primary teachers which will be issued for consultation in April.

Value Added Tax

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what assessment he has made of the impact of the imposition of value-added tax on capital expenditure by colleges of higher and further education after 1 April.

Mr. Boswell: The allocation of capital grant to the Further Education Funding Council for 1993-94 includes provision for the cost of value-added tax. Colleges of higher education, which are funded by the Higher Education Funding Council for England, are already liable for value-added tax on capital expenditure.

School Curriculum and Assessment Authority

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what considerations led him to alter the proposed terms of service of the chairman of the School Curriculum and Assessment Authority.

Mr. Forth: In a reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier) my right hon. Friend informed the House on 4 December 1992, Official Report columns 397-98, that management consultants had been appointed to help draw up a list of appropriate candidates with the qualities and skills necessary to a successful chairman for the School Curriculum and Assessment Authority. The terms and conditions of service for the post were determined in the light of the results of that search and of the functions proposed for the authority.

Reading Ages

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will publish the full data upon which he based his evidence to the Education Select Committee on 11 March concerning the reading ages of secondary school children.

Mr. Forth: The data were drawn from an internal evaluation, commissioned by SEAC, of the 1992 pilot English tests for 14-year-olds. Some 12,000 pupils from 102 schools took part in the pilot. Complete information is available for some 9,300 pupils. The sample as a whole was deliberately constructed to have a disproportionately high number of pupils (over 1,000) with special educational needs, with 3 per cent. of the total sample having statements of special needs. Excluding these pupils from the calculations, for a sample of 8,100 pupils, achievements in reading were as follows:

approximately 9 per cent. achieved level 7 and above —above average achievement for 14-year-olds;
58 per cent. achieved levels 5 and 6—about the average for 14-year-olds;
29 per cent. achieved levels 3 and 4—which are the levels expected for typical pupils aged 9 to 11;
4 per cent. achieved levels 1 and 2—which are the levels expected for pupils aged 5 to 7.

WALES

Education Colleges (Capital Expenditure)

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what assessment he has made of the effect of the imposition of value added tax on all capital expenditure projects initiated by colleges of higher and further education after 1 April; what consultations he has had with the appropriate funding councils on this; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Wyn Roberts: Institutions of higher education are already liable for value added tax on expenditure in connection with capital projects. Further education institutions will become liable for value added tax when they leave the local authority sector on 1 April. This new liability for value added tax was taken into account in setting the provision for the further education sector in the 1992 public expenditure survey.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Somme Heritage Centre

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if planning permission has been given for the Somme heritage centre at Whitespots, Bangor road, Newtownnards; and if work has commenced on site.

Mr. Atkins: Outline planning permission was granted on 10 August 1992. An application for full planning permission is currently with the Department of the Environment for determination. I understand that site preparation has commenced.

Parliamentary Constituencies

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when the Boundary Commission for Northern Ireland will begin the next general review of parliamentary constituencies in Northern Ireland.

Sir Patrick Mayhew: The commission has given notice of its intention to begin a general review directly. The Boundary Commissions Act 1992 provides that the commission's report shall be submitted not later than 31 December 1994. Under the Northern Ireland Constitution Act 1973, the commission must also submit a supplementary report recommending the number of members to be returned by each of the proposed parliamentary constituencies in any elections which may be held to the Northern Ireland Assembly.

Departmental Functions

Mr. Brazier: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the work of the Department of the Environment (Northern Ireland) since 1979.

Mr. Atkins [holding reply sent on 18 March]: Since 1979, the Department of the Environment has made very significant progress in conserving and improving the quality of the built and natural environment in Northern Ireland.

1. Housing

Housing condition surveys shows that the level of unfitness declined from 14·1 per cent. in 1979 to 8·4 per cent. in 1987 and that the proportion of dwellings lacking at least one basic amenity declined from 17·9 per cent. to 5·5 per cent. The level of home ownership, which was 52 per cent. in 1979 is now 66 per cent. Over 53,000 Housing Executive dwellings have been sold to sitting tenants and nearly 12,000 households, of whom around 6,000 have graduated to full ownership, have been helped into owner-occupation through the co-ownership scheme. The output of the private house-building industry is currently running around 5,750 starts per year compared to 4,127 in 1979 after peaking at 7,418 in 1987. The housing situation of people unable to purchase their own dwellings has also improved with a fall in the Housing Executive's urgent waiting list from nearly 19,000 in 1981 to under 10,000 at present. Funding by the Department has enabled housing associations to make a significant contribution to the housing effort particularly in the provision of suitable housing for the elderly and people with special needs.

2. Roads and transport

£379 million has been invested in the further development of the road system including, for example, construction of the Foyle Bridge, the Westlink in Belfast, the dualling of large stretches of the Antrim-Ballymena and Hillsborough-Newry roads, bypasses at Strabana, Newry, Castledawson and work recently commenced on the cross-harbour rail and road links in Belfast. A new urban traffic control system has been installed to help control traffic in Belfast. This period has also seen considerable upgrading and expansion of the facilities at Aldergrove airport and extensive improvements at Belfast, Londonderry, Larne and Warrenpoint ports.

In 1989 the Department gained approval from the European Commission for a comprehensive programme for new transport infrastructure in Northern Ireland, involving total expenditure of over £189 million which includes £128 million of assistance from the European regional development fund. This will also facilitate major improvements to the region's strategic access routes to outside markets, and major improvements to the rail network and to the region's overall transport infrastructure.

3. Urban regeneration

There have also been very considerable improvements as a result of a range of urban programmes throughout Northern Ireland. Belfast city centre has been rejuvenated, with a huge expansion of retail opportunities including major shopping complexes such as Ross's Court and the Spires, extensive new office blocks, large numbers of new restaurants, places of entertainment and city centre pedestrianisation and conservation projects. Areas of inner-city deprivation have been helped through the work of nine action teams. The Laganside Corporation has been established to regenerate vacant and under-used riverside land, and a new weir on the River Lagan is nearing completion. Belfast and Londonderry have both had successful enterprise zones. Londonderry has also seen significant economic improvement, with public and private investment in the last two years whether spent or planned totalling over £230 million for new retail outlets, offices, restaurants and multi-storey car parking, creating 2,500 full and part-time jobs. A special Londonderry regeneration initiative aimed at targeting the needs of people in the most disadvantaged areas of the city, was announced in 1989 and continues in operation.

An extensive programme of economic and environmental improvement schemes is also being carried out in Londonderry, Belfast and the provincial towns.

4. Water

During this period the Department has maintained a high level of community service in the supply of drinking water and in the treatment of sewage. A substantial programme of works, costing over £430 million has enabled the Department to cope with a continuous rise in demand for water and to effect improvement of water quality in Northern Ireland's lakes and waterways particularly Loughs Neagh and Erne and the River Lagan. Progress during the period has left the Department well placed to effect the further programme of works to ensure compliance with the EC directives on drinking water, sewage treatment and the quality of bathing water.

5. Local government

New legislation during the period has helped improve the efficiency effectiveness and accountability of District Councils by introducing compulsory competitive tendering for a range of services, by vesting new powers in the Local Government Auditor, including a power to carry out the value for money studies (8 such studies have been carried out), and introducing new measures designed to improve the conduct of council business.

6. Efficiency improvements

As part of the next steps agency policy, a Rate Collection Agency was established in 1991, and an Ordnance Survey Agency and Driver and Vehicle Testing Agency were set up on 1 April 1992. Within Ordnance Survey, a major achievement since 1979 has been the development of the Northern Ireland geographical information system, a computer system through which all public utility and Government Department services will be linked. as a result of an efficiency scrutiny in 1989, the Land Registry has reduced its stock by 56 per cent. in the last four years, and has also secured significant improvements in completion terms for case work.

7. Environmental protection

Considerable progress has been made in protecting and enhancing the environment in Northern Ireland during this period, and this work has been accelerated following the setting up of the new, comprehensive Environment Service in November 1990. Since 1979, 215 river water quality stations have been installed to monitor and control water pollution. Three major pieces of legislation have been introduced to protect and keep open rights of way; to designate areas of outstanding natural beauty (with four having been designated, covering 147,000 hectares and two more soon to be designated covering a further 70,000 hectares); to designate areas of special scientific interest (where 38 areas already designated cover 47,330 hectares); and to protect certain plants and animal species.

During the same period, 4,550 buildings of architectural or historical importance have been listed, many of which were facing demolition and have now been restored again; 725 monuments have been scheduled as being of archaeological or historical importance; a further 32 monuments have been taken into state care and their public representation improved, and 160 rescue and evaluation archaeological digs have been completed. The Department, in its work since 1979, has been placing greater emphasis on public awareness of the archaeological and built heritage and the need to protect the environment, including the opening of a Monuments and Buildings Record for Northern Ireland in 1992.

These are very considerable achievements to improve the quality of life for the people of Northern Ireland, to protect its unique physical attributes and to ensure that further physical developments take place in a way which enhances the environment.

To maintain and improve upon the high quality of Northern Ireland's river and estuarine waters, water quality management plans for the River Erne and River Foyle catchments are being prepared in line with White Paper commitments. These plans will enable the Department to set comprehensive standards of water quality, against which existing and proposed uses can be judged.

Discharges from the Department's sewage treatment works to waterways are also being regularly and systematically sampled, in order to determine appropriate standards for the required consents for such discharges.

To safeguard the high quality of Northern Ireland's bathing waters, systematic water quality sampling is being extended to a further nine bathing waters, in addition to the 16 identified under the EC Bathing Waters Directive.

Since 1979, grants of £4·9 million to district councils have enabled 43,000 houses to convert to burn smokeless fuel. The Government is engaged in a study of sulphur dioxide and smoke levels to ensure compliance with Directive 80/779/EEC. The results of this research will form the basis of future strategies to combat these pollutants.

Proposals for a new system of air pollution control have been published for consultation and a consultation paper on a future strategy for waste management will also be published. A new Litter Order will be put in operation by the end of 1993.

Greater freedom of access to environmental information is a right enshrined in the citizens charter. Public registers of premises authorised or registered to keep, use or dispose of radioactive material under the Radioactive Substances Act of 1960, are now held by the Environment Service and all district councils in Northern Ireland.

8. Planning

A new Belfast urban area plan has been through public inquiry and has now been adopted for the period up to 2001. A review of housing land in the plan area has been announced. Sixteen other area plans were adopted covering all of Northern Ireland except Craigavon and two rural area around Belfast. Thirty conservation areas have been designated since 1979 bringing the total number to 39. Also the planning service has been reviewing its rural planning policy in conjunction with interested parties. The results of the review bill will be announced soon.

MINISTRY OF AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Milk and Potato Industries

Dr. Strang: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many people were employed at the latest available date in (a) the potato industry and (b) the milk industry in England and Wales.

Mr. Gummer: With regard to the milk industry, I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to the hon. Member for East Londonderry (Mr. Ross) on 2 March 1993 at column 77.

Comparable information is not readily available for potatoes.

Fisheries Council

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the outcome of the Fisheries Council in Brussels on 18 March; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Curry: I attended the Council of Fisheries Ministers in Brussels on 18 March 1993 together with the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland, my hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Sir Hector Monro).

The main issue at this meeting was consideration of the state of the market. I emphasised that the situation is serious, and that there are a variety of causes. For the United Kingdom, the problem is clearly being made worse by the violent action of French fishermen. I obtained an assurance from the French Minister that France will take more vigorous action to restore trading activity to normal and to protect consignments exported from Britain to France.

Problems are also being caused by imports from outside the Community. The Council noted that the minimum import prices, recently introduced, are not working effectively. All Ministers agreed to ensure rigorous enforcement of these and the Community's hygiene rules. The Council asked the Commission to make proposals for better control of direct landings by third country vessels, to consider the case for extension of the minimum import prices to further species of fish, and to open talks with the exporting countries most involved about co-operation to stabilise the market. Responsibility for market management lies with the Commission, who will with member States collect fuller data on the state of the market and who will consider whether further initiatives are needed.

The Council provided directions for further work on the proposed new control regulation, with a view to final decisions being taken in the summer. I made clear to the Council the importance we attach to achieving improved enforcement throughout the Community.

There was a preliminary discussion about the Commission's report, required by treaty, on the operation of the accession arrangements for Spain and Portugal.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Cigarette Duty

Ms. Primarolo: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the average amount of VAT and excise duty levied on a packet of cigarettes in real terms in each of the past five years; and what was the total revenue from VAT and excise duty in real terms in each of the past five years.

Sir John Cope: The information is as follows:

Table 1

Table 1 is based on typical, post Budget prices of a packet of 20 king size cigarettes. The VAT figures in Table 2 are based on consumer expenditure estimates. These figures have all been deflated by the RPI.

Petrol Duties

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the total revenue from all taxes on leaded and unleaded petrol per gallon in each of the last five years.

Sir John Cope: The information is as follows:

April figures are used as the tables are based on a post-Budget price.

Foreign Exchange Transactions

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish tables showing the daily average value of foreign exchange transactions on the London markets each month from September 1992 to the end of January 1993 and the share of spot and forward market transactions in these daily averages; and if he will give the shares of each major currency in these transactions.

Mr. Nelson: Data on foreign exchange transactions on the London markets are not collected at the frequency requested. However, in its November, 1992 Quarterly Bulletin, the Bank of England published data on the foreign exchange market in London, taken from a survey in April 1992.

Repayment of Bills

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what progress has been made in his policy of improving the prompt payment of bills by Government contractors to their sub-contractors.

Mr. Nelson: All Government Departments have confirmed that they have introduced a clause in their contracts for goods and services which requires the supplier or contractor to pay its suppliers or subcontractors promptly.

Inheritance Tax

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will take steps to ensure that landowners claiming full exemption from inheritance tax are obliged to publicise in the relevant local press on a periodic basis the full extent of public access to their land.

Mr. Dorrell: The owner of land that has been conditionally exempted from inheritance tax is already required to publicise the agreed public access arrangements. The extent of the publicity depends on the facts of each case. The owner will generally be required to take specific steps to publicise public access, for example by advertising the access arrangements in a local tourist office or town hall.

The appropriate heritage advisory agency, for example the Countryside Commission for scenic land in England, is able to supply information about public access to heritage land including conditionally exempt land, although land will not be identified as conditionally exempt. In addition, in England and Wales, a member of the public who wants information about public access in a specific area can contact the footpaths officer of the appropriate county council or national park authority. Details of footpaths and public access also often appear on maps and in commercial publications, particularly for major tourist areas.

Animal Skin Sales (Tax)

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what investigations the Inland Revenue is undertaking into underpayment of income tax associated with earnings from the sale of animal skins by huntsmen.

Mr. Dorrell: The Inland Revenue is making inquiries about the possible failure by members of hunts to declare income from the sale of animal skins. Details of these inquiries are confidential.

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate has been made of the amount of tax unpaid by failure to declare earnings from the sale of skins of dead animals acquired when obtaining raw meat for hounds.

Mr. Dorrell: No such estimate has been made.

Debt Servicing

Ms Harman: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the annual cost of servicing a debt requirement of £27 billion.

Mr. Portillo: The annual cost of servicing any particular borrowing requirement depends upon the level and structure of interest rates, the rate of inflation and the type of debt issued.

Developing Countries (Debt)

Mr. Burns: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what progress Her Majesty's Government has made in tackling the problem of developing countries' external debt during 1992.

Mr. Nelson [pursuant to his answer, 16 February 1993, c. 122-23]: An incorrect figure was shown in the third paragraph of the answer. For completeness the amended answer is restated in full as follows:

Her Majesty's Government have made substantial progress in dealing with developing country debt issues during 1992.

The Government are directly responsible for official bilateral debts. Proposals for rescheduling or restructuring such debts are dealt with multilaterally through the Paris Club of creditor countries.

The Paris Club reached agreements with 18 countries during 1992, involving the rescheduling or restructuring of over US$21·5 billion of bilateral official debt. Three agreements were with middle income countries (Argentina, Brazil, and Bulgaria), and a further four were with lower middle income countries (Cameroon, Ecuador, Jordan, and Morocco) who benefited from more generous rescheduling arrangements involving longer grace and repayment periods (known as "Houston" terms).

I am delighted to announce, however, that the majority of agreements, eleven in all, were concluded on Trinidad terms. The countries concerned were Bolivia, Ethiopia, Equatorial Guinea, Guinea Republic, Honduras, Mali, Sierra Leone, Tanzania, Togo, Uganda, and Zambia. This follows from the Paris Club's decision in December 1991 to begin implementing the initiative of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister for providing concessional relief to the very poorest indebted countries.

In addition to the countries listed above, Nicaragua and Benin benefited from Trinidad terms in 1991, and Mauritania in 1993, making 14 beneficiaries in all so far.

Trinidad terms provide for the equivalent of cancellation of up to half of the eligible debt consolidated by the agreements. Each agreement contains an undertaking by creditors to consider the case for a reduction in the whole stock of the debtor countries' eligible debt to the Paris Club after a period of proven economic and financial responsibility. During 1992 Trinidad terms agreements covered over US$3 billion of debt entailing the forgiveness of over US$1 billion over the life of the agreements. Including Nicaragua, Benin, and Mauritania, over US$4 billion of debt has been restructured under Trinidad terms, and about US$1½ billion forgiven over the life of the agreements.

Maintenance Cases

Mr. Hall: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what information he has on the turn-over rate of maintenance cases by the courts in Warrington, South.

Mr. John M. Taylor: I have been asked to reply.

Table 1 shows the number of orders for maintenance made in matrimonial proceedings and under the Children Act in Warrington county court during 1992. Table 2 shows the total number of orders for maintenance made by the Warrington and Halton magistrates courts during 1991, the latest year for which information is available. The number of orders made in those courts under the Children Act are given for 1992. The 1992 figures are provisional and are liable to revision to take account of late amendments.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Means-tested Benefits

Mr. Knox: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will publish figures showing the numbers and percentages of families receiving one or more means-tested benefits in 1979 and the latest available year.

Mr. Burt: The information is in the table.

Benefit	1979 Recipients (000)s per cent.	1991 Recipients (000)s per cent.
Supplementary benefit income support	488 (6·8)	1,320 (19·5)
Family income supplement/ family credit	76 (1·1)	435 (6·4)
Housing benefit	—	39 (0·6)
Community charge benefit	—	99 (1·5)

Notes:
1. For the purposes of the answer, families are defined as couples or single people with children.
2. There are no statistics available for housing benefit and community charge benefit for 1979 as no similar scheme existed at that time.
3. All figures have been rounded to the nearest thousand.
4. The figures give the numbers of families receiving each of the benefits. Some families receive more than one of these benefits, but it is not possible to give a reliable estimate of the numbers of such cases.
5. Income support replaced supplementary benefit in 1988.
6. Family credit replaced family income supplement in April 1988.

Child Support

Mr. Stern: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer of 9 March, Official Report, columns 530-31, on the Child Support Agency, if he will list all those benefits or payments administered by his Department to which a taper of 90 per cent. or greater can be applicable.

Mr. Burt: Income in excess of disregarded amounts is taken fully into account for the purposes of income support. None of the other income-related benefits attract a taper of 90 per cent. or more. However, where a number of other income-related benefits are in payment the combination of more than one benefit taper will occasionally produce a marginal deduction rate in excess of 90 per cent.

For the purpose of child support maintenance, where an absent parent falls within the protected income provision the income subject to the 90 per cent. deduction rate will include all social security benefits with the exception of attendance allowance, disability living allowance, pensioner's Christmas bonus, social fund payments and the first £10 of war disablement pension or war widow's pension.

Mr. Stern: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer of 9 March, Official Report, column 530, on child support, if he will make a statement on the reasons for differentiating between corporate non-contributory pension schemes and all other pension schemes in framing the rules for the calculation of child support maintenance.

Mr. Burt: The child support maintenance system has followed the rules in the income-related benefits in allowing only half of any contribution to an occupational or personal pension scheme to be deducted from earnings.

An employee who is a member of a personal or occupational pension scheme pays a reduced national insurance contribution and less income tax in recognition of the separate pension contribution. If no account were taken of the pension contribution, the lower tax and national insurance contribution would produce a higher figure for net income and, therefore, a higher assessment of child support maintenance. Therefore, the Government believe it is reasonable to take some account of a parent's actual contributions to occupational or personal pension schemes.

However, it would not be right to allow individuals to forgo current income in order to benefit themselves at a later date, and thereby to reduce the maintenance payable for their children. Taking some account of pension contributions is justified as the individual will stand to gain through enhanced pension entitlement.

There is no straightforward way of achieving a similar result for a person who is a member of a non-contributory scheme because actual contributions would be difficult to ascertain.

Pensioners

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer of 12 March, Official Report, column 751, if he will further break down the data showing the age of the pensioners with an income of less than £5,000 per year into separate tables for single pensioners and pensioner couples.

Miss Widdecombe: Estimates are in the table.

	Age 60-64	65-69	70-74	75-79	80+
Percentage of single pensioners gross income less than £5,000 pa[1]	9	24	16	28	23
Percentage of pensioner couples gross income less than £5,000 pa[1]	0	31	22	34	13

Notes:

[1] Owing to small sample sizes, the estimates quoted are liable to a significant degree of error.
The age of a couple is taken to be the age of the husband.

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will give the percentage break down of all pensioner units in the age groups (a) 60 to 64 years, (b) 65 to 69 years, (c) 70 to 74 years, (d) 75 to 79 years and (e) 80 plus years.

Miss Widdecombe: Estimates are in the table.

	Age 60-64	65-69	70-74	75-79	80+
Percentage of all pensioner units	7	33	18	26	16

Notes:

(a) A pensioner unit is a single person aged over state pensionable age (SPA) or a couple where the husband is aged over SPA.
(b) The age of a couple is taken to be the age of the husband.
(c) The distribution of all pensioner units is an estimate based on the 1988 Family Expenditure Survey data adjusted to United Kingdom totals.

Fraud

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security on how many occasions social security fraud was detected in (a) Inverclyde, (b) Strathclyde and (c) Scotland as a whole in each of the past three years; how many persons were proceeded against; and of these how many were convicted by the courts.

Miss Widdecombe: The administration of benefits is a matter for Mr. Michael Bichard, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member with such information as is available and a copy will be placed in the Library.

Letter from Mr. M. Bichard to Dr. Norman Godman, dated 18 March 1993:

As Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency, it is my responsibility to answer questions about relevant operational matters. I am therefore replying to your recent Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Social Security asking on how many occasions social security fraud was detected in (a) Inverclyde, (b) Strathclyde and (c) Scotland as a whole in each of the past three years; how many persons were proceeded against; and of these how many were convicted by the courts.

I regret that I am unable to provide separate figures for Inverclyde or Strathclyde as the Benefits Agency is organised in Areas which do not always correspond geographically to town or county boundaries.

The Sector Fraud organisation has only been in existence since January 1991 and the first full year for which figures are available is the year ended April 1992. During this period a total of 26,600 social security investigations into Fraud were undertaken in Scotland by officers of the Benefits Agency.

In the year ending 31 March 1990, 1,185 cases were sent for consideration of proceedings in Scotland as a whole. Of this number 1,084 were convicted by the courts. In the year ending 31 March 1991 the number of cases submitted was 1,037 of which 887 resulted in convictions and in the year ending 31 March 1992 the figures were 847 submissions and 785 convictions.

You may be interested to know that from the year commencing April 1992 we have been compiling prosecution statistics for each of our operational areas. This will enable us to provide, from the year ending April 1993, information for smaller geographical areas.

I hope that you find this reply helpful. A copy will appear in the Official Report and a copy will also be placed in the Library.

Part-time Study

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will liaise with Stoke on Trent college to ensure that students studying for fewer than 21 hours a week and available for work can claim benefit in order to continue studies.

Mr. Burt: The administration of income support is a matter for Mr. Michael Bichard, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member with such information as is available and a copy will be placed in the Library.

Letter from Mr. M. Bichard to Ms Joan Walley, dated 18 March 1993:

As Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency it is my responsibility to answer questions about relevant operational matters. I am therefore replying to your recent Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Social Security asking if he will liaise with Stoke on Trent College to ensure that students studying less than 21 hours a week and available for work can claim benefit in order to continue studies.

I should explain that students are defined in the Income Support scheme as people aged between 19 and pension age who are attending a full-time course of study at an educational establishment.

It is Government policy that financial support for students from public funds should come from one source, the education system. The benefit system is not the appropriate means of funding or supplementing educational maintenance. The educational maintenance system is designed to provide for the particular needs and expenditure patterns of students. Most students following full-time courses are not entitled to Unemployment Benefit, Housing Benefit or Income Support during their course.

However, exceptions are made for certain groups, such as lone parents with a child under 16, and disabled students, who may claim Income Support throughout the year. A student's partner may also claim benefit at any time but will have to satisfy the normal conditions of entitlement.

The 21 hour rule in the Income Support scheme allows unemployed people, who have been receiving benefit, to spend their spare time usefully in part-time study while they continue their search for work. It is not intended to provide financial support for people who are primarily concerned with continuing their education. Where the course is designated full-time by the college concerned the 21 hour rule cannot apply, as it is only intended to help those in part-time education.

The decision whether a course of study is part-time or full-time is made by the independent adjudication authorities based on the individual circumstances of each case and the evidence, including that from the educational establishment concerned, before them in accordance with statute law and case law.

I understand from Mr. Proctor, the District Manager for the Benefits Agency's Stoke (North) District, that a liaison meeting was held in January between the Benefits Agency and the Deputy Director of Stoke on Trent College, in order to ensure that the College was fully informed about the rules governing students' entitlement to Income Support.

I hope you find this reply helpful. A copy will appear in the Official Report and a copy will also be placed in the Library.

Social Fund, Lewisham

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the budget for the Lewisham district office social fund for the current year as set at 1 April 1992; if he will state (a) whether the budget was subsequently increased, (b) how much remains in the budget, (c) how many applicants have been refused a grant giving the reasons for refusal, (d) how many applicants have been refused a loan giving the reason for refusal and (e) how many applicants refused went on to appeal and how many of these appeals were successful.

Mr. Scott: The administration of the social fund is a matter for Mr. Michael Bichard, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. he will write to the hon. Member and a copy will be placed in the Library.

Letter from Mr. M. Bichard to Ms Joan Ruddock, dated 18 March 1993:

As Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency, it is my responsibility to answer questions about relevant operational matters. I am therefore replying to the points raised in your recent Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Social Security asking what was the budget for Lewisham District Office Social Fund for the current year as set at 1 April 1992; if he will state (a) whether the budget was subsequently increased, (b) how much remains in the budget, (c) how many applicants have been refused a grant giving the reasons for refusal, (d) how many applicants have been refused a loan giving reasons for refusal and (e) how many applicants refused went onto appeal and how many of these appeals were successful.

Details of the initial and subsequent budget allocations for Lewisham and Brixton District for the 1992-93 financial year are in the Library. The balance outstanding at 28 February 1993, the latest date for which figures are availabe, was £116,683 for grants and £304,374 for loans.

Information on the Social fund is not kept by Social Fund applicant, but rather by Social Fund application. Details of the numbers of grant and loan applications refused and of reasons for refusal are given at Appendix A.

There is no right of appeal against discretionary Social Fund decisions. Dissatisfied applicants may apply for a review of the decision, initially conducted within the District. During the period 1 April 1992 to 28 February 1993, 4,482 review applications were received by Lewisham and Brixton District, of which 1,053 resulted in a changed decision.

I hope you find this reply helpful. A copy of this leter will appear in the Official Report. Copies are also being placed in the Library.

Benefits Agency

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what pilot schemes for remote single site storage of line benefits case papers are being undertaken by the Benefits Agency; and where they are taking place.

Mr. Burt: The administration of storage facilities is a matter for Mr. Michael Bichard, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member with such information as is available and a copy will be placed in the Library.

Letter from Mr. M. Bichard to Mr. Jim Cousins, dated 18 March 1993:

As Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency it is my responsibility to answer questions about relevant operational matters. I am therefore replying to your recent Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Social Security asking what pilot schemes for remote single site storage of line benefits case papers are being undertaken by the Benefits Agency, and where they are taking place.

It is incumbent upon Benefits Agency District Managers to provide an efficient service to customers in the communities which they serve. As well as the implementation and ongoing operation of legislative provisions, they need also to take account of available resources and operational needs in the course of their management tasks. Some, therefore, as one of a number of measures designed to improve efficiency which will be of ultimate benefit to customers, have chosen to store benefit files at a location outwith the district. There are no specific pilot schemes.

As Districts are free to organise to best suit their area, it is not necessary for a record of how they choose to organise their filing systems to be kept centrally. However, I am aware of some Districts, and locations where benefits are centrally administered benefits who have chosen to store files remotely. A list of these are appended.

I hope you find this reply helpful. A copy will appear in the Official Report and a copy will also appear in the Library.

Disability Living Allowance

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when his Department received an appeal against a refusal of disability living allowance in respect of Mr. D. W. J. Partridge of 167 Sycamore court, Bargoed; and when he expects to adjudicate that appeal.

Mr. Scott: The administration of disability living allowance is a matter for Mr. Michael Bichard, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write shortly to the hon. Member and a copy will be placed in the Library.

Letter from M. Bichard to Mr. Ron Davies, dated 18 March 1993:

As Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency, it is my responsibility to answer questions raised about relevant operational matters. I am therefore replying to your recent Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Social Security asking when the department received an appeal against a refusal of Disability Living Allowance (DLA) in respect of Mr. D. W. J. Partridge of 167 Sycamore court, Bargoed; and when he expects to adjudicate that appeal.

Communications with Mr. Partridge have revealed that he wrote to the Disability Living Allowance Unit (DLAU) requesting an appeal on or about 29 July 1992. Unfortunately, there is no trace of an appeal letter having been received.

On 12 August Mr. Partridge completed a DLA claim pack which was received at Cardiff Disability Benefits Centre on 17 August and in the DLAU on 26 August. On behalf of the Secretary of State, the date of receipt of the DLA claim pack has been accepted as the date of appeal.

Urgent action is now being taken to prepare the appeal submission and to forward the case to the Independent Tribunal Service (ITS) so that the appeal can be heard. We will request an urgent listing but as the ITS is entirely independent the timing of the hearing will ultimately rest with them.

I am sorry that there has been so little action following Mr. Partridge's appeal. You will be aware from my letter of 19 October 1992 to all MPs of the problems the Benefits Agency has faced since the launch of DLA and the positive steps being taken to improve the situation. Since then, further steps have been taken to ensure that appeals are promptly actioned including recruiting additional staff to prepare appeal submissions.

I am sorry that Mr. Partridge did not receive the standard of service to which every customer is entitled. Such matters are not taken lightly and every effort is being made to improve the quality of service to all our customers. I have written to you separately and in greater detail about this matter.

I hope that you find this reply helpful. A copy will appear in the Official Report and a copy will also be placed in the Library.

NATIONAL HERITAGE

Hotel Classification

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if the English tourist board will extend its system of classification for British hotels so as to indicate which serve plated food in their dining rooms.

Mr. Key: The English tourist board has no plans to extend the scope of its accommodation classification and grading schemes at the moment. Whether or not it does so in the future will depend on its assessment of whether such extension is necessary to meet the needs of both the industry and its customers.

Radio Licences

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how many local radio licences it is estimated will be issued by the Radio Authority by 2000.

Mr. Brooke: The number of local radio licences to be issued is a matter for the Radio Authority to decide, taking account of its responsibilities under the Broadcasting Act 1990.

Red Hot Television

Mr. Gale: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what steps he plans to take in connection with the television service Red Hot Television formerly known as Red Hot Dutch.

Mr. Brooke: The Government have today notified the broadcaster of the television service "Red Hot Television" and the European Commission that they propose to take action against this service under article 2.2 of the EC Broadcasting Directive (89/552/EEC). Article 2.2 provides for a member state to take action against a service coming from another member state where that service manifestly, seriously and gravely infringes article 2·2 of the Broadcasting Directive, which deals with the protection of minors, because of the content of its programme material.

Article 2.2 lays down a 15-day period for consultations with the transmitting state and the Commission. If it is not possible to reach an amicable settlement during this period, the Government will take steps to restrict re-transmission of the service within the United Kingdom. To this end, I propose to make an order under section 177 of the Broadcasting Act 1990 proscribing "Red Hot Television". The Independent Television Commission notified me on 15 October 1992 and 1 February 1993 that it considers this service to be an unacceptable foreign satellite service within the meaning of section 177 of the Broadcasting Act 1990. Subject to the outcome of the consultations required by the directive, I am satisfied that the making of such an order would be in the public interest and compatible with the international obligations of the United Kingdom. The making of an order under section 177 would have the effect of activating, once the order was in force, the criminal offences of supporting a proscribed foreign satellite service specified in section 178 of the Broadcasting Act 1990.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Iraq (Sanctions)

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list the companies and individuals currently being investigated by his Department in connection with breaches of sanctions against Iraq.

Mr. Heseltine: It is not the Government's practice to discuss any investigations, on-going or otherwise, in which DTI is involved.

Oil Exploration

Mr. Wigley: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make it his policy to hold a public inquiry into any proposals from oil exploration companies for development and exploitation of oil resources under the sea in Caernarfon Bay or Cardigan Bay.

Mr. Eggar: Any company seeking to develop offshore reserves must apply to my Department for development consent under the Petroleum and Submarine Pipe-lines Act 1975, and obtain other approvals and clearances as necessary from the relevant authorities, e.g. planning approval for onshore terminals. It would not be appropriate for me to pre-judge the application of these procedures. Obviously I am well seized of the environmental sensitivities surrounding these areas and in any licence award I will be imposing strict conditions on the licensees. Any development plan for such areas must also be accompanied by a satisfactory environmental impact assessment.

Crescent International Petroleum

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what representations his Department has received concerning the role of Crescent International Petroleum in trading with Iraq.

Mr. Heseltine: I am aware of allegations that have been made against Crescent International Petroleum concerning trading with Iraq. If any evidence is found to substantiate allegations that the company has acted unlawfully the proper course of action would be to pass it on to the appropriate authorities. The issues raised fall within the remit of Lord Justice Scott's inquiry and he is free to consider them if he thinks it appropriate to do so.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Iran

Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the threat to regional stability posed by the current economic situation in Iran.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We keep all developments which could affect regional stability under close review, including Iran's economic difficulties.

Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement regarding the current state of diplomatic and economic relations between the Islamic Republic of Iran and the United Kingdom.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We recognise Iran's regional importance and seek to develop our bilateral relationship with Iran. But as was made clear at the European Council at Edinburgh in December last year, the extent to which closer relations with and confidence in Iran can be developed will be determined by improvements in Iran's behaviour in a number of areas, in particular: the fatwa against Salman Rushdie; terrorism; and human rights.

We welcome the recent increase in trade between Britain and Iran. British exports to Iran in 1992 were £568·1 million: Iran's exports to Britain were £164·5 million.

Prisoners (France)

Mr. Gerrard: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many British citizens have been transferred to British prisons from French prisons under the convention for the transfer of sentenced persons; and what representations he has received about problems with the scheme as it affects British citizens in France.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Since 1985, one prisoner has been transferred to a British prison from France.

I have received no such representations.

Rhinoceroses

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what diplomatic representations he has made to Taiwan, South Korea and Yemen regarding the importation of rhinoceros horn.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: In the last few months, the United Kingdom has strongly urged, and encouraged others to urge, the Taiwan, South Korean and Yemeni authorities to end the illegal rhino horn trade in their countries.

East Timor

Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is his most recent assessment of the human rights situation in East Timor.

Mr. Goodlad: Our concerns about human rights in East Timor, including the disparity in sentencing of the military and civilians involved in the Dilli incident in November 1991 and the need for continuing International Committee of the Red Cross access to prisoners, were reflected in the Resolution on this issue, co-sponsored by the Community, which was adopted at the UN Commission on Human Rights in Geneva last week. We monitor the situation closely and maintain regular and useful dialogue with the Indonesians on human rights issues. We believe this is the best way of securing improvements.

Moscow Airport

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many complaints involving the ill-treatment of British citizens as transit passengers at Moscow airport he has received; what representations he has made to the Russian authorities on such complaints; and what information as to the availability of consular assistance is made to transit passengers.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: One such complaint has been received. The British embassy in Moscow has drawn the attention of the Russian authorities to the complaint by formal note. There is an information desk in the transit area at Moscow airport for the benefit of passengers. It is staffed by at least one English speaker at all times who can give the British embassy telephone number on request.

Members of the European Parliament

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will publish a table showing the number of members of the European Parliament elected currently, an as proposed, by each member state together with the respective member to electorate ratios, the number of constituencies and the methods of election in each current or future election proposed or decided.

Mr. Goodlad: The following table sets out the information. The numbers of seats and proportion of population per MEP following the 1994 election are given in brackets:

Country	Seats		Total population (million)	Population per MEP		Constituencies/voting system

United Kingdom	81 (87)	56·9	702,469 (654,023)	Simple majority in 78 constituencies in England, Wales and Scotland. Proportional representation (STV) in single constituency in Northern Ireland

We are discussing the allocation of the United Kingdom's six extra seats and will take discussions soon. So far as we are aware, other member states have not announced how they intend to allocate their additional seats.

Prisoners (France)

Mr. Gerrard: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assistance is given by his Department to British citizens in obtaining evidence to prove their insolvency for purposes of release from contrainte par corps under the French penal code.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: If requested by a prisoner, British consular officers in France will make inquiries with the French customs authorities about fines and can forward documents to the authorities. They cannot intervene to seek reductions in fines properly imposed by French courts.

Polly Peck

Mr. Rogers: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what arrangements were made by his Department's agencies acting on its behalf with the Turkish Government and for Polly Peck plc in relation to shipping movements in the eastern Mediterranean in each year from 1981 to 1990.

Mr. Goodlad: None.

Grenada

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations his Department has made to the Government of Grenada in relation to the convictions of the former members of the People's Revolutionary Government of Grenada who were sentenced to death; and what information he has about the conditions under which Phyllis Coard is kept.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: None. The death sentences on those convicted of the murder of Maurice Bishop were commuted to life imprisonment on 14 August 1991.

At present Mrs. Coard shares accommodation with one other female prisoner. She is allowed visitors, has access to medical and recreational facilities, and is employed in the prison tailor's workshop.

Nuclear Non-proliferation

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government towards member states of the nuclear non-proliferation treaty evoking their right under article X(i) of the treaty to withdraw from membership.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The United Kingdom is determined to maintain and strengthen the non-proliferation treaty. We are therefore treating North Korea's announcement of its intention to withdraw from the treaty under article X(i) as a matter of great concern. We urge North Korea to reconsider its position.

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what meetings or communications he has had with his counterparts in (a) the United States of America and (b) Russia, in regard to the recent announcement by North Korea that it intends to withdraw from the nuclear non-proliferation treaty.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Representatives of the Governments of the United Kingdom, the Russian Federation and the United States of America met on 17 March in Vienna to discuss their concern about the consequences of the announcement of the Government of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea to withdraw from the non-proliferation treaty. The subject was also discussed at a special session of the International Atomic Energy Authority Board of Governors on 18 March.

Ozone-Depleting Substances

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) what is the quantity of ozone-depleting substances recycled within his Department and returned to the manufacturer;

(2) what proportion of his Department's consumption of ozone-depleting substances become controlled waste in terms of section 33 of the Environmental Protection Act 1990 ;

(3) what action has been taken to ensure that ozone-destroying substances consumed by his Department are identified as controlled wastes when they are no longer in use;

(4) what quantity of HCFC 22 is purchases by the Department per annum;

(5) what the latest available figures are for his Department's total purchase of CFCs and HCFCs;

(6) if he will provide details from the maintenance and servicing record of the quantity and type of ozone-destroying chemicals used annually in his Department's refrigeration and air-conditioning equipment for servicing and in leakages; and what proportion is removed for recycling.

Mr. Goodlad: The information is being compiled and I will write to the hon. Gentleman shortly.

HEALTH

Complaints Procedure

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans she has to extend the Hospital Complaints Procedure Act 1988 to the private sector; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Sackville: None.

The patients charter established the right of patients to have any complaint about national health service services —whoever provides them—investigated and to receive a full and prompt written reply from the chief executive or general manager.

Leprosy Patients (Thalidomide)

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what guidelines have been produced by her Department for leprologists concerning advising patients about the neuropathic side-effects of thalidomide;

(2) how many leprosy patients in the United Kingdom treated with thalidomide have complained of symptoms described by Fullerton and O'Sullivan in the Journal of Neurology, Neurosurgery and Psychiatry 1968; 31; 543, table 1 in each of the last three years.

Mr. Sackville: I refer the hon. Member to the reply my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State gave the then hon. Member for Stoke on Trent, South (Mr. Ashley) on 3 March 1992 at column 157.

A Department of Health memorandum on leprosy recommends that a member of the panel of leprosy opinion is invited to see and discuss the management of all new cases of leprosy. It is the doctors' responsibility to discuss the benefits and possible adverse reactions of any treatment with their patients.

No leprosy patient treated with thalidomide in the last three years is known to have complained of the symptoms described.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research has been undertaken by her Department in the use of electrophysiological tests in leprosy patients to exclude the use of thalidomide neuropathy as part of the treatment.

Mr. Sackville: None.

The main agency through which the Government support biomedical and clinical research is the Medical Research Council (MRC) which receives its grant-in-aid from the Office of Science and Technology under the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. This is an independent body deciding what research to support on its own expert judgment. The council is always willing to consider for support soundly based new scientifc proposals in competition with other applications.

Pertussis Vaccine

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress has been made in connection with the clinical trials of the acellular pertussis vaccine which commenced in October 1987.

Mr. Sackville: Phase II (immunogenicity and reactogenicity) studies have been undertaken using acellular pertussis vaccine, administered according to the previous (prior to May 1990) immunisation schedule. These results were published in the Lancet in January 1991. Studies are presently being undertaken to compare the vaccine with conventional whole cell vaccine given in a two, three and four-month schedule as used in the United Kingdom. Additional studies are also being carried out to investigate the duration of antibodies following acellular pertussis vaccine. Phase III (vacine efficacy) studies are being undertaken in Sweden; results will not be available until 1995-96.

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many reported reactions under the yellow card scheme have been received in which the pertussis vaccine was the vaccine alleged to be responsible for the reaction, in 1991 and 1992.

Mr. Sackville: Pertussis vaccine may be given as a single vaccine but is more usually given as a combined diphtheria, tetanus and pertussis (DTP) vaccine. The number of reports for each type of vaccine is as follows:

Vaccine	1991	1992
Pertussis	8	8
DTP	184	206

A report of a suspected adverse reaction does not necessarily mean that the reaction was caused by the vaccine.

Non-smokers

Mrs. Wise: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what studies she has commissioned into the levels and sources of carbon monoxide in the blood of non-smokers, including pregnant women.

Mr. Sackville: None. The main agency through which the Government support biomedical and clinical research is the Medical Research Council which receives its grant-in-aid from the Office of Science and Technology under the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. The Medical Research Council is an independent body deciding what research to support on its own expert judgment.

Studies have shown that in indoor air the major sources of carbon monoxide (CO) contamination are cooking and unflued heating. The main contribution of CO in outdoor air pollution is provided by motor vehicle emissions.

Complementary Therapists

Mr. Faulds: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will provide figures as to the number of complementary therapists employed as ancilliary staff in general practitioner practices.

Dr. Mawhinney: A total of 169 whole-time equivalent complementary therapists were employed in general practices in England in 1992.

Cot Deaths

Mr. James Hill: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are the recorded numbers of cot deaths in the United Kingdom for each year since 1990.

Mr. Sackville: The information for England and Wales is shown in the table. Information relating to Scotland and Northern Ireland are matters for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland and my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

Cot Deaths (Sudden Infant Death Syndrome and, Sudden Infant Deaths) registered in England and Wales, 1990-91

	Sudden infant death Syndrome[1]		Sudden infant deaths[2]
	1990	1991	1990	1991
Under 1 year of age	1,123	935	1,202	1,008
1 year and over[3]	32	39	44	43

[1] Sudden infant death syndrome (SIDS, ICD 9th revision 798·0) refers to cases where the death certificate identified it as either being (i) a main foetal mention (deaths under 28 days of age) or (ii) the underlying cause of death (28 days and over).

[2] Sudden infant deaths refer to all the cases where 'cot death', 'sudden infant death syndrome', or some similar term has been given on the death certificate even when other, perhaps more precise, conditions were also given.

[3] Only rarely is sudden infant death given as a cause of death in children aged over one year; this happened for seven sudden infant deaths in 1990 and for four in 1991.

Note: Provisional information for 1992 will be available shortly.

M25 Pollution

Mrs. Wise: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what studies she has made of the effects of air pollution in the area of the M25 corridor on the respiratory health of children in the area, and the incidence of asthma.

Mr. Sackville: None. The main agency through which the Government support biomedical and clinical research is the Medical Research Council (MRC), which receives its grant-in-aid from the Office of Science and Technology under the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. The MRC is an independent body deciding what research to support on its own expert judgment.

The concentrations of pollutants in the United Kingdom associated with traffic sources are in most circumstances below those assessed by the World Health Organisation (WHO) to have significant effects on health. The Department was represented at an air pollution workshop held by Surrey county council in July 1992 following concern expressed about pollution generated by the M25. The county council has since been in contact with the Department about the design of a study to investigate the possible effects of air pollutants.

Medicines Evaluation

Mr. Colin Shepherd: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will ensure that experts in herbal, homoeopathic, biochemic and anthroposophical medicines are appointed to the advisory committee, the Committee for Proprietary Medicinal Products and the Medical and Scientific Council of the Medicines Evaluation Agency which is to be established to oversee and monitor medicines in the European Community.

Mr. Sackville: There is already expertise in complementary therapies and herbal medicine available to the licensing authority from the advisory bodies established under section 2 and section 4 of the Medicines Act 1968. The Department is considering ways this can be supplemented to meet the demands of the EC Directive on homoeopathic medicinal products due to be implemented by 31 December 1993.

The Committee for Proprietary Medicinal Products (CPMP) comprises an elected President, delegates from the EC member states and a Secretariat provided by the European Commission. The United Kingdom delegate is the Director of the Medicines Control Agency. Individual national experts form part of the United Kingdom delegation to CPMP meetings. The composition of the delegation depends on the nature of the subjects to be discussed at any particular meeting.

The European Commission's proposal for a Scientific Council has now been abandoned.

Health Authorities (Funding)

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will review the problems of health authorities with inadequate funding for very urgent hospital treatment in the remaining weeks of the current financial year by reference to individual cases which have been drawn to her attention.

Mr. Sackville: National health service funding is at an all time high with more patients being treated than ever before. Within that total, emergency patients are treated immediately and urgent cases as soon as possible according to clinical priority. The NHS chief executive has written to all health authority and hospital general managers to ensure that patients who need urgent treatment are given the necessary priority.

Euthanasia

Mr. Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what studies she has commissioned into the question of euthanasia.

Mr. Sackville: None. Euthanasia is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary. The House of Lords has recently established an ad hoc Select Committee on Medical Ethics to examine the issues surrounding this area. The Department of Health will give evidence to the Committee.

Pharmacies (Prescriptions)

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many pharmacies have a contract with the Kensington, Chelsea and Westminster family health service authority to dispense NHS prescriptions; and if she will list them.

Dr. Mawhinney: This information has been placed in the Library.

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations she has received about the length of time taken by the British Pharmaceutical Society to register premises for the dispensing of prescriptions.

Dr. Mawhinney: None.

Dressings (Prescriptions)

Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the total annual cost of drugs and dressings supplied on prescription; and what proportion of the total is taken by dressings.

Dr. Mawhinney: Expenditure on drugs and appliances in the family health services in England amounted to £2,317 million in 1991-92. The proportion taken by dressings was 1·88 per cent.

Drug Prescribing

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to her answer to the hon. Member for Hastings and Rye (Mrs. Lait) on 16 February, Official Report, columns 159-60, (a) if she will explain the difference between the definition of the 10 therapeutic categories, to which the selected list scheme will be extended, contained in that answer and the definitions given in DOH press notice H92/385 dated 12 November 1992 and (b) if she will list by reference to the British National Formulary those drugs which fall into the relevant 10 new therapeutic categories covered by the selected list scheme.

Dr. Mawhinney: The press notice used an abbreviated description of some of the British National Formulary (BNF) categories. The full description of each category, with the relevant BNF section number is shown in the table:

Name of category	BNF section number
Antidiarrhoeal drugs	1.4
Antihistamines, hyposensitisation and allergic emergencies	3.4
Hypnotics and anxiolytics	4.1
Appetite suppressants	4.5
Treatment of vaginal and vulval conditions	7.2
Contraceptives	7.3
Anaemias	9.1.1.-9.1.3
Rubefacients and other topical anti-rheumatics	10.3.2
Drugs acting on the ear and nose	12.1-12.2
Drugs acting on the skin	13

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health following the introduction of limited listing how many new medicines have been launched in (a) the initial seven categories and (b) in all categories.

Dr. Mawhinney: I refer the hon. Member to the replies I gave the hon. Member for Moray (Mrs. Ewing) on 9 February at columns 617 and 618.

Botulism

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many cases of botulism were reported last year in England and Wales.

Mr. Sackville: There were no confirmed cases of botulism in England and Wales last year.

Clinical Waste

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many hospitals have incinerators larger than is required for dealing with their own clinical waste.

Mr. Sackville: This information is not available centrally. Some hospitals have incinerators larger than they require in order to dispose of waste from other hospitals or health services in their locality. Spare capacity may be used for income generation, and national health service authorities may enter into arrangements with private contractors for the construction of an incinerator which includes additional capacity for commercial disposal contracts. All national health service incinerators have to meet the requirements of environment protection legislation.

Departmental Offices

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what have been the costs of refurbishments at her Department's offices at the Elephant and Castle; how many flats in those premises have been refurbished; and who occupies the flats.

Mr. Sackville: £108,000 (excluding VAT) has been spent in 1992-93 in refurbishing Eileen house at the Elephant and Castle. The building has a small flat which is used as offices.

West Yorkshire Health Authority

Mrs. Peacock: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when she expects to announce the name of the chairman of the new West Yorkshire health authority.

Dr. Mawhinney: Shortly.

Regional Health Authorities

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is her policy on the reduction in the number employed in a typical regional health authority; how many regional health authority staff she expects to be made redundant by 1 April in English regional health authorities; and if she will make a statement.

Dr. Mawhinney: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on 18 March.

It is for regional health authorities to determine how to achieve staff reductions and the need for redundancies will depend on their individual plans. I expect RHAs to avoid compulsory redundancies where possible, consistent with the need to reduce staffing levels, and to handle any that are unavoidable sensitively.

SCOTLAND

Legal Aid

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the cost of administering legal aid in Scotland through local legal aid committees and the Law Society for Scotland in each of the last five years; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Since 1987 legal aid in Scotland has been administered by the Scottish Legal Aid Board. Information on the board's administrative costs is set out in the table.

Net administrative expenditure of the Scottish Legal Aid Board

	£ million
1987-88	4·426
1988-89	4·957
1989-90	5·568
1990-91	5·833
1991-92	6·644

During the same period the total sum disbursed by the Board has increased from £47·7 million to £79·8 million.

Regional Aid

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will set out by travel-to-work area the total amount of money received since 1983 in (a) regional assistance and (b) European rural development fund.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 18 March 1993]: The information is not available in the form requested.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what has been the amount of money made available to each travel-to-work area in (a) Strathclyde and (b) Scotland under the terms of objective 2; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 18 March 1993]: The information is not available in the form requested.

Hospital Staff (Working Hours)

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the average number of hours worked each week or month by (a) consultants, (b) junior hospital doctors and (c) nurses in (i) hospitals in Argyll and Clyde health board hospitals and (ii) hospitals throughout Scotland in each of the last five years.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 18 March 1993]: The information requested is not available centrally. Hospital consultants are employed on professional contracts and whole-time and maximum part-time practitioners are expected to devote substantially the whole of their professional time to their duties in the NHS. Junior hospital doctors contract for a standard working week of 40 hours and such further agreed additional duty hours to be spent on-call or on shift work as are required to meet the needs of the service. In the Argyll and Clyde health board area as at 30 September 1992, 23 junior hospital doctors were contracted for duty of more than 83 hours per week and 151 for 83 hours or less. The comparable all-Scotland figures were 452 and 2,955. Nursing staff work a basic 37·5-hour week with little overtime commitment.

Community Care

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if he will list those health boards and regional and island councils which do not provide community care programmes for all those persons who are receiving treatment from a consultant psychiatrist while residing in the community; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what plans he has to introduce a statutory right of access to a social worker and a community care programme for all of those persons who are being treated by a consultant psychiatrist and who live in the community; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 18 March 1993]: Under guidance issued in February 1992, health boards and social work departments are required to provide integrated local care programmes for people with a mental illness, including dementia, being discharged from hospital or already in the community. This multi-agency care programme approach which came into operation in June 1992 is designed to ensure that each individual has a care plan developed to meet their particular health and social needs.

General Practitioner Fund Holders

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will introduce into the patients charter a requirement that patients registered with a fund-holding general practitioner are informed as soon as that general practitioner's budget for any element of national health service provision is exhausted; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 18 March 1993]: No. At the end of each financial year, health boards are responsible for ensuring that budgets balance and that resources are available to meet all urgent needs.

Contaminated Land

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he plans to make a statement on contaminated land in Scotland.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 18 March 1993]: An announcement on contaminated land arrangements in Scotland, as provided for in section 143 of the Environmental Protection Act 1990, will be made shortly.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has had from the Law Society on contaminated land.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 18 March 1993]: The Law Society offered a number of comments on the consultation paper, issued in August 1991, on proposals for registers of land that may be contaminated. The comments mainly concerned blight and uncertainty within the property market. In September 1992 it also submitted further representations in association with others outlining alternative proposals relating to use of the planning system.

Dental Hospital

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) when he expects the planned new dental hospital in Edinburgh to be built; (2) what plans he has to provide specialised dental facilities in a hospital setting when the dental school has closed.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 18 March 1993]: My right hon. Friend is fully committed to providing such capital investment as is necessary to establish the new dental hospital.

It will be for the Edinburgh Royal Infirmary NHS Trust, if its application for trust status is approved, to take forward plans for a new dental hospital and to negotiate contracts for the provision of specialised dental services with prospective purchasing health boards.

Hospital Performance Data

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he intends to publish performance data on hospitals.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 18 March 1993]: The patients charter contained a commitment that all hospitals and other health units would publish annual reports which would set out information about their activity, quality of service and finances. These reports will be published with effect from April this year.

In addition we are considering what other comparative data about the performance of individual hospitals and other health services should be published.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Maastricht Treaty

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will tabulate in the Official Report, for titles I, V, VI and VII of the Treaty on European union each article containing reference to (a) the Council, (b) the Commission, (c) the Court and (d) the Parliament of the European Economic Community; and what are the additional powers, responsibilities, or functions provided for each institution in each relevant article.

Mr. Garel-Jones: The information the hon. Member requires may be found in Command Paper 1934 and in the memorandum to the Foreign Affairs Committee entitled "Europe after Maastricht".

Sellafield

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he will respond to the submission sent to him by an all-party group from Dail Eireann on 4 March regarding Sellafield and the proposed commissioning of the thermal oxide reprocessing plant.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs has not received the submission to which the hon. Member refers.

St. Helena

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many vehicles have been imported free of tax into St. Helena for each of the last 10 years for which records are available; and how many have since been exported.

Mr. Garel-Jones: Records are available from 1987 only. These show the following:

Year	Vehicles imported free of tax	Vehicles exported
1987	64	Nil
1988	30	Nil
1989	9	2
1990	24	Nil
1991	15	3
1992	20	4
Totals	162	9

Embassies

Sir Peter Emery: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list those British embassies abroad where there is a science and technology counsellor; and what steps he is taking to increase the number of such posts.

Mr. Goodlad: Five of our embassies—Bonn, Moscow, Paris, Tokyo and Washington—currently have science and technology counsellors. The level of staffing devoted to science and technology-related issues is frequently reviewed in the light of Whitehall reporting requirements and competing demands on FCO resources.

Russia

Dr. Goodson-Wickes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when the treaty signed between President Yeltsin and the Prime Minister on 9 November 1992 will be laid before this House.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The treaty on the principles of relations between the United Kingdom and Russia is due to be laid before the House and published in the country series on 2 April 1993.

Kuwait

Lady Olga Maitland: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the United Nations regarding the 750 missing Kuwaiti prisoners of war taken by the Iraqis during the Gulf war.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We raise this question at each United Nations Security Council review of sanctions and will continue to do so until Iraq fulfils all its obligations under United Nations Security Council resolutions.

We fully support Kuwait's efforts through the International Committee of the Red Cross to establish the whereabouts of missing Kuwaiti and other citizens.

Government Communications Headquarters

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about recruitment policies at Government Communications Headquarters, and which groups are excluded on grounds of ethnic origin or parents' country of origin.

Mr. Hurd [pursuant to his reply, 3 February 1993, c. 209]: The second paragraph of my answer was inadvertently omitted. The full version is as follows.

No groups are excluded on grounds of ethnic origin. Members of staff at GCHQ must be British citizens, must never have held citizenship other than of the United Kingdom and colonies, and must not hold any nationality or citizenship in addition to British citizenship. As regards parents of applicants, the requirement is that each parent must always have been a Commonwealth citizen as defined by the British Nationality Act 1981.

If the applicant was not born—or did not take up residence in infancy—in the United Kingdom, each of the applicant's parents must be, or if deceased have been at the time of their death, a British citizen domiciled in the United Kingdom. These rules are at present under review, but I cannot say when this review will be completed or what its conclusions will be.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Magistrates, Wales

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what is the total number of lay magistrates in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John M. Taylor: The latest figures available show that there are 2,129 lay magistrates in Wales—930 women and 1,199 men. There are also two stipendiary magistrates in post and another authorised post to be filled. The Lord Chancellor's advisory committees in Wales advise him on the need for new lay magistrates and recommend suitable candidates to him for appointment. The objective is that each bench should broadly reflect the community it serves.

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many of the magistrates in Wales have a declared affiliation with a political party; if he will list the numbers who identify themselves with each party; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John M. Taylor: This information could be provided only at disproportionate cost. When making recommendations for appointment the Lord Chancellor expects his advisory committees to put forward suitable candidates who broadly reflect the community which they will serve. In deciding which suitable candidates to recommend he expects them to take into account political affiliation, or the lack of it, as well as other factors such as gender, geography and occupation.

Legal Aid

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what action he intends to take to ensure that all outstanding legal fees owed to lawyers by the civil legal aid scheme are paid promptly; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John M. Taylor: Costs in civil legal aid cases do not become due until after they have been taxed by the court or assessed by the Legal Aid Board. The Legal Aid Board is responsible for payment of such costs after taxation or assessment and it is already their aim to pay them as promptly as possible. For the year 1992-93 the board had a target of paying 65 per cent. of solicitors' civil legal aid bills within six weeks of receipt, including assessment when appropriate. In the financial year to date, that is 1 April 1992 to 28 February 1993, this target has been surpassed, with almost 73 per cent. of bills being paid within that time.

Mr. Moss: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what is the estimated number of take-ups of legal aid offers in each of the next three years.

Mr. John M. Taylor: The estimated number of civil legal aid certificates and criminal legal aid orders for each of the next three years is as follows:

Thousands

	1993-94	1994-95	1995-96
Legal aid certificates	302	329	357
Legal aid orders	614	622	630

Mr. Moss: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what is the number of legal aid orders issued in criminal cases in each of the last three years.

Mr. John Taylor: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave the hon. Member for Don Valley (Mr. Redmond) on 11 March at column 644. Complete figures for 1992 are not yet available.

Mr. Moss: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what percentage of offers of legal aid with payment of a contribution fell into arrears of contributions in each of the last three years.

Mr. John M. Taylor: The total number of civil cases where contributions were in arrears in each of the last three years was as follows:

	Number
1989-90	36,438
1990-91	43,243
1991-92	38,672

Mr. Moss: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what percentage of offers of legal aid with payment of a contribution failed to be rectified by reassessment of payment or arrears, leading to a discharge of the certificate, in each of the last three years.

Mr. John M. Taylor: The information sought is not available in the form requested.

Mr. Moss: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what plans he has to extend the consultation period for his proposals for changes to the legal aid procedure.

Mr. John M. Taylor: I have laid statutory instruments before this House to implement the changes to legal aid eligibility and will shortly be laying instruments to make other changes in relation to fees and payments made to lawyers in criminal legal aid cases.

Mr. Moss: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what estimate he has made of the effect of his new proposals for legal aid eligibility on the level of income to the compensation recovery unit in each of the next three years.

Mr. John M. Taylor: No precise estimate has been made. Details held by the compensation recovery unit do not distinguish between those cases which have the benefit of legal aid and others. It is however likely that the practical effects of the legal aid proposals will be small. A large majority of the amounts recovered so far by the compensation recovery unit relate to employer liability and motor liability cases, and a great many of those will have been supported by trade unions or insurers respectively.

Mr. Moss: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what percentage of offers of legal aid with payment of a contribution were not accepted under the current legal aid arrangements, in each of the last three years.

Mr. John M. Taylor: The number of contributory civil legal aid certificates issued and the number of offers of contributory civil legal aid made but not accepted in the last three years are as follows:

Year	Contributory legal aid certificates issued	Contributory legal aid offered but not taken up	Offers not taken up as percentage of offers made
1989-90	53,725	16,813	23·8
1990-91	55,339	16,164	22·6
1991-92	56,830	19,179	25·2

Mr. Moss: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what is the estimated saving, after allowing for the statutory charge, which will result from the scrapping of the contribution taper for green form advice.

Mr. John M. Taylor: It is difficult to identify separately the effects of each element in the package of changes which has been announced. However, it is likely that the changes to eligibility for green form will save about £11 million by 1995-96.

Contact Centres

Mr. Olner: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will make a statement about the provision of more contact centres where children can be visited with facilities for supervision.

Mr. John M. Taylor: Contact centres are funded by the voluntary and private sectors with assistance in some cases from local authorities and local area probation services. The Government have no plans to intervene.

Child Abduction

Mr. Olner: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will make a statement about the extension of the application of the Hague convention to access rights.

Mr. John M. Taylor: The Hague convention on civil aspects of child abduction makes provision for access rights. There are no immediate plans to seek to extend such provision.

Mr. Olner: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what steps he is considering to make United Kingdom legal aid available to parents seeking to recover children abducted to countries where such assistance is not available.

Mr. John M. Taylor: The principle behind the legal aid schemes in England and Wales and Northern Ireland is that they assist individuals, regardless of their nationality, to undertake proceedings in the English, Welsh and Northern Irish courts. It would not be appropriate to extend the schemes to cover proceedings in other jurisdictions, many of which will have their own legal aid schemes which provide assistance to United Kingdom citizens on the same basis as for their own citizens. The legal aid scheme in Scotland is the responsibility of the Secretary of State for Scotland.

Mr. Olner: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what proposals he has to improve the training of lawyers, magistrates and judges in the areas of child abduction.

Mr. John M. Taylor: Specific responsibility for the training of lawyers lies with the Law Society and the Council for Legal Education. The Judicial Studies Board is responsible for the provision of training for the professional judiciary and advises on the training of lay magistrates. Magistrates have limited powers, in cases of abduction but would be advised by their justices' clerks. The subject is included as part of the general training for those members of the circuit judiciary dealing with family matters. Proceedings to which the Hague convention applies come before experienced family division judges. The board will carefully consider the recommendations made in the report, "Home and Away".

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many sentenced women were in prison in (i) 1991 and (ii) 1992, respectively; and of that total, how many were convicted of (a) violence against the person, (b) sexual offences, (c) burglary, (d) robbery, (e) theft, handling, fraud and forgery, (f) drugs offences and (g) other.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The number of women held under sentence on 30 June 1991 and 30 June 1992 by offence group is as follows:

[1] Provisional rounded estimates. Components may not add to totals because they have been rounded independently.

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many sentenced women were in prison at (a) 30 June 1991 and (b) 30 June 1992; and what proportion of these women were serving (i) sentences up to 18 months, (ii) sentences between 18 months and three years, (iii) sentences between three years and less than life and (iv) life sentences.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The number of women under sentence in prison was 1,148 on 30 June 1991 and 1,170 on 30 June 1992. The percentage breakdowns by sentence length are as follows:

Sentenced women in prison on 30 June England and Wales

Wolds Remand Centre (Assaults)

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many assaults, major and minor, on prison staff have taken place at the Wolds remand centre between April and December 1992.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: There was a total of 16 assaults by prisoners on staff between 5 April and 31 December 1992.

Yugoslavia

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many nationals of the former Yugoslavia who entered the United Kingdom during 1992 as visitors have, to date, applied for their visit to be extended; and how many such applications have (a) been granted, (b) been refused and (c) are pending.

Mr. Charles Wardle: Available information is given in the table. Full information on the number of applications for extension of stay in this period is not yet available.

Karamjit Singh Chahal

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will release Karamjit Singh Chahal from Bedford prison; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Charles Wardle: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him on 20 January, at column 255.

Sunday Trading

Sir John Wheeler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will introduce legislation to reform Sunday trading law in England and Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We are continuing to prepare the various models for reform, in close consultation with the pressure groups, for inclusion in a Government Bill. We shall bring that Bill to the House when the parliamentary timetable allows. I will make available to hon. Members well before the summer recess a fully developed draft Bill together with a text explaining the detailed effect of its provisions.

Police Resources, Staffordshire

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will meet the chairperson of the Stoke-on-Trent police consultative committee to discuss police resources in Staffordshire.

Mr. Charles Wardle: My right hon. and learned Friend has not been asked for such a meeting. If a request were made, it would receive sympathetic consideration.

Uniformed Policemen

Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many uniformed policemen are employed in England and Wales.

Mr. Charles Wardle: There were 128,045 male and female police officers employed by the police service at the end of December 1992.

Common European Time

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 15 March, on central European time, what power he has to adopt common European time on an experimental basis only.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The adoption of central European time on an experimental basis would require fresh primary legislation similar to that enacted in 1968 for the purposes of the British standard time experiment.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what estimate has been made of the effect in terms of numbers of (a) lives saved and (b) serious injuries avoided between now and 1995, on present trends, of introducing common European time.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The only such estimates available are those relating to road traffic casualties. Estimates for 1991 are that some 140 deaths and 520 serious injuries could be saved by adopting central European time. Savings in subsequent years are likely to be of the same order.

Sex Offenders

Mr. Richards: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the number of sex offenders who have re-offended while on bail in each police authority since 1987.

Mr. Jack: This information is not available.

Euthanasia

Mr. Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what studies he has commissioned into the question of euthanasia.

Mr. Jack: My right hon. and learned Friend has commissioned no studies into euthanasia and has no plans to do so.

General Elections

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proposals he has for greater transparency in financial contributions and contributions made in kind to political parties for general election expenses.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: We have no such proposals.

Animal Experiments

Mr. Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what action he is taking to ensure that all animals reused in laboratories have been examined by a qualified veterinary surgeon and deemed fit and well for use in further experimental procedures under the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The licence holder may call upon the advice of the named veterinary surgeon as appropriate. Although there is no general requirement that animals to be reused in scientific procedures must first be examined by a veterinary surgeon, such a requirement may be added as a condition to project licences when this is considered appropriate. There are no present plans to vary these arrangements.

Fines (Non-payment)

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many warrants for non-payment of fines etc. were executed by police forces in each calendar year from 1988 to 1992; how many warrants for non-payment relating to television licences were executed by police forces in each calendar year from 1988 to 1992; and what is the estimated cost of the execution of warrants.

Mr. Charles Wardle: This information is not collected centrally.

Weapons Advertising

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what consideration he has given to restricting the advertisements and availability of firearms, knives, archery equipment, ammunition, replica weapons and associated services in magazines.

Mr. McFall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) pursuant to the oral answer of 11 March Official Report, column 1120, by the Leader of the House, if he will receive a deputation led by the hon. Member for Dumbarton on the publication and distribution of the magazine referred to in relation to public safety;

(2) if he will introduce legislation to make it illegal to distribute magazines depicting illegal and offensive weapons.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The Home Office has studied the magazine which was drawn to the Government's attention by the hon. Member for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall). It has been mailed direct from the USA to a number of people in this country and it appears to include several items, the importation or sale of which is prohibited.

The publisher's attention is being drawn to the provisions of our law. It is for the police or HM Customs and Excise to consider whether to initiate prosecutions for any apparent infringements. We have no plans to introduce additional legislation of the sort suggested.

No Smoking Day

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps were taken to promote No Smoking Day in his Department; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The 10th national No Smoking Day on 10 March was promoted in the Home Office by a newsletter on the subject which was circulated throughout the entire Department. This was reinforced by poster displays, leaflets and other publicity material supplied through the Health Education Authority.

Departmental Environment

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what action he plans to take to improve the working environment in his Department.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: It is the policy of my Department to provide staff with a safe, efficient and clean working environment. Subject to available resources and the need to ensure value for money, improvements are and will continue to be made when justified.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimates have been made as to the number of appeals likely to be lodged in (a) Pendle, (b) the north-west and (c) England, after April concerning the valuation of properties for the council tax; and how many people will be employed to process such appeals.

Mr. Nelson: It is impossible to predict the number of appeals that will be made against valuation bandings in particular locations after 1 April 1993 and, hence, the number of people to be employed in the processing of such appeals.

However, administrative plans have been made to deal with up to 950,000 initial proposals to alter bandings in England. These plans will be reviewed when a clearer picture of the actual number of proposals emerges after 1 April 1993.

Public Bodies

Dr. Wright: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many appointments to the public bodies listed in "Public Bodies" for his Department were made from names supplied by the public appointments unit; and if he will list them.

Mr. Portillo: The public appointments unit is only one of the sources used to identify candidates for appointment to public bodies for which the Chancellor is responsible. No detailed records are kept of how many appointments to those bodies were made solely as a result of nomination by the PAU.

BCCI

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he will issue his reply to the second report of the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee, Session 1992-93, on "Banking Supervision and BCCI: The Implications of the Bingham Report".

Mr. Nelson: I have written to the Chairman of the Committee to inform him that, while the Government have read with interest and noted the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee's report, they do not intend to respond to it. The Government have already considered carefully the implications of Sir Thomas Bingham's report into the supervision of BCCI and I have nothing to add to the Government's response to that report, which my right hon. Friend the Chancellor announced to the House on 22 October 1992, Official Report, columns 576-91.

Inheritance Tax

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many sites in the countryside with public access arising from inheritance tax conditional exemption agreements will be publicised by the Countryside Commission, the Countryside Council for Wales and Scottish Natural Heritage in England, Wales and Scotland, respectively, before the end of July.

Mr. Dorrell: The Countryside Commission is planning to issue a publication this summer which will allow access to land in England which has been secured under inheritance tax conditional exemption and other non-tax schemes without distinguishing the reasons for the access. Discussions are continuing about the scope of this publication.

Comparable publications for Wales and Scotland will not be available this summer. Both the Countryside Council for Wales and Scottish Natural Heritage are considering the best way of providing comparable publications for Wales and Scotland which protect taxpayer confidentiality.

Owners are already required to publicise public access to conditionally exempt land and there are already many existing sources of information about the access which is available.

Tendering

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proposals the Government have to extend the requirements to advertise contracts and invite tenders to non-governmental bodies which operate by statutory authority.

Mr. Portillo: The advertisement of contracts is normally required where EC rules apply and is recommended in other cases. Currently there are EC rules on the procurement of supplies and works in both the public sector and the utilities sector—the energy, telecommunications, transport and water sectors. Similar EC rules on the procurement of some types of services will have to be implemented for the public sector by 1 July 1993 and, if adopted as planned, for the utilities by 1 July 1994. At present the EC rules on the procurement of works in the public sector cover some non-departmental public bodies not subject to the rules for supplies contracts. Under a further proposal the coverage of the rules on supplies will be aligned with the coverage for works, probably from 1 January 1995.

Taxation, Northern Ireland

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the annual percentage of the economically active population in Northern Ireland in each year since 1988-89 which pays the higher rate of income tax compared with the percentage of the economically active population which pays the higher rate of income tax in (a) England, (b) Scotland and (c) Wales.

Mr. Dorrell: The available information is given in the table. Husbands and wives were taxed independently for the first time in 1990-91 and each individual subject to higher rate tax is counted as one taxpayer in 1990-91. In the two earlier years, each married couple subject to higher rate tax is counted as one taxpayer.

Taxpayers liable to higher rate tax as a percentage of economically active individuals

	Northern Ireland	England	Scotland	Wales
1988-89	3	5	3½	2½
1989-90	4½	5½	4½	3½
1990-91	3½	6	4½	3

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the annual per capita tax yield from value added tax in Northern Ireland in each year since 1979-80 compared with the annual per capita tax yield from VAT in (a) England, (b) Scotland and (c) Wales.

Sir John Cope: The per capita yield from VAT in Northern Ireland in 1990-91 is estimated at £423 compared with £543 for Great Britain. It is not possible to provide comparable figures for other years or for England, Scotland and Wales separately.

Value Added Tax

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the timetable and rate for introduction of VAT on the printed word to which the Government are already committed.

Sir John Cope: In his Budget statement my right hon. Friend did not propose the extension of VAT to books, newspapers and periodicals.

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will outline the reasons for the differing value added tax treatment of (a) straw for animal feed and (b) straw for compost, crop protection and livestock bedding.

Sir John Cope: Animal feed is relieved from VAT under item 2 of group 1 of schedule 5 to the VAT Act 1983. Compost, crop protection and animal bedding material does not fall within this or any other group of the zero rate schedule and is therefore liable to VAT at the standard rate. Customs have recently agreed with the trade new guidelines for the VAT treatment of supplies of straw under each category.

Mr. Meale: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will offer the same arrangements for VAT rates to the greyhound industry as those he indicated in his Budget for racehorse owners.

Sir John Cope: The memorandum of agreement on VAT registration arrangements announced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor in his Budget statement refers to the particular circumstances of the horseracing industry and crucially depends upon proposed changes to the rules of racing. Customs and Excise will consider any representations from the greyhound racing industry that the ownership and racing of greyhounds amounts to a business for VAT purposes.

Cardiff Wales Airport (Customs)

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proposals he has for Her Majesty's Customs to alter the status of (a) the approved clearance point, (b) approved hours for freight delivery and (c) the entry processing unit at Cardiff Wales airport; and if he will make a statement.

Sir John Cope [holding answer 19 March 1993]: There are no current proposals to alter the status of the entry processing unit covering Cardiff Wales airport. The approved clearance point and the entry processing unit are, for Customs purposes, the same in that the place for lodgement of Customs entries and their clearance is the entry processing unit. Customs entries for Cardiff Wales airport have, since November 1991, been lodged and cleared at Barry docks.

Customs place no restriction on the times of delivery of cleared cargo. This is a matter for the approved transit shed operator at Cardiff Wales airport.

Colliery Review

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will provide a table showing the contribution made by each of the 31 pits in the colliery review process to the annual gross domestic product of the region in which it is located.

Mr. Nelson [holding answer 16 March 1993]: I regret that statistics are not collected in the form requested.

Coins

Sir Terence Higgins: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when the next Trial of the Pyx is due to take place; if he will ensure that a selection of new 10p pieces are included in the sample of coins examined; what are the maximum penalties to which he may be subjected if coins are found to be of variable weight or thickness; and if he will make a statement on whether such coins are unsuitable for use in automatic machines.

Mr. Lamont [holding answer 16 March 1993]: The next Trial of the Pyx will be held in February 1994. The 1993 trial, which took place on 11 February 1993, included a selection of new 10p pieces. In accordance with the Trial of the Pyx (Amendment) Order 1990, one out of every 20,000 10p coins was set aside for trial with the result that almost 60,000 were included in the 1993 trial. The delivery of the verdict is expected on 7 May at Goldsmiths' Hall and will be published in the London Gazette.

The Coinage Act 1971 and subsequent proclamations, require coins to be made in accordance with certain standards and permitted variations defined in terms of composition, weight and diameter. The legislation prescribes no penalties for variation from these specifications.

The Royal Mint is satisfied, after consultation with machine manufacturers and operators, that the new 10p coins are suitable for use in automatic machines.

EDUCATION

Christianity

Lady Olga Maitland: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what consideration he has given to the draft guidance on Christianity prepared by the working group set up under the auspices of the National Curriculum Council.

Mr. Forth: My right hon. Friend supports the work which the National Curriculum Council is undertaking in this area, and looks forward to seeing the results in due course.

Parental Choice

Mr. Bill Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what assessment he has made as to the effect of a reduction in school places on parental choice.

Mr. Forth: The effect of the removal of surplus places will vary from one area to another. My right hon. Friend is currently consulting local education authorities about the level of surplus places that can practicably be removed. The effect on parental choice is one of the factors which he will take into account.

Schools (Capital Expenditure)

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will publish figures for capital spending on schools for each of the local education authorities for each of the last five years for which figures are available.

Mr. Forth: The table gives the information requested.

Notes:

1. Expenditure is given in cash terms, rounded to the nearest £1,000; it includes provision from within the Department of the Environment's Urban Programme, and covers nursery, primary, secondary and special education. Information is taken from the Department of the Environment's Capital Outturn Return forms.
2. Final outturn information for 1991-92 is not yet available from the Department of the Environment.

Eastern Europe (Engineering)

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what plans he has to assist the Institution of Electrical Engineers in helping universities in eastern Europe with the accreditation of university engineering degrees.

Mr. Boswell: None, but the institution is free to apply to participate in the EC's TEMPUS programme of assistance to the higher education systems of the countries of central and eastern Europe.

NATIONAL HERITAGE

Tourism

14. Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if he will make a statement on the development of tourism in Wiltshire.

Mr. Brooke: In 1991 Wiltshire received over a million tourism visits, contributing £83 million to the county's economy. Given the fast-growing popularity of rural tourism, Wiltshire is well placed for growth in its tourism sector, building on projects such as the Wiltshire tourism development action programme, which has received Government support through the tourist boards.

22. Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if he will make a statement on the measures to help the tourist industry contained in the Budget.

Mr. Key: The objective of the measures contained in the Budget is to establish a sound basis for economic stability and growth. This will benefit industry in general, including tourism. The help announced for small businesses will be particularly welcome.

27. Mr. Brandreth: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what measures he is proposing to promote tourism in the north-west.

Mr. Key: My Department supports the work of the British Tourist Authority, the English tourist board and the North West regional tourist board, and next year we shall spend almost £1 billion, much of it on activities which will enhance tourism across the United Kingdom.

29. Mr. Robert Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what representations he has received from small hoteliers concerning their contribution to tourism.

Mr. Key: Since taking up my present appointment, I have met and corresponded with many small hoteliers and representatives from organisations promoting their interests. I am advised by the English tourist board that of the 22,547 listed hotels, motels, inns and guest houses in England over 61 per cent. have 10 bedrooms or fewer. I therefore appreciate that they are an important element in the provision of accommodation in this country.

Radio Franchises (London)

15. Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what level of interest he expects in the forthcoming batch of independent radio franchises which are up for renewal in London.

Mr. Key: The Radio Authority is responsible for licensing of radio services and I understand that it expects considerable interest in the London-wide licences.

Pornographic Broadcasting

16. Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what powers are available to Her Majesty's Government to prevent the sale of access facilities to pornographic television stations based in the EC.

Mr. Brooke: Section 177 of the Broadcasting Act 1990 enables the Secretary of State, provided certain conditions are satisfied, to make an order proscribing an unacceptable foreign satellite television service. The Secretary of State must first have been notified by the Independent Television Commission that the service is considered unacceptable and should be proscribed. The Secretary of State must then satisfy himself that the making of the order is in the public interest and compatible with any international obligations of the United Kingdom. Those obligations, in the case of a service transmitted from another EC member state, would include obligations under the EC Broadcasting Directive.

The making of an order under section 177 attracts to it the criminal offences of supporting a proscribed foreign satellite service detailed in section 178. These include supplying or offering to supply a decoder for a proscribed service.

Sir Michael Neubert: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if he will seek new powers to ban the transmissions, such of those of the Red Hot Dutch satellite television channel, to the United Kingdom or to prohibit the reception of such transmissions.

Mr. Brooke: I refer to the answer that I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, North (Mr. Gale) on 19 March, Official Report, column 427.

Broadcasting Act 1990

17. Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage when he last met the chairman of the ITC to discuss the workings of the Broadcasting Act 1990.

Mr. Brooke: On 3 February.

Arts Funding, Croydon

18. Mr. Ottaway: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if he will make a statement on the proposed level of funding for Croydon received from the London Arts Board in 1993.

Mr. Key: The London Arts Board has so far made grants for 1993-94 only to those arts organisations in receipt of annual revenue funding. These include a grant of nearly £40,000 to the Croydon Warehouse, an increase of 50 per cent. over 1992-93. Further grants will be made under a wide range of other project-funding programmes.

Public Service Broadcasting

19. Mr. Bryan Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage when he plans next to meet the chairman and director general of the British Broadcasting Corporation to discuss the future of public service broadcasting.

Mr. Brooke: I meet the chairman and director general from time to time to discuss matters of common interest. I hope to attend the BBC's annual strategy conference in June, which is likely to be much concerned with the future of public service broadcasting.

Sports Funding

20. Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage when he last met the chairman of the Sports Council to discuss the funding of sport.

Mr. Brooke: The funding of sport is one of many issues I discussed with the chairman of the Sports Council when I met him earlier this year.

Concessionary Television Licences

21. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what plans he has to meet the chairman of the BBC to discuss rules relating to concessionary television licences; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: I have no plans to meet the chairman of the BBC to discuss the concessionary television licence scheme. As I indicated in reply to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Waveney (Mr. Porter) on 14 December, Official Report, col. 14, the Government have repeatedly made it clear that we have no plans to amend or extend the regulations governing the concessionary scheme, which were thoroughly overhauled in 1988 after long and careful consideration.

23. Mr. Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what recent discussions he has had with the BBC regarding rules governing the eligibility for concessionary television licences.

Mr. Brooke: None. We have no plans to change the present concessionary television licence scheme.

National Lottery

24. Mr. Hutton: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what representations he has received concerning the impact of the National Lottery etc. Bill on lotteries organised by sporting and charitable organisations.

Mr. Key: We received a number of representations from football clubs and United Kingdom Charity Lotteries Ltd., expressing their concerns. We have taken these into account. Three important changes have been made to the provisions in the Bill relating to society or local authority lotteries, and my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department is considering other issues which were raised in Committee.

25. Mr. Gunnell: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if he will make it his policy to ensure that regional museums receive funding from the national lottery.

Mr. Key: The National Heritage Memorial Fund will be responsible for distributing lottery money to the heritage. The NHMF already funds projects which are of outstanding regional or local, as well as national, interest. I am confident the trustees will continue to do so, judging grant applications on the basis of quality and priority.

London Marathon

26. Ms Hoey: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what support has been given by the Government to the 1993 London marathon.

Mr. Brooke: Most Government support for sport is channelled via the Sports Council, which does not provide any grant to the London marathon. I am delighted that agreement has been reached with the organisers of the 1993 marathon for use of the royal parks. No other direct support has been sought or given.

Football Clubs

28. Mr. Illsley: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what plans he has to meet representatives of football clubs from divisions 1, 2 and 3 of the Football League, to discuss finance and ground safety.

Mr. Brooke: I have no plans at present to do so. My officials meet the football authorities regularly to discuss all aspects of Government policy regarding football grounds.

Television Booster Stations

Mr. Hanson: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if he will set a date for the erection of effective television booster stations along the Deeside coast to improve reception of Welsh television programmes.

Mr. Brooke: It is for the broadcasters, not the Government, to determine the priorities for the programme of engineering work.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Crown Prosecution Service

35. Mr. Bates: To ask the Attorney-General if he will make a statement on the total personnel employed by (a) Cleveland and (b) Durham Crown prosecution service as at 1 March.

The Solicitor-General: On 1 March 1993, the Crown prosecution service employed 23 lawyers in Cleveland and 47 support staff, and 20 lawyers in Durham and 47 support staff.

Convictions (Magistrates Courts)

36. Mr. Dunn: To ask the Attorney-General what proportion of cases pursued by the Crown prosecution service in the magistrates courts in 1991-92 resulted in a conviction.

The Solicitor-General: Of the 1,068,750 defendants tried in the magistrates courts during the year 1991-92, 1,040,997 were convicted or pleaded guilty, representing a conviction rate of 97·4 per cent.

Prosecutions

37. Mr. Winnick: To ask the Attorney-General how many prosecutions have taken place this year.

The Attorney-General: Information is not yet available for 1993. In 1992, Crown prosecution service areas finalised proceedings in respect of 1,557,128 defendants.

Lenient Sentences

38. Mr. Duncan: To ask the Attorney-General by what method he informs offenders whose sentence appears to him to be unduly lenient that he is referring the sentence to the Court of Appeal under section 36 of the Criminal Justice Act 1988.

The Attorney-General: Rules of court place that responsibility on the court. However, it is my practice to inform the offender of my application before informing other interested parties. He may be informed direct, through his solicitor or via the governor of the relevant prison.

Prosecution Files

Sir Michael Neubert: To ask the Attorney-General what impact the adoption of common standards by police forces for the submission of prosecution files will have on the work of the Crown prosecution service.

The Attorney-General: The adoption of common standards by police forces for the submission of prosecution files should ensure that every file on initial receipt by the Crown prosecution service contains sufficient material on which an informed decision can be made as to whether a prosecution should proceed. Such an improvement should enable the Crown prosecution service to carry out its functions more efficiently and effectively and will reduce delay in the criminal justice system.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT ADMINISTRATION

Southern Africa (Drought)

44. Mr. William O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assistance the Government are offering to assist with the southern African drought; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Since the beginning of 1992 we have committed about £67 million for drought work in southern Africa, including our share of the EC special food aid programme. We are ready to provide further help where it is most needed.

Poland (Privatisation)

45. Mr. Matthew Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress to date had been made on the ODA contract awarded to S. G. Warburg and Co. to aid the Polish Government's privatisation programme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: S. G. Warburg is helping to design and implement a programme involving the creation of 10 to 15 national investment funds. The Polish Government lost a vote on 18 March on the privatisation programme. The Polish Prime Minister has said that she would not give up her reform efforts. We remain ready to help.

Know-how Funds (Scottish Organisations)

46. Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the Scottish institutions, voluntary associations and other parties which are currently taking part in the know-how fund programme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: There are numerous Scottish companies, voluntary organisations and educational institutions involved in the various strands of the know-how fund scheme. A list has been placed in the Libraries of the House.

Population

47. Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to make an official visit to the Vatican to discuss population issues.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We have no plans at the moment. My right hon. and noble Friend the Minister for Overseas Development met a representative from the Vatican recently and discussed population and development issues.

Tanzania

Sir Thomas Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a further statement about the progress of the redevelopment of the port and harbour facilities in Tanga, Tanzania.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Tenders for the civil works will close in early April. It is expected that the contract will be awarded by the end of June. As soon as that contract is awarded, and the timing and scope of the civil works contract is known, the contract to rehabilitate quayside cranes will be negotiated.

Rhinoceroses

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what financial resources have been made available to (a) Zimbabwe, (b) Tanzania, (c) Zaire and (d) Kenya to protect the remaining rhinoceroses.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Since 1990, the following sums have been committed to projects specifically aimed at protecting the rhino.

(a) Zimbabwe	37,200
(b) Tanzania	33,600
(c) Kenya	100,000

Since 1990 we have also committed the following sums to projects concerned with the protection and conservation of wildlife, which should also benefit the rhinoceros:

(a) Zimbabwe	2,931,444
(b) Tanzania	1,155,800
(c) Kenya	13,400,331

We have not supported wildlife projects in Zaire.

Developing Countries

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will set out the level of aid expenditure to developing countries in each year since 1963 both at current prices and at 1992-93 prices.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The information is as follows:

Gross public expenditure on aid 1963 to 1991-92

	Actual expenditure on aid £ million	1992-93 prices £ million
1963	163	1,750

Agricultural Development

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make it his policy to support the second phase of the special programme for Africa of the International Fund for Agricultural Development.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) on 8 March at columns 454-55.

Institution of Electrical Engineers

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what co-operation under the know-how fund, or other assistance, is being provided to the Institution of Electrical Engineers in its work in eastern and central Europe.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: None.

Medical Aid

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how much medical aid is to be given to (a) Somalia, (b) Ethiopia and (c) other third-world countries this year; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We provide health-related assistance through our bilateral aid programmes; our support for multilateral organisations; and as part of Britain's humanitarian assistance effort.

We are providing over £100 million a year for health care, water and sanitation and population programmes in developing countries through out bilateral aid programmes and our support for health-related multilateral organisations.

In 1991-92, the last year for which figures are available, we spent £0·288 million under our bilateral country programme to Ethiopia on health-related assistance. We have no bilateral country programme to Somalia.

Our bilateral humanitarian assistance is channelled through UN agencies and non-governmental organisations. It is provided according to need and the ability of agencies to deliver. In 1992, we committeed £2·5 million in Somalia and £1·2 million in Ethiopia and Eritrea of humanitarian assistance for the provision of health care.

PRIME MINISTER

Public Bodies (Appointments)

Mr. Clelland: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his answer of 9 March, Official Report, column 517, if he will list the former right hon. and hon. Members who have been appointed to bodies in Northumbria to which Ministers make appointments, together with the salaries, emoluments or honoraria paid to the former hon. Members concerned since April 1992.

The Prime Minister: The information is not held centrally and can be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Nuclear Testing

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Prime Minister what assessment he has made of the possible contribution of a comprehensive test ban treaty towards nuclear non-proliferation.

The Prime Minister: A comprehensive test ban would not in itself prevent a proliferator from producing and deploying a crude nuclear weapon without recourse to testing, and from obtaining the materials with which to do this. But associated measures for verification and inspection, if sufficiently rigorous, and applicable to the states concerned, might constrain potential proliferations.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Prime Minister what is Her Majesty's Government's policy towards the negotiation of a comprehensive test ban treaty by September 1996; and if he will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: We support the ultimate goal of a comprehensive test ban. The factors which will influence the rate at which progress towards a ban can be made will include the need to develop an effective system of verification. We will also need to be confident that we have the necessary technologies and expertise to maintain the safety of our nuclear weapons at the highest level without testing.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Prime Minister what assessment he has made of the effect of the testing of nuclear weapons by emerging nuclear weapon states on the security interests of the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: Since India exploded a nuclear device in 1974, we are aware of no established case of a country other than those recognised by the non-proliferation treaty as nuclear weapons states conducting a nuclear test.

HEALTH

Low Income Scheme

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when her Department will publish its review of low income health benefits including simplification of form AG1; and what are the causes of the delay in publishing the review.

Dr. Mawhinney: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave the hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) on 15 December 1992 at column 184 and to the reply I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Hastings and Rye (Mrs. Lait) on 11 March at column 708.

Complaints Procedure

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many complaints were made by patients to health authorities during the last year for which figures are available; and how many of these complaints were upheld.

Mr. Sackville: The total number of written complaints received in 1990-91 by health authorities in respect of their hospital and community services was 37,350. Information on the outcome of each complaint is not held centrally.

General Practitioners

Ms Hoey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will give the family health services authority the right to suspend a general practitioner suspected of severe misconduct while his or her case is under investigation.

Mr. Sackville: The powers of family health service authorities in this, as in other areas, are kept under continuous review.

Broadgreen Hospital

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will make a statement on the latest representations she has received from hon. Members about the proposed closure of Broadgreen hospital.

Mr. Sackville: Liverpool health authority is conducting a public consultation exercise on the proposals to close the accident and emergency department at Broadgreen hospital. This is due to finish on 31 March and the authority will take into account all views expressed before reaching a decision.

Elective Surgery Lists

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when she plans to update the elective surgery lists to encompass new techniques, change and innovation.

Mr. Sackville: The elective surgery list which forms part of the list of goods and services which may be purchased by general practitioner fund-holding practices is under continual review.

Tropical Diseases

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what estimate was made, in considering the future of St. Pancras hospital for tropical diseases, of the implications for the incidence of tropical diseases of the amount of travel by British citizens to tropical countries and the ability to make early diagnosis;

(2) what plans she has to provide specialist facilities for the diagnosis and treatment of specialist diseases in London and the south-east of England when St. Pancras hospital for tropical diseases is closed;

(3) what change is proposed in the number of beds and availability of specialist staffing for the diagnosis and treatment of tropical diseases in London.

Dr. Mawhinney: In our document, "Making London Better" we proposed moving the services currently provided at the London hospital for tropical diseases onto the rationalised UCH/Middlesex site. This proposal was recommended in the Tomlinson report and has the support of the main parties concerned. It will bring the hospital much closer to its associated academic institution, the London school of hygiene and tropical medicine, with consequent clinical and research benefits.

This proposal is subject to established consultation procedures.

Drugs (Limited List)

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health on what basis the therapeutic areas mentioned in the proposed limited listing of NHS drugs have been selected; and what consultation has taken place in the selection of the therapeutic areas in the limited listing.

Dr. Mawhinney: The categories were chosen because they cover a range of products at varying price levels and therefore offered scope for savings while enabling all real clinical needs to continue to be met. No consultations took place, because the basic structure of the select list scheme has not changed. It will be for the independent advisory committee on national health service drugs to give advice on whether particular products should be removed from prescription under the NHS.

Pharmacies

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what procedures exist for community health councils to advise family health service authorities on the granting of a contract to a pharmacy for dispensing prescriptions (a) in respect of overall policy and (b) in particular cases.

Dr. Mawhinney: Family health service authorities are expected to consult community health councils on local applications to dispense national health service prescriptions. In considering any changes to those procedures the Department would consult widely.

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what plans she has to abolish the application procedures for new pharmacies and all other restrictions on the provision of pharmacy services;

(2) what plans she has to streamline the procedures for family health service authorities accepting new pharmacies for dispensing NHS prescriptions.

Dr. Mawhinney: The Department is reviewing the impact of the pharmaceutical regulations on community pharmacists as part of the Government's wider initiative on deregulation. No decision has been made about the future of entry controls to pharmaceutical lists.

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is her policy on the number of pharmacies with which a family health service authority should have a contract for dispensing NHS prescriptions within inner-city areas; and if she will make a statement.

Dr. Mawhinney: All patients should have access to a community pharmacy regardless of where they live. In considering applications for new pharmacies, family health service authorities are required to take account of the level of provision already in the area.

NHS Drugs Bill

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what has been the total NHS drugs bill in each of the years since 1982.

Dr. Mawhinney: The total national health service drugs bill comprises expenditure by the family health services (FHS) and the hospital and community health services (HCHS). Figures for England are shown in the table.

£ million

Year	FHS	HCHS	Total
1982-83	1,009	245	1,254

1990-91	2,080	46.	2,540
1991-92	2,317	591	2,908

Pharmacists' Fees

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much of the drugs budget is spent on multiple fees to pharmacists for diphasic and triphasic drugs; and how much would be saved if only one fee was paid.

Dr. Mawhinney: This information could be provided only at disproportionate cost. Fees paid to pharmacists form part of their remuneration. The Department is committed to simplifying the fee structure as part of its restructuring of pharmacists' remuneration.

Oral Contraceptives

Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) whether the Government's proposed restriction of oral contraceptive prescriptions will apply to all women equally, regardless of age and medical history; and which categories of women will be exempt from the restrictions;

(2) what criteria are being used to determine which oral contraceptives are to be placed on the NHS selected list.

Dr. Mawhinney: The advisory committee on national health service drugs advises Health Ministers on which products in the selected list scheme categories should not be prescribable under the NHS. It is required to ensure that drugs to meet all real clinical needs can be provided economically as possible. It is open to the committee to advise that particular products can be prescribed only in specified circumstances.

Ambulance Service

Ms Estelle Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what percentage of ambulance arrival times are collected by radio transmission; what percentage are logged manually by ambulance staff at the scene of the incident; and if she will publish the figures for each health authority.

Mr. Sackville: This information is not collected centrally.

Ms Estelle Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will make it a requirement for ambulance services to collect and publish ambulance response times by district.

Mr. Sackville: No. It is for health authorities to decide whether to collect and publish local figures.

Ms Estelle Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will publish the numbers of ambulance 999 calls and any increase or decrease for each of the last five years for each health authority.

Mr. Sackville: The information is set out in the table. Care must be taken in interpreting the data as the figures include hoax and malicious calls, aborted calls and instances of multiple calls relating to the same incident.

Arthritis Care

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what discussions her Department has had with Arthritis Care on its proposed quality guidelines.

Dr. Mawhinney: A departmental official discussed the quality guidelines with Mr. Richard Gutch, chief executive of Arthritis Care, on 18 March 1993.

Resource Allocation Working Party

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will estimate the financial effect of (a) the original resource allocation working party formula and (b) the amended resource allocation working party formula recommended in 1988 in each health region's actual level of funding for each year from 1989-90.

Mr. Sackville: The information requested could be provided only at disproportionate cost. The resource allocation working party formulae were superseded in April 1990 by a weighted capitation formula based on resident populations, as announced in the White Paper "Working for Patients" (Cm 555, January 1989).

South-East London Joint Health Board

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when she was first consulted about the formation of a joint board between the South-East London Commissioning Authority and the Lambeth, Southwark and Lewisham family health services authority; whether she has issued any guidelines to the two authorities; when she approved the formation of the joint board; when she approved the appointment of the joint chief executive; and what is the salary of the joint chief executive.

Dr. Mawhinney: Members of the South-East London Commissioning Authority (SELCA) and Lambeth, Southwark and Lewisham family health service authority (FHSA) have created an interim joint policy board to consider what arrangements will work best for them in strengthening their joint working. They expect this to lead to the setting up of a joint policy board. The three district health authorities (DHAs) within SELCA and the FHSA have recently appointed a joint chief executive operating within the existing national guidelines and salary scales for health authority general manager appointments.

Although there are no statutory powers for FHSAs and DHAs to merge, they may enter into arrangements for joint working as joint commissioning agencies where this facilitates integration of primary and secondary care. Such arrangements are matters for the relevant region and its health authorities and FHSAs to decide.

Regional Health Authorities (Staff)

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people are employed by each regional health authority in England; how many staff she expects to be made redundant by each regional health authority in each of the next three years; and what steps have been taken by her Department to reduce staffing levels of regional health authorities.

Dr. Mawhinney: I refer the hon. Member to the replies I gave him on 18 March and 19 March at columns 352 and 437-38, and to my hon. Friend, the Member for Ludlow (Mr. Gill) on 4 March at column 221.

Food Hygiene

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many prosecutions have taken place, in each of the last three years, for non-compliance with food hygiene regulations; and how much money has been accumulated from the consequent fines.

Mr. Sackville: Information prior to 1991 is not available centrally.

During 1991 local authorities in the United Kingdom brought 1,143 prosecutions in connection with hygiene and microbiological contamination. In addition there were 691 prosecutions relating to chemical contamination and extraneous matter, some of which related to food safety and some to quality. The available information does not include the money accumulated from fines.

SCOTLAND

Water and Sewerage Services

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what formal submissions he has received to his consultative document on the future of water and sewerage services in Scotland from the 10 regional water companies in England and Wales and their subsidiaries; and if he will publish them.

Sir Hector Monro: Three of the 10 water and sewerage companies in England and Wales responded to the consultation paper "Investing For Our Future". The response from North West Water is available in the Scottish Office library in Edinburgh and a copy can readily be obtained through the Library of the House. The other two respondents asked that their responses should be treated as confidential.

HM Prison, Greenock

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to establish a visiting committee at Her Majesty's prison, Greenock; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 18 March 1993]: In his response to the report by Her Majesty's chief inspector of prisons on Her Majesty's prison, Greenock, published last year, my right hon. Friend said that an amendment to the Prison (Scotland) Rules 1952, designating Greenock a prison in its own right with its own visiting committee, would be promulgated when the current Prisoners and Criminal Proceedings (Scotland) Bill became law. That remains the position.

Training

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish by local enterprise company area (a) the numbers on youth training, employment training and employment action programmes, (b) the skills that are being learnt by youth training, employment and employment action participants, (c) the number and percentage of youth training, employment training and employment action participants who move on to full-time, permanent jobs and (d) the academic and vocational qualification achieved by participants on youth training and employment training schemes.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 10 March 1993]: Information by local enterprise company area about the skills that are learnt by youth training, employment training and employment action participants; and the number and percentage of such participants who move on to full-time permanent jobs is not available in the form requested. Information by local enterprise company area about the numbers on youth training, employment training and employment action as at January 1993; and the academic and vocational qualifications achieved by participants on youth training and employment training for the period April 1992 to January 1993 is set out in the tables:

Prescriptions

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many items of prescription are dispensed each day (a) to patients exempt from charges and (b) to patients paying for prescriptions; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 18 March 1993]: In 1991-92, there were on average 127,000 prescriptions dispensed each day in Scotland of which about 103,500 were exempt from charges; 18,000 attracted prescription charges and some 5,500 were dispensed to patients who had purchased prescription prepayment certificates.

Approximately 80 per cent. of all prescriptions dispensed in Scotland are free of charge under the national health service; a further 5 per cent. go to holders of prescription prepayment certificates.

GP Fund Holders

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make it his policy to provide at (a) regional and (b) national level regular information concerning the exhaustion of funds held by general practitioner fund holders; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 18 March 1993]: The regulations governing the fundholding scheme already make appropriate arrangements. Should a GP fundholding practice overspend its allotted sum or fund, the health board is required to review the circumstances involved. In the event that the health board considers that the overspend constitutes mismanagement of the fund it is required by regulations to remove the practice from the list of approved fund-holding practices within the board area, and to notify the practice, the national health service management executive and other interested parties of its decision. It would be open to the practice to appeal against this decision to the Secretary of State.

In the event of such an overspend by a fund-holding practice, or in the event of a fund-holding practice subsequently being removed from the list of approved fund holders because of such an overspend, the health board is required to make arrangements to ensure that the access of registered patients at the practice to national health service treatment will not be jeopardised.

Labour Statistics

Dr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many people were employed at the latest available date in (a) the potato industry, (b) the milk industry and (c) the wool industry in Scotland.

Sir Hector Monro [holding answer 19 March 1993]: The information sought is not held centrally. It is estimated that at June 1992 (a) 13,281 people were employed on farms which grow potatoes, (b) 8,636 on dairy farms and (c) 4,699 on mainly sheep and mixed sheep/beef farms.

Forestry

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what response he has made to Highland regional council's draft indicative forestry strategy; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Hector Monro [holding answer 19 March 1993]: Indicative forestry strategies prepared by regional and islands councils are not themselves subject to approval by my right hon. Friend. They may form the basis of policies and recommendations for forestry incorporated as an alteration to or part of a review of a structure plan prepared by a regional or islands council which are subject to approval by the Secretary of State. Highland regional council has submitted no alteration or review in relation to the structure plan approved in 1990.

TRANSPORT

A13, Canning Town

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what arrangements his Department has made to maintain traffic flow on the A13 at Canning Town during the period of road works; what assessment was made of the likely delays occasioned by the plans adopted; and what is the extent of maximum delays now being experienced.

Mr. Norris: These major road works will provide the westbound link of the A13 to the new docklands highways. To keep delays and disruption to a minimum, plans were drawn up in concert with the local authority, London Docklands development corporation and the police, but it was accepted that working in close proximity to a very busy trunk road would inevitably cause some delays. Before the works started the morning rush hour queues regularly extended to the end of the Canning Town flyover, and at times back to Freemason lane. Although delays are now longer the police have confirmed that these have been less than they anticipated. Conditions are expected to improve following the removal of lane restrictions on the Canning Town flyover this last weekend.

Road Haulage (Environmental Effects)

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment has been made of the impact of increased lorry weights on London's roads and bridges, in terms of environmental impacts, including structural damage, and additional financial costs.

Mr. Norris: No assessment of the general environmental impact of increased lorry weights on London's roads and bridges has been made. On the Department's motorways and trunk roads in London, 125 structures have been subject to structural assessment. Some 580 structures are to be assessed as part of a rolling programme. Local authorities in London are responsible for a similar assessment programme in relation to their roads.

The Department chairs regular meetings with local authorities and structure owners in London to co-ordinate assessment work. These measures will ensure London's roads are able to safely carry existing and future traffic loads.

Railway Services

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when, and in what circumstances, he was informed about the proposed reduction in train services planned on the lines to the Sussex coast, Euston to Northampton, the Kent link, Hastings, Sheerness and Medway Valley lines, the lines from Liverpool Street into Essex and the Fenchurch Street via Tilbury to Southend line.

Mr. Freeman: It is for British Rail to decide what level of service is appropriate on each line. The board has, however, kept the Department informed of the broad thrust of its plans for Network SouthEast services as they have been developed over the last three to four months. I understand that the changes involve reductions in services of 2 to 3 per cent.—about half the loss of patronage over the last year.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his answer of 15 March, what assessment he has made of the benefits to the Thameslink and other Network SouthEast services of creating the relevant length of new viaduct and track between London Bridge and Metropolitan junction.

Mr. Norris: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer that I gave him on 16 February at column 153. It is for British Rail to appraise enhancements to the Thameslink service.

British Rail

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what was the reason for the creation of the post of deputy chairman of British Rail; what are the duties pertaining to this post; and in respect of what business and in what circumstances he contacts the deputy chairman of British Rail directly.

Mr. Freeman: The Transport Acts 1962 and 1968 enable the Secretary of State for Transport to appoint one or more members of the board as deputy or vice chairman or chairmen of the board.

Mr. Robert Horton has been appointed to the British Railways Board as vice chairman.

During the Second Reading debate on the Railways Bill my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced that Mr. Horton will be chairman-designate of Railtrack, and that he will have principal responsibility for taking forward the creation of Railtrack as a Government-owned company. Mr. Horton will work closely with the chairman and board of British Rail, and BR will retain full operational responsibility until April 1994, Official Report, 2 February 1993, column 159.

My right hon. Friend contacts Mr. Horton as appropriate to the circumstances.

Light Rail Systems

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what steps he is taking to promote a package approach to investment in transport systems via the transport supplementary grant; and what financial support he will give to those local authorities and consortia of authorities keen to implement such a package approach in order to develop light rail systems.

Mr. Freeman: As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport announced in his statement on the transport supplementary grant settlement on 15 December 1992, we are consulting the local authority associations about ways of introducing greater flexibility, within the constraints of existing legislation, into the funding of local authority transport expenditure in urban areas. The purpose of the package approach which we are discussing is not to favour the development of light rail systems in preference to other forms of transport investment, but to encourage local authorities to develop transport strategies for their urban areas in which light rail systems may or may not have a part to play.

Freight

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will take steps to reverse the trend of freight movement from rail to road.

Mr. Freeman: Privatisation of BR's freight businesses and liberalisation of access to the BR network offer the best prospects if rail is to improve its performance and become more attractive to industrial customers. In addition, my right hon. Friend announced a range of measures to encourage rail freight in his speech on Second Reading of the Railways Bill on 2 February.

Private Rail Sidings

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make it his policy to reclaim grants which have been paid to companies to assist in the construction of private rail sidings, where those companies have now closed the sidings and transferred the movement of goods to roads.

Mr. Freeman: It is a condition of the freight facilities grants scheme that companies must notify the Secretary of State of proposals to cease operation of rail facilities for which grant has been paid. In such cases it is up to the Secretary of State to determine whether to seek to recover the grant, or part of it, taking into account the length of time over which the facility has been operating, the value for money obtained from the grant and the reasons for the closure of the facility.

Road Schemes

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how much money has been (a) paid out in bonuses to contractors on road schemes and (b) received in penalty payments from contractors on road schemes in each of the last five years.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: The information, on contracts for which final payments have been made, is as follows:

Year	Total bonus payments £ million	Number of contractors earning bonus	Total charge payments £ million	Number of contractors incurring charge
1988-89	3·6	11	0·10	1
1989-90	5·1	20	0·50	4
1990-91	6·5	31	0·60	3
1991-92	2·1	18	0·05	1
1992-93	n/a	n/a	n/a	n/a

n/a = Figures not yet available.

The percentages of each year's lane rental contracts covered by these figures are: 1988-89, 100 per cent.; 1989-90, 90 per cent.; 1990-91, 80 per cent.; 1991-92, 38 per cent. The figures for 1989-90, 1990-91 and especially 1991-92 will therefore tend to increase as more final payments are made.

The ratio of traffic delay costs saved to net bonus payments made is of the order of five to one.

Heavy Goods Vehicles

Mr. Betts: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what account the traffic commissioner takes of local road conditions when taking decisions on the licensing of heavy goods vehicles.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: Traffic commissioners need to be satisfied about technical and environmental suitability before granting the use of an operating centre under a goods vehicle operator's licence.

When looking at technical suitability traffic commissioners will consider highway matters and road safety, as well as the actual size of the site and its facilities. However, this consideration is limited to the operating centre itself, any private road leading to a nearby public road, and the point of ingress and egress on to that public road. Anything beyond that is a matter for the local highway authority.

Consideration of environmental suitability is not so constrained. Nonetheless the extent of likely environmental impact generated by vehicles travelling to and from an operating centre would be judged against the wider background of other traffic activity on the approach roads as well as the perceived intrusion arising from the use of authorised vehicles at the operating centre itself.

Road Pricing

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will take steps to prevent the fees from road pricing being passed on to the consumers, in the case of goods vehicles.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: No decisions have yet been taken about the introduction of any form of direct charging for road use.

Highway Code

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what measures he proposes to ensure that all road users are familiar with the latest version of the highway code; and if he has any proposals to introduce periodic re-testing of drivers.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: In addition to the widespread media coverage given to the launch of the new highway code, the publisher, HMSO, has made extensive arrangements for marketing the code throughout the United Kingdom. These activities were so successful that 1 million copies of the code were sold in the first 10 days. To maintain awareness of the code, we are including a leaflet advertising the new edition with vehicle licence reminders sent by the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency to more than 20 million licence holders over a 12-month period.

I have no plans to introduce the periodic re-testing of drivers.

Road Improvements

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will set out the rules which are used for determining which options for road improvement schemes provide the best long-term value for money.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: The assessment of road scheme options takes into account all relevant effects.

Some of the effects are valued in monetary terms. These are savings in time, accidents and vehicle operating costs as well as construction costs. A net present value of these effects for each option is calculated over a 30-year period, using standard computer programmes. The techniques are described in the COBA, QUADRO and URECA manuals published by the Department.

Environmental effects are not valued in monetary terms. They are subject to a comprehensive assessment including noise, visual, ecological, air quality and other relevant effects.

Public Transport

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what measures he is taking to extend the scope of the transport supplementary grant to cover public transport systems; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: The scope of transport supplementary grant is defined by section 88 of the Local Government Finance Act 1988. Further primary legislation would be required to extend the scope of TSG. We are, however, consulting the local authority associations about ways of introducing greater flexibility, within the constraints of existing legislation, into the funding of local authority transport expenditure in urban areas.

Rail Funding

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment has been made of the economic and employment benefits from public funding of crossrail, Orbital Rail, and improving the Thames link by comparison with proposed road schemes.

Mr. Norris: Assessment of road and rail projects in London is based on consistent planning assumptions and methodology. We make direct comparisons between road and rail schemes only where they offer alternative means of meeting specific transport objectives. In strategic studies comparisons are made between investment in alternative modes of transport. The London assessment studies included an assessment of the effects of a package of road schemes and a package of rail schemes, including those mentioned. It was decided not to proceed with the road schemes.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Scott Inquiry

Mr. Gunnell: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will indicate when is the latest date he expects the Scott inquiry to report.

Mr. Needham: The timing of the inquiry is a matter for Lord Justice Scott. He has, however, made it clear that he wishes to report as soon as possible.

Export Promotion

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what are the current rules relating to financial assistance for United Kingdom firms engaged in export promotion.

Mr. Needham: The Department of Trade and Industry, together with the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, provide a wide range of services to exporters, some of which involve payment of grants. Grant schemes are available to United Kingdom firms involved in exporting for the benefit of the country; access to them is generally limited to a maximum number of times; one scheme is limited specifically to smaller firms.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list the amounts of money allocated to support of United Kingdom firms engaged in export promotion for each of the last five years for which figures are available.

Mr. Needham: Gross expenditure, including staff costs, on the provision of support to United Kingdom exporters by the Department of Trade and Industry and the Foreign and Commonwealth Office together has been:

	£ million
1991-92	173·4
1990-91	163·5
1989-90	138·4

	£ million
1988-89	130·5
1987-88	106·2

Details of the expenditure are given in the annual reports of the British Overseas Trade Board, copies of which are available in the Library. The figures for 1989-90 and earlier do not include overheads of Department of Trade and Industry headquarters staff and the costs of the export offices in territorial departments, estimated at some £20 million.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what discussions he has had with his EC counterparts on the question of increased financial support for EC firms engaged in export promotion.

Mr. Needham: My Department has regular discussions with its counterparts in other EC countries on the kind and level of support available to our respective exporters. Such discussions cover a wide range of topics, not confined to the level of financial support.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what plans he has to increase the amount of resources available for export promotion.

Mr. Needham: The Government devote a substantial and increasing amount of resource to helping United Kingdom companies to succeed in overseas markets. The initiative announced recently by my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade to recruit 100 secondees from industry will add substantially to our export promotion effort.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what plans he has to relax the conditions currently applied to funds for export promotion.

Mr. Needham: The conditions applying to the provision of financial support to exporters are kept under constant review by, for example, surveys of users; changes are introduced as and when appropriate.

Offshore Oil and Gas Industry

Mr. David Porter: To ask the President of the Board of Trade (1) if he will make a statement on how far the working group on United Kingdom continental shelf competitiveness took account of the southern North sea and Lowestoft and Great Yarmouth activities in preparing its February 1993 report;

(2) if he will make it his policy to commission a special report into the United Kingdom continental shelf competitiveness, southern North sea sector, with special reference to the activities and the future economic base of Lowestoft and Great Yarmouth.

Mr. Eggar: I asked the working group to consider ways of improving the competitiveness of the United Kingdom continental shelf in relation to worldwide oil and gas activities. The group was not asked to concentrate on any areas of the United Kingdom and its conclusions and recommendations will be of benefit to all parts of the offshore industry.

Regional Assistance

Mr. Colin Shepherd: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many applications for grant aid under the facility provided by the intermediate area status of the Ross-on-Wye and Cinderford travel-to-work area were made in each year since its inception; how many of these were successful; what is his estimate of the additional number of people employed as a consequence; and what is the number of these currently in post.

Mr. Sainsbury: Since the Cinderford and Ross-on-Wye travel-to-work area was granted assisted area status in 1984, the number of applications for regional selective assistance received, the number approved and the number of jobs expected to be created and/or safeguarded as a result of approved projects has been as follows:

Year	Applications received	Offers	Created jobs	Safeguarded jobs
1985	14	10	256	291
1986	7	10	430	148
1987	10	8	96	0
1988	16	12	172	29
1989	17	10	293	454
1990	12	7	149	32
1991	17	14	104	7
1992	11	8	66	18
[1]1993	2	1	3	1
Totals	106	80	1,569	980

[1] To date.

It is not possible to say how many jobs have been maintained without contacting the companies involved. This would involve disproportionate cost.

Energy Consumption

Mr. Madden: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what assessment he has made of the level of demand over the next five years for (a) coal, (b) electricity and (c) gas; what effect he expects the imposition of value added tax upon fuel and energy to have on consumption; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: My Department recently published a range of energy demand projections in Energy Paper 59, a copy of which is in the Library of the House. Those projections showed domestic sector energy demand approximately 6 per cent. higher in 2000 than in 1990. The imposition of VAT on domestic fuels is expected, in the long run, to reduce domestic sector consumption of coal by about 2 per cent. and of electricity and gas by about 4 per cent. This takes no account of the effects of any offsetting measures.

Power Cuts

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what has been the average number of hours of power lost per consumer due to system interruptions in the area covered by each of the electricity companies in England in each of the last five years.

Mr. Eggar: The information is as follows:

Hours lost per connected customer

	1987-88	1988-89	1989-90	1990-91	1991-92
London	4·9	0·8	1·0	0·9	1·1
Seeboard	21·1	1·8	3·6	1·7	1·4
Southern	9·1	1·6	9·7	1·6	1·7
South Western	2·5	2·4	15·3	3·1	2·9
South Wales	3·3	3·2	5·9	5·5	5·4
Manweb	2·0	1·4	2·7	3·1	1·8
Eastern	12·5	1·2	3·0	1·3	1·1
East Midlands	1·4	1·3	1·8	16·7	1·5
Midlands	1·7	1·6	2·8	6·6	2·0
Norweb	1·1	1·1	1·3	1·5	1·2
Yorkshire	1·3	1·2	1·3	2·9	1·0
Northern	1·3	1·5	1·7	4·1	1·6

This table of system interruptions in each of the areas covered by the 12 regional electricity companies (RECs) was compiled by the Office of Electricity Regulation (OFFER). Full data are available on request from each REC or from OFFER.

Coal Research Establishment

Mr. Hanson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on the future of the coal research establishment near Cheltenham.

Mr. Eggar: Government policy on clean coal technology and the future of CRE are interlinked and both are currently being considered in the context of the coal review.

Electrical Engineers

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what action is being taken by his Department to assist the Institution of Electrical Engineers' support and co-operation programme for central and eastern Europe.

Mr. Sainsbury: Following my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade's meeting with representatives from IEE, initial discussions are taking place with officials to determine how best to take forward the IEE's central and eastern Europe initiative.

Company Accounts

Sir David Steel: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will seek to amend schedules 7 and 8 to the Companies Act 1985 to ensure that donations in kind as well as cash to political parties require to be published in company accounts.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: I have no plans to do so.

Electricity Generation

Mr. Dafis: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement outlining the work undertaken by his Department in researching the potential use of magnetohydrodynamics in the generation of electricity in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Eggar: My Department keeps the prospects for magnetohydrodynamics under review, together with other energy technologies of potential application in the United Kingdom.

Post Office

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when he estimates his review of the Post Office is likely to be completed.

Mr. Leigh: The review will be completed in due course, at which time a statement will be made to the House.

Opencast Mining

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will now make a statement on his policy on opencast coal mining.

Mr. Eggar: We are currently engaged in a wide-ranging review of the prospects for 21 of the pits proposed for closure by British Coal, in the context of the Government's energy policy. The future of opencast mining is clearly relevant in this context. A White Paper will be published setting out the results of the review.

European Economic Area

Mr. Conway: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what effect the Swiss referendum result will have on the implementation of the European economic area.

Mr. Heseltine [pursuant to the reply, 8 December 1992, Official Report, col. 592]: The impact of the Swiss vote on the Community and EFTA has now been fully assessed.

The Community and the other EFTA states have agreed the changes necessary to the EEA agreement to exclude Switzerland. A protocol to amend the EEA agreement was signed on 17 March by the Community, its member states and those other EFTA states. The protocol includes a target date of entry into force by 1 July 1993, but with provision for this to be later if one or more signatories are unable to ratify within that time. I am now considering how the European Economic Area Bill, which provides for implementation of the agreement by the United Kingdom, should take account of the amending protocol.

Small Firms

Mr. Steen: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, further to his answer of 23 February, Official Report, column 512, what plans his Department has to survey small firms to assess the value of the small firms development schemes.

Mr. Leigh [holding answer 17 March 1993]: The Department has a rolling programme of evaluations to assess the value of assistance schemes and to guide policy. In the last three years, 13 evaluations have been carried out of assistance schemes, of which all have involved some sampling of recipients.

My right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade is now considering what further evaluations should be carried out during 1993-94 to inform policy towards small and medium-sized firms.

Export Insurance

Mr. Morgan: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what representations he has received from organisations of British exporters in relation to the level of insurance cover provided for exports in traditional British markets; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Needham [holding answer 8 March 1993]: Since December 1991 the privatised successor of ECGD's Insurance Services Group has had responsibility for the provision of the short-term export credit insurance previously provided by the Export Credits Guarantee Department to United Kingdom exporters.

The new company currently sources over 90 per cent. of its reinsurance needs, for both commercial and political risk worldwide, from the private market. The ECGD currently supplements the private sector reinsurance treaties of the new company under arrangements intended to ensure that United Kingdom exporters do not suffer any reduction in export credit insurance facilities as a result of privatisation.

I believe that the effect of these reinsurance arrangements, the details of which I outlined in my reply of 22 February, to the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms Harman), Official Report, column 443, will be to maintain a good level of short-term export credit insurance support for United Kingdom exporters.

Representations have been made to me by interested parties about the likely adequacy of the reinsurance market to meet future demand and the implications this may have for Government policy. I am considering these representations.

Representations have also been received about ECGD's support for projects business. I am therefore pleased to be able to refer the hon. Gentleman to the Budget statement in which it was announced that additional export credit cover of £1,300 million is to be made available over the next three years to help United Kingdom companies win business in a number of important markets. Additionally for 1993-94 the premium paid by exporters for such business will be cut by 7·5 per cent. on average in ECGD's top 20 business markets.

Credit Cards

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many representations he has received since 1 January calling for all credit cards to carry photographs of the holder; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jack: I have been asked to reply.

As far as I am aware, only one such representation has been received within this period, from the right hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown).

Putting laser-engraved photographs on credit cards was recommended by a recent Home Office study on the prevention of cheque and credit card fraud—crime prevention unit paper 26—and I understand that this is one of the fraud prevention measures being considered by the card payments industry, alongside other forms of cardholder identification such as personal identity numbers, finger-scanners and digitised signatures.

Brazil

Mr. Denham: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on the meeting between Government Ministers and non-governmental organisations and Brazil's Environment Minister, Mr. Coutinho Jorge, concerning the blockage of funds to Brazil.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd [holding answer 16 March 1993]: I have been asked to reply.

Senhor Coutinho Jorge's programme included separate meetings with Ministers and officials in several Departments and with non-governmental organisations. His discussions with officials in the Overseas Development Administration concerned inter alia progress on the implementation of the G7 pilot programme for the conservation of the Brazilian rain forest, to which Britain is a contributor. He was assured that Britain was providing the contributions it had promised to the pilot programme through our bilateral technical co-operation programme in the Amazon area and to the Rainforest Trust Fund, and of our intention to participate in future pilot programme activities as resources permitted.

ENVIRONMENT

Service Personnel (Housing)

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what proposals the Housing Corporation has to tackle the housing needs of personnel leaving the services.

Sir George Young: The Housing Corporation has earmarked resources for 500 homes under its do-it-yourself shared ownership programme specifically for personnel leaving the services under "Options for Change". The corporation is also allocating funds, where appropriate, to individual housing associations for use in the sale or lease by the Ministry of Defence of surplus MoD housing, in return for nominations of ex-service personnel for tenancies. The corporation's programme of new homes for rent is targeted principally at meeting the needs of homeless people, and supports the role of local authorities in providing social housing, including their duties to households accepted as homeless under the Housing Act 1985, who may include service personnel. These measures complement a series of initiatives announced by MoD in 1992 to extend housing opportunities for service personnel.

Wildlife

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to establish registration and accreditation schemes for wildlife rehabilitation in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Maclean: For a number of years, my Department has operated a scheme to license individuals who wish to rehabilitate injured or diseased birds. The scheme provides that licensees may tend and rehabilitate birds up to six weeks without having to comply with the statutory registration requirements which apply to some species. There are no plans for comparable schemes for further rehabilitation in the United Kingdom.

Energy Efficiency

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what proposals his Department's Building Research Establishment has put to the European network of building research institutes on developments in energy-efficient buildings.

Mr. Baldry: The Building Research Establishment—BRE—has not submitted specific designs for energy-efficient buildings to the European network of building institutes—ENBRI—BRE is, however, leading an ENBRI working group which is developing an approach to the environmental assessment of building across Europe based on the Building Research Establishment assessment method.

Ruddy Duck

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent decisions he has taken to halt the spread of the ruddy duck.

Mr. Maclean: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave the hon. Member for Don Valley (Mr. Redmond) on 11 March, [Official Report, columns 656-57.].

River Culm

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the current level of pollution in the River Culm in Devon.

Mr. Maclean: I understand from the National Rivers Authority that water quality in the River Culm has improved very significantly in recent years. The great majority of its length was reported in the 1990 river quality survey as class 2, "fair" quality, and the river again supports popular fisheries.

Sewage Waste

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what volumes of sewage wastes are treated annually by ultra-violet radiation.

Mr. Maclean: Detailed information is not held centrally. The issuing of consents to discharge ultra-violet irradiated sewage effluent is, in England and Wales, a matter for the National Rivers Authority.

Air Quality

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what discussions his Department has had with outside bodies in regard to the draft EC framework directive on air quality standards.

Mr. Maclean: Discussions between European Commission officials and experts from member states are at an early stage and the general principles to be covered by the framework directive have not yet been settled. The Department has consulted experts involved in its current monitoring programmes and will be seeking the views of the expert panel on air quality standards and the quality of urban air review group, bodies specifically set up to advise the Department on these matters in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what monitoring is carried out by (a) his Department and (b) local authorities for levels of air pollution and their impact on health.

Mr. Maclean [holding answer 17 March 1993]: My Department currently monitors or co-ordinates monitoring of air quality at a large number of sites in the United Kingdom. Many of these sites provide information which can be used to assess possible effects of air pollution on health. I have summarised such monitoring undertaken by the Department in the table. The table also indicates where all or some of the sites are operated by local authorities on behalf of the Department. Local authorities also undertake air quality monitoring independently of central Government. At present there are no centrally held records of these monitoring activities.

Air quality monitoring, carried out by the Department of the Environment, which provides information of relevance to health impacts: March 1993

Water Fluoridation

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what proportion of the cost of fluoridation of the public drinking water supply is charged to (a) the public and (b) health authorities when it is introduced by water companies.

Mr. Maclean: I am advised that both the capital and revenue costs are borne by the health authorities.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list those water companies that (a) have introduced and (b) are proposing to introduce fluoridation of the public drinking water supplies.

Mr. Maclean: Present legislation—section 87 of the Water Industry Act 1991—permits the fluoridation of waters supplies where, following consultation, a district health authority so requests. The health authority must apply in writing to the water undertakers, who may then decide to increase the fluoride content of the water supplied within the area specified in the health authority's application. I am advised that the following water undertakers are currently increasing the concentration of fluoride in some water supplies within their areas in response to such requests:

Anglian Water Services Ltd.
Northumbrian Water Ltd.
North West Water Ltd.
Severn Trent Water Ltd.
Thames Water Utilities Ltd.
East Worcestershire Water Ltd.
North East Water plc
South Staffordshire Water plc

Details are not available centrally of water companies which may be considering introducing fluoridation in the future.

European Investment Bank

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the level of proposed funding for environmental protection projects in 1993 under the European investment bank.

Mr. Maclean: The European investment bank lends funds for investment projects which meet certain agreed Community objectives. The bank assesses applications as they arise on this basis and does not set targets or plans for lending for particular kinds of projects.

Renovation Grants

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what proposals he has to change the rules for the means testing of renovation grants.

Mr. Baldry: I refer the hon. Member to the answer my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Planning gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam (Lady Olga Maitland) on 19 March, Official Report, column 397.

Docklands Light Railway

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to sell the track of the docklands light railway and to franchise the operation of rolling stock and stations separately.

Mr. Redwood: The Government are committed to privatising the docklands light railway within the lifetime of this Parliament. The timing, manner and practicality of the privatisation are currently being determined.

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the chairman and non-executive members of the board of the docklands light railway; what is the remuneration of each; when each was appointed; and what directorships and public appointments each has declared under the company reporting procedures.

Mr. Redwood [holding answer 8 March 1993]: Details of the chairman and non-executive directors of Docklands Light Railway Ltd, and their dates of appointment, are as follows:

	Date of appointment
Chairman
Sir Peter Levene	4 July 1991
Non-executive directors
Sir Robert Reid	11 April 1991
Mr. D. R. Murrin	9 March 1989
Mr. K. E. C. Sorensen	11 April 1991
Mr. R. C. M. Rankin	25 November 1992

The chairman receives remuneration of £27,000 per annum. Three directors draw no salary. The fourth receives a salary in the band £5,001 to £10,000 per annum.

Information on other directorships held by the above, declared under the company reporting procedures, has been placed in the Library of the House.

Compulsory Competitive Tendering

Mr. Pope: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what consultations he had with the European Commission prior to issuing guidance on the implications for compulsory competitive tendering of the Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations 1981.

Mr. Robin Squire: None. My right hon. and learned Friend's statement on 11 March, Official Report, column 662, principally concerned the use of his powers relating to compulsory competitive tendering under part I of the Local Government Act 1988. This is not a matter with which the European Commission is directly concerned.

Aggregates

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask The Secretary of State for the Environment what is the amount of land-won sand and gravel and land-won crushed rock that will come from (a) permitted reserves and (b) new consents in each of the regions in England and Wales up to 2011.

Mr. Baldry: My right hon. and learned Friend is currently consulting on draft revised mineral planning guidelines for the provision of aggregates in England and Wales. These guidelines will indicate the overall contribution to be made from land won supplies of primary aggregates over the period to 2011. The relative contributions made from permitted reserves and new consents will be a matter for the mineral planning authorities to determine.

Standard Spending Assessments

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the standard spending assessments of each local education authority as a sum per head of population together with the proportion of the local population which represents the number of children in full-time education to the age of 16 years.

Mr. Robin Squire: The figures for (i) education standard spending assessment in pounds per head and (ii) the number of children in full-time education between the ages of five and 15 expressed as a proportion of total population are given in the table. SSAs do not include pupils below the age of five and pupils aged 16 are not separately identifiable as they are included in the 16-plus education SSA element.

Wild-caught Birds

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what guidance is issued to the general public on the keeping of wild-caught birds as pets.

Mr. Maclean: Government Departments do not provide such guidance, but I understand that avicultural organisations produce a wide range of advisory material.

Showmen (Winter Quarters)

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the planning principles applicable to the use of land for showmen's winter quarters.

Mr. Baldry: Planning guidance relating to travelling showpeople is given in Department of the Environment circular 22/91—Welsh Office 78/91.

Carbon Dioxide Emissions

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will itemise how he expects to achieve the reduction of 4 million tonnes of carbon dioxide emissions by 2000, in addition to the 3 million tonnes reduction from changes to value added tax and petrol duty, assumed in the Chancellor's Budget statement.

Mr. Maclean [holding answer 19 March 1993]: We expect the Energy Saving Trust to make a significant contribution to our CO_2 programme. The trust is examining options to achieve savings of the order of 2 to 3·5 million tonnes carbon—MtC. We are consulting on proposals for strengthening the energy conservation requirements of the building regulations, which would save a further 0·25 MtC. In addition the new energy management assistance scheme could stimulate savings from small businesses, of the order of 0·25 to 0·5 MtC. And we are committed to pressing for further action under the European Community SAVE programme which could stimulate significant further savings, particularly in appliance efficiency.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Water Services

Mr. William O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what public subsidy is given to commerce and industry in Northern Ireland in respect of water services charged by the Water Services Executive; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Atkins: There are no subsidies for water and sewerage services to commerce or industry in respect of water services provided by the Northern Ireland Water Executive.

Sewage Sludge

Mr. William O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what amount of sewage sludge has been deposited into sea for each year since 1991-92; what alternatives to sewage sludge deposited into the sea have been considered; what consultations have taken place in respect of such alternatives; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Atkins: Approximately 13,000 tonnes of dry solids of sewage sludge has been disposed of at sea by the Department of the Environment in the calendar years 1991 and 1992.

The Department is currently examining all the options available for the treatment and disposal of sewage sludge. Among these options are anaerobic digestion and various forms of dewatering for disposal to agricultural land. Incineration in its various types is also being examined and assessed.

The investigation will conform to the best practicable environmental option approach which requires full consultation with all appropriate parties.

Water Meters

Mr. William O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many domestic water customers in each of the last five years have been charged by meter; and how many such customers in each year have had their supply disconnected for non-payment of water bills.

Mr. Atkins: The water supplied to a property which is used solely for domestic purposes is not metered and is not subject to disconnection for non-payment of an account.

The water supply to a property which has mixed domestic and other use may be metered and would be subject to disconnection where an account remains unpaid. In 1992, 69 such supplies were disconnected. Information for this category for years prior to 1992 is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Septic Tanks

Mr. William O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the current charging policy in Northern Ireland for the emptying of septic tanks; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Atkins: Where public sewerage facilities are not available septic tanks are emptied free of charge up to twice yearly. In other circumstances a volumetric charge is made.

Water Services

Mr. William O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how much money has been (a) allocated and (b) spent on capital works programmes for water services in Northern Ireland since 1991-92 in connection with compliance with EC requirements; and what slippage has taken place in programmes to achieve EC directives since 1991-92 on drinking water, bathing water, and disposal of sludge to agricultural land.

Mr. Atkins: There has been no significant slippage on schemes carried out by the Department of the Environment to comply with EC directives on drinking water, bathing water and disposal of sludge to agricultural land.

The amounts allocated and spent on these schemes in 1991-92 and 1992-93 are as follows:

	1991-92 £ million	1992-93 £ million
Allocated	11·3	23·2
Spent	10·1	22·0

Public Expenditure

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what has been the annual level of identifiable public expenditure per head in Northern Ireland as a percentage of United Kingdom identifiable public expenditure between the fiscal years 1972-73 and 1992-93.

Mr. Mates: The information is readily available only since 1981-82 and is as follows:

Northern Ireland public expenditure per head as a percentage of United Kingdom

Note: 1988-89 and 1989-90 figures for Northern Ireland include £247 and £193 per head respectively for costs associated with the privatisation of Shorts Brothers plc.

UK Subvention

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what has been the annual level of the subvention of Northern Ireland by the United Kingdom Government in actual prices and in 1992 prices between the fiscal years 1964-65 and 1992-93, including and excluding expenditure on security.

Mr. Mates: Figures for the subvention to Northern Ireland from the United Kingdom are available only from 1966-67. Although the additional cost of the Army's task in Northern Ireland is not part of the subvention, figures under this heading are included for completeness. Figures for the years 1966-67 to 1992-93 are as follows:

Milk Quota

Dr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what arrangements are currently in place for the administration of the milk quota in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Hanley: The Department of Agriculture for Northern Ireland is responsible for the administration of milk quotas in Northern Ireland. Certain functions are currently performed on its behalf by the Milk Marketing Board for Northern Ireland on an agency basis. The Intervention Board executive agency also performs certain milk quota functions on a United Kingdom basis.

Health Service

Ms Rachel Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what analysis has been undertaken by the Eastern health board of the state of health of the population in its area; and what steps they have taken to produce a strategic health care plan.

Mr. Hanley [holding answer 18 March 1993]: The director of public health in the Eastern health and social services board is required to produce an annual report on the health of the residents in the board's area, which represents an accurate analysis of the state of health of the population in the board's area. In addition, the board published its area strategy 1992-97 in 1992. This concentrates on the main issues affecting the health and social care status of its population and how improvements can be brought about.

Departmental Functions

Mr. Brandreth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the work of the Department of Agriculture (Northern Ireland) since 1979.

Mr. Hanley [holding answer 18 March 1993]: Since 1979 grants totalling £492 million have been paid to support capital investments on farms. Cattle and sheep farmers have been paid £502 million under livestock subsidy schemes.

To facilitate animal disease control, the Department has introduced computerised animal health records to enable the movement of animals to be monitored for disease control purposes. The Department has continued to ensure that the animal health status of Northern Ireland remains among the highest in Europe. Since 1979 bovine brucellosis has been virtually eradicated and an enhanced eradication programme has been introduced last year with a view to achieving final eradication. Northern Ireland has been accepted last year by the European Community as an enzootic bovine leucosis-free region of the European Community. Cases of bovine spongiform encephalopathy unfortunately appeared in the Province since late 1988. Measures have been introduced to bring these under control, to remove the slightest possible public health risk and to ensure that the maximum number of markets remain open for Northern Irish beef. Almost all meat plants and cold stores in the Province have been brought to and maintained at full EC approved status, approximately 500,000 cattle, ¾ million sheep, 1·1 million pigs and 46 million poultry are inspected each year by the Department's veterinary meat inspection service guaranteeing the consumer a safe and wholesome product. Over 17,000 veterinary certificates are provided each year to allow meat and meat products to be exported from the Province. During the period the Department has enhanced its residue testing programme, to allay public health concerns and to satisfy EC requirements

Since 1979 significant scientific advances have been made and an extensive research and development programme continues. Research leading to more efficient utilisation of inputs, reduced levels of disease in plants and animals, improved crop varieties, and innovations in food processing is improving the competitiveness of the local agri-food sector.

In managing the interface between agriculture and the environment a comprehensive knowledge of the impact of on-farm practices is coupled with the development of environmental awareness in farmers and the advent of environmentally safe activities.

Research in aquatic sciences has provided a sound basis for the conservation, sustainable exploitation and development of freshwater and marine aquatic resources.

Analytical and disease diagnostic programmes in plants and animals has provided an underpinning support to the continued high plant and animal health status in Northern Ireland.

The Department's staff have carried out over one third of a million personal consultations within the agri-food industry aimed at improving the efficiency of production and marketing and co-operation between individual businesses within the industry as a whole. Quality assurance schemes have been initiated within the agri-food industry to promote and sell quality assured products. The Department has also encouraged farmers and growers to adopt good health and safety practices by a fivefold increase in farm inspections resulting in a 33 per cent. decline in the number of fatal farm accidents.

Since 1979 the Department has catered for a threefold increase in the number of students on full-time courses at agricultural colleges and in excess of a sevenfold increase in the number of participants on short courses. Throughout this period net expenditure on education and training has increased by only 1·9 per cent. in real terms.

Landings of fish in Northern Ireland ports have increased from the 12,000 tonnes in 1979 to 22,900 tonnes in 1992. Development works grant axed by some £9·4 million have been carried out in the three main fishery harbours in the Province.

During the period 8,000 hectares of new planting has been carried out by the forest service and 3,500 hectares by the private sector. The conservation value of State forests have also been considerably increased. In the same period timber sales have increased in volume from 54,000 cubic metres to 200,000 cubic metres with an increase in sale value from £580,000 to £3·5 million.

A total of £87 million has been spent by the Department on capital projects to improve drainage infra-structure and to assist development. Currently some £17·5 million per annum is spent on new schemes and maintenance works to alleviate flooding and minimise risk to life and damaged property in rural and urban environmental protection and rehabilitation measures into the design and execution of drainage works. River corridor surveys form the basis of a fully integrated approach to achieving both nature conservation and land drainage objectives. Since 1990 1·32 km of river corridors have been surveyed.

Since 1988 the environmentally sensitive areas schemes has attracted a total of over 1,000 farmers to enter 19,400 hectares of land in five-year agreements with the Department to use environmentally friendly farming practices. Since 1979 the Department has undertaken some 170 projects to improve the recreational value of waterways for the general public.

In 1989 the Department was given lead responsibility for rural development and structures are now in place to promote integrated rural development. An independent Rural Development Council was established to act as an advice and resource centre for rural community groups and funding is available from Government, the European Community and the International Fund for Ireland. The first two projects to receive capital funding under the programme were officially launched in 1992.

Health Service

Ms Rachel Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what assessment he has made of the effect on accident and emergency services across the city of Belfast of the Eastern health board's acute services proposals.

Mr. Hanley: The Eastern health and social services board is currently consulting the public about its proposal for acute hospital services and has not yet therefore reached decisions. However, I know that the board regards as a high priority the need to ensure that high-quality accident and emergency services will continue to be available and will take this into account in reaching its conclusions.

Departmental Functions

Mr. Sykes: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the work of the Department of Education (Northern Ireland) since 1979.

Mr. Hanley: This has been a period of major progress in education. The Government's investment in the education service is at its highest-ever level with spending on education at £1·2 billion on 1992-93, an increase of 8·2 per cent. over final outturn for 1991-92 excluding the youth training programme. From 1979 to 1992 expenditure has increased by 31 per cent. in real terms and pupil-teacher ratios have improved from 19.1 to 18.3.

Educational standards have shown significant improvement: the proportion of school leavers with at least one A-level has increased from 21·1 per cent. in 1979-80 to 31·7 per cent. in 1990-91, while the proportion leaving with no GCSE/O-level passes has fallen from 27 per cent. to 13·0 per cent. over the same period. We are implementing a programme of education reform begun in 1989; this will further improve the quality of education, increase parental choice, and ensure that Northern Ireland continues to enjoy its deserved reputation for high educational standards.

Education reform legislation has encouraged the development of integrated schools, and introduced the themes of education for mutual understanding and cultural heritage to the curriculum. In addition, the cross-community contact scheme has facilitated projects, involving just over one third of schools and 300 youth clubs, in which young people from the two sides of the community learn to work together.

The number of students entering further education has increased by a third to just over 80,000. A major review of further education has recently been concluded. This will lead to a restructuring of provision to ensure that it fully meets the demands of the future.

Major structural changes have taken place in tertiary level education in Northern Ireland since 1979, including the merger of the Ulster polytechnic with the New University of Ulster to create the University of Ulster in 1984-85. Since the merger, the number of students attending the two Northern Ireland universities has increased by almost 40 per cent. in 1984-85 to 26,579 in 1991-92. Northern Ireland currently has the highest participation rate in higher education in the United Kingdom—30 per cent. in 1991-92 compared with 23 per cent. in Great Britain

There has been a significant increase in the number of arts events in Northern Ireland and in the numbers attending them. Facilities for the arts have also been greatly improved. These range from major refurbishments such as that of the grand opera house to the provision of local arts centres. The Ulster orchestra has become one of the most important regional orchestras in the United Kingdom and is now firmly established on the international scene, having toured in Europe, Korea and the United States.

Every district council area now has, or is in the process of building, a major indoor sports facility and all but one has its own indoor swimming pool. Leisure provision in Belfast has been particularly extensive and the level of indoor sports participation in the city is the highest in the United Kingdom.

A fundamental review of the way the education service is administered has just been introduced.

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many appointments to the public bodies listed in "Public Bodies" for his Department were made from names supplied by the Public Appointments Unit; and if he will list them.

Mr. Mates [holding answer 19 March 1993]: None.

Departmental Spending

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what percentage shares of total departmental spending was accounted for by non-departmental public bodies in each year since 1979.

Mr. Mates: The information requested is as follows:

Year	Percentage
1979-80	28·80
1980-81	32·02
1981-82	27·97
1982-83	28·25
1983-84	28·56
1984-85	28·46

Water Privatisation

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what consultation has been undertaken in relation to the proposed plans for the privatisation of the water service in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Atkins [holding answer 17 March 1993]: There has been no formal consultation to date. However I have had representations from a number of district councils and the Northern Ireland Consumer Council. Privatisation will require legislation and the proposal for a draft Order in Council will be published for consultation in the normal way.

Labour Statistics

Dr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many people were employed at the latest available date in (a) the potato industry, (b) the milk industry and (c) wool industry in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Hanley: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to the hon. Member for Londonderry, East (Mr. Ross) on 1 March 1993, concerning employment in the dairy industry in Northern Ireland (Official Report, column 24).

Comparable information is not available for potatoes or wool.

Education Colleges (Capital Expenditure)

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what assessment he has made of the effect of the imposition of value-added tax on all capital expenditure projects initiated by colleges of higher and further education after 1 April; what consultations he has had with the appropriate funding councils on this; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley [holding answer 19 March 1993]: In Northern Ireland there will be no change in the current status of colleges of further and higher education on 1 April 1993. The question is not therefore relevant in the Northern Ireland context.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Potatoes

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what information he has on the price of potatoes for processing in each Community country; and what studies have been made of the impact of the differences on (a) employment in the United Kingdom and (b) the trade gap.

Mr. Curry: Information on the price of potatoes for processing in all the other 11 member states is not available. However in the Netherlands potatoes are currently £27-£32 per tonne compared to £25-£50 per tonne, depending on variety, in Great Britain. Our analysis indicates that, in the context of the system of supported prices under our potato marketing scheme, processed potato imports have grown from 250,000 tonnes to 556,000 tonnes (raw equivalent) over the last 10 years. Although these imports were mainly at the cheaper end of the market, we estimate that they represent a loss to the Great Britain economy of some £125 million. This clearly also represents a loss of production and thus employment in favour of the continent.

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the trend in consumption of (a) potatoes and (b) processed potatoes over the last decade.

Mr. Curry: The latest available information is as follows:

Household consumption of fresh potatoes and potato products

lb/person/year raw potato equivalent	1982	1983	1984	1985	1986	1987	1988	1989	1990	1991

Mr. Gale: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received from potato growers about the proposed EC potato regime.

Mr. Curry: In addition to meetings with the Potato Marketing Board and the National Farmers Union, I have received and continue to receive numerous representations from growers, most of whom support the retention of our national arrangements in the context of the proposed regime.

Dame Peggy Fenner: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list those other EC member states which have existing price and quota arrangements for the production of potatoes.

Mr. Curry: Ad hoc intervention arrangements exist in France, Italy, Portugal and Spain, and the Netherlands operates intervention for seed potatoes only. No member state, other than the United Kingdom, has quota arrangements.

Dame Peggy Fenner: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what support he has received from within the potato industry for the abolition of the potato marketing scheme.

Mr. Curry: We have received representations from the Potato Processors Association, the British Retail Consortium, the Potato Growers Action Group and a number of individual growers in favour of abolition.

Dame Peggy Fenner: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he expects to make an announcement on the proposed regime for potatos.

Mr. Curry: In Standing Committee on 3 March I made it clear that the Government, in negotiation of the Community regime, will not be pressing for the retention of the quota and market support elements of the potato marketing scheme.

The draft regime will come back to the Council of Ministers for decision as soon as the European Parliament has given its opinion. That opinion is not expected before April.

Wild-caught Birds

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the overall mortality rate, dead on arrival or dying in quarantine, of wild-caught birds imported into the United Kingdom in (a) 1990 and (b) 1991.

Mr. Soames: The percentages given below relate to imports into Great Britain and are drawn from the Ministry's studies, "Importation of Birds—Mortality Statistics from Quarantine Returns", copies of which were placed in the Library of the House. The statistics do not distinguish wild-caught from captive bred birds.

Overall mortality rate

	Per cent.
1990	12·32
1991	14·81

Slaughterhouses

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment has been made of whether all slaughterhouses in England and Wales have now fitted to their electrical stunning equipment a device to prevent the delivery of a current below that which the equipment has been set to deliver.

Mr. Soames: Local authorities enforce welfare legislation in slaughterhouses. Guidance was issued by MAFF to local authorities and slaughterhouse operators during 1992. State veterinary service monitoring has revealed the need for further guidance, which is currently being prepared.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has to bring forward the regulations under section 1 of the Welfare of Animals at Slaughter Act 1991 requiring occupiers of slaughterhouses to ensure compliance with welfare at slaughter regulations.

Mr. Soames: I plan to consult interested parties shortly.

Poultry

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps he is taking to ensure that imported poultry is produced meeting the same standards as United Kingdom poultry and meets the same requirements for health marking.

Mr. Soames: Imported poultry meat is required to comply with the Imported Food Regulations 1984, which includes a requirement for health markings.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what effect he estimates the latest EC directives on poultry hygiene will have on the number of poultry meat inspectors currently employed.

Mr. Soames: My previous answer on this subject (Official Report, 8 March 1993, column 465) described the Government's plans for implementing EC Council Directive 92/116/EEC on poultry meat hygiene. Our officials have established a working group of representative interests to advise on the controls to be applied to the new system of inspection involving the use of plant staff to carry out on-line poultry meat inspection. Our detailed proposals for implementing the new directive will be issued for public consultation in due course.

No reliable estimate can be made, in advance of the work described above, of the extent to which the responsibilities of poultry meat inspectors employed by local authorities will be taken over by trained plant staff acting under the supervision of the official inspection team. However, it is likely that poultry meat inspectors will increasingly assume a supervisory role in those plants permitted to use plant staff for on-line inspection, with a consequent reduction in their numbers, in those plants.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what records are kept of the number of diseased birds that are identified at individual slaughterhouses.

Mr. Soames: The Department introduced last year a statistical survey of the numbers of poultry condemned on the grounds of disease or other reasons, in the majority of licensed poultry slaughterhouses in Great Britain. This survey has improved the collection of information about condemnations by individual local authorities, which was not previously compiled on a systematic basis.

Our officials will shortly be sending to participating local authorities and other interested organisations the preliminary results of this survey.

North Sea (Pollution)

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans there are to hold an independent inquiry into the levels of radioactive pollution in the North sea; if he will make it his policy to deny British Nuclear Fuels plc any licence to dump radioactive waste in the North sea until an inquiry has been completed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Curry: The Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food undertakes a regular programme of monitoring of radioactivity in United Kingdom waters. Results are published in aquatic environment monitoring reports, "Radioactivity in Surface and Coastal Waters of the British Isles", copies of which are available in the Library of the House. These results show that radioactivity levels in the North sea are well below those which would pose a threat to man or to the marine environment and I do not plan any further inquiry. We do not license dumping of radioactive waste in the North sea.

Comfrey

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list those organisations which he consulted prior to his decision on the availability of comfrey and its derivatives.

Mr. Soames: My decision on the availability of comfrey tablets and capsules followed recommendations from the committee on toxicity of chemicals in food, consumer products and the environment and the food advisory committee. In arriving at my decision I took account of views expressed on herbal preparations generally by the organisations listed.

Milk Quota

Dr. Strang: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what arrangements are currently in place for the administration of the milk quota in England.

Mr. Gummer: My Department and the Intervention Board Executive Agency are responsible for administering milk quotas in England. Certain functions are currently performed on our behalf by the Milk Marketing Board for England and Wales.

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many prosecutions have taken place, in each of the last three years, for non-compliance with health and safety regulations; and how much money has been raised from the consequent fines.

Mr. McLoughlin: The available information is provided in the following tables:

Noise at Work

Mr. Terry Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many prosecutions were taken against employers in 1990-91 and 1991-92 relating to the control of noise at work for each of the geographical areas of (a) the factory inspectorate, (b) the agricultural inspectorate and (c) the quarries inspectorate; and what were the penalties in each case.

Mr. McLoughlin: The information requested about prosecutions under the Noise at Work Regulations is provided in the following tables.

Farm Fatalities

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many farm fatalities there have been in each of the last five years; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. McLoughlin: The fatal accidents in agriculture and horticulture reported to the enforcement authorities under the Reporting of Injuries, Diseases and Dangerous Occurrences Regulations 1985 are set out in the following table.

Fatal accidents in the agriculture and horticulture industry[1] reported to enforcement authorities 1987-88 to 1991-92[2]

[3]Year	Total
1987-88	58
1988-89	55

[1] As defined by Standard Industrial Classification 1980 Class 01.
[2] Provisional.
[3] Year commencing 1 April.

Agricultural Safety

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what plans she has to introduce new agricultural safety measures; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. McLoughlin: At present we have no plans to introduce new agricultural safety regulations.

Agriculture is subject to the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974 and regulations made under it, the most recent of which are the six sets of health and safety regulations which came into force, in order to implement EC directives, at the beginning of January this year. These latest regulations cover a wide range of safety issues from the condition of the work place to the use of machinery and employers and others need time to assimilate and act on them.

Sheltered Workshops

Mr. Brandreth: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if she will make a statement on provision for sheltered workshops and the sheltered placement scheme during 1993-94.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: We shall be considering the future of sheltered employment provision in the light of the review of funding arrangements which is currently taking place. It is our aim that any changes we propose will improve the effectiveness of the scheme and help more people with severe disabilities.

We are committed to providing sheltered employment for people with severe disabilities and are currently providing funds to enable around 5,000 people to be employed in sheltered workshops and around 7,000 in sheltered placements.

To ensure that we make best use of available resources we have decided that the planned number of places to be provided nationally will remain the same next year as in 1992-93. However, previous experience of turnover patterns suggests that around 1,000 existing places are likely to become vacant which will enable new entrants to join the programme.

In 1993-94 we are providing an increase of £2·37 million current expenditure for sheltered workshops and the sheltered placement scheme. These additional funds will be used to help meet the costs of voluntary bodies and local authorities through an increase in the grant ceilings by a further £170 and £210 respectively. This will bring them to £4,310 for voluntary bodies and £3,480 for local authorities. This represents an increase of 4·1 per cent. and 6·4 per cent. respectively.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Pensions

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will commission an independent academic research project to make an objective comparison of the differences in state pension provision within the member states of the European Community; and if he will make a statement.

Miss Widdecombe: The Department has already commissioned independent academic research from the social policy research unit (SPRU), University of York, into the relative incomes and living standards of the elderly in an international comparative perspective. The study will examine data on the relative incomes of the elderly in a wide range of countries, including some EC member states.

Homelessness

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many homeless households placed in temporary accommodation by local authorities under the Housing Act 1985 part III were in receipt of income support in each of the years for which figures are available.

Mr. Burt: The available information is in the table.

Number of households placed in temporary accommodation claiming Income Support

Year	Number
1990	11,000
1991	10,100
1992	8,800

Notes:
1. Source: Local authority returns for February, May, August and November 1990; February, May, August and November 1991; February, May and August 1992. No estimate is included for authorities who fail to make a return regarding numbers of boarders.
2. Figures derived from quarterly returns, averaged over a calendar year, rounded to nearest 100.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many children, classified as dependants for the purposes of claiming income support, are currently living in temporary accommodation provided by local authorities under the Housing Act 1985 part III.

Mr. Burt: This information is not held centrally.

Local authority returns contain some information about people in temporary accommodation placed under the Housing Act 1985 part III but not specifically for children.

Energy Costs

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what categories of those receiving benefits from his Department will be assisted to meet the extra costs following the imposition of value added tax on fuel and energy; how the assistance will be calculated; whether there will be specific fuel additions made to benefits; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Burt: Pensions and other benefits will increase automatically to reflect the impact of any increase in fuel bills on the indices used to uprate benefits.

Moreover, extra help will be given from April 1994 to poorer pensioners and other people on low incomes to assist with higher fuel bills as soon as they arise.

Details of the precise way in which we will provide this extra help will be announced in the normal way in the autumn.

Housing Benefits

Mr. Betts: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will calculate the cost of extra payments in housing and poll tax benefits if the income assumed to be realised on capital owned by benefit claimants had been reduced in line with the fall in base rates since 17 September 1992; and how much of this cost would have fallen on the national Exchequer.

Mr. Burt [holding answer 11 March 1993]: The formula applying to capital, introduced on the reform of the income-related benefits in April 1988, makes no assumptions about the level of any return on capital invested.

Base rates have both risen and fallen since that time and the formula has remained the same. Had the formula assumed a return and had it proportionately reflected only those changes in the base rate since 17 September 1992, the estimated cost to the Exchequer to the end of 1992-93 financial year would be £50 million; £30 million in housing benefit and £20 million in community charge benefit.

Source—Modelled at 1992-93 prices and benefit levels using data from the 1987-88-89 Family Expenditure Surveys.

Note: Figures have been rounded to the nearest £10 million.

WALES

Employment Protection

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has received from the Cleaning and Support Services Association in relation to the Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations 1981 and compulsory competitive tendering by local authorities and health authorities.

Mr. David Hunt: Two letters have been received from the association raising concerns about the possible effect of the regulations on public sector market testing exercises.

Grant-maintained Schools

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the effect of (a) opting out and (b) local management of schools on the ability of individual schools to reclaim value added tax.

Sir Wyn Roberts: Grant-maintained schools are expected to meet the cost of VAT on supplies and services. Special purpose grant for value added tax is payable by the Welsh Office to help compensate them for the additional costs of VAT which cannot be met from within their annual maintenance grant.

When the governing body of a LEA-maintained school enters into a contract to spend part of its delegated budget, it does so on behalf of its local authority. The LEA's ability to claim refunds of VAT on purchases in respect of their non-business activities is not therefore, affected by our local management of schools arrangements.

Young People (Training)

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he proposes to publish statistics on the numbers of persons aged 16 and 17 years in each TEC area without a job, or training scheme or full-time education courses.

Mr. David Hunt: I will write to the hon. Gentleman and place a copy of my letter in the Library of the House.

Artificial Limbs

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what steps are taken to ensure that the standard of prostheses supplies from outside the United Kingdom are suitable for use in the national health service; what assessment he has made of the average time span before the requirement for revision for (a) imported protheses and (b) those manufactured in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: The responsibility for the issue of prostheses, both upper and lower limbs, lies with the artificial limb and appliance service. In Wales, the day-to-day management of the service is discharged by the Welsh Health Common Services Authority. However, before any applicance or prosthesis is dispensed in this country the medical devices directorate issues a certificate of acceptance.

Research Expenditure

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what are the annual figures for spending by his Department on commissioning research from the higher education sector for each year from 1989-90 to 1993-94.

Sir Wyn Roberts: Welsh Office expenditure on research commissioned from the higher education sector is as follows:

	Million
1989-90	0·4
1990-91	0·5
1991-92	0·4

This information is published in the annual review of Government funded research and development, which is available in the Library of the House. The outturn figure for 1992-93 is not yet available and it is not possible to produce a reliable estimate of expenditure in 1993-94.

Assisted Areas

Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he expects to be able to make an announcement of the review of assisted area status in Wales.

Mr. David Hunt: The representations received about the review of assisted areas are currently being considered. The Government will make an announcement on the outcome of the review as soon as possible.

Departmental Contracts

Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list those expenditures in the last financial year in his Department which were put out to contract.

Mr. David Hunt: This information is not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Welsh Development Agency

Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how much has been raised from the sale of property by the Welsh Development Agency in each year since 1990-91; and how much is expected to be raised from the sale of property in each year to 1996-97.

Mr. David Hunt: Receipts from the sale of land and buildings since 1990-91 are as follows:

	£ million
1990-91	[1]25·0
1991-92	[1]25·3
1992-93	[2]50·5
1993-94	[3]80·0

[1] Outturn.
[2] Forecast outturn.
[3] Planned.

Details of the agency's gross and net budgets for the years 1994-95 to 1996-97 will be decided during the course of future public expenditure surveys.

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how he ensures that the requirement of the Welsh Development Agency Act 1975, insofar as it relates to the members of the agency having experience of matters relating to the environment, is met.

Mr. David Hunt: The Act requires that members of the agency have wide experience in one or more of a number of fields, including the environment. In making appointments to the agency's board, I have regard to these requirements.

Departmental Publications

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will ensure that all future Welsh Office publications will be printed in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: It is not possible to stipulate that all Welsh Office publications must be printed in Wales.

Tourism

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will propose incentives to boost the tourist industry in south and west Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Wyn Roberts: There are already many financial and marketing support incentives available to encourage and assist tourism development in Wales through the Welsh Office and public bodies such as the Wales Tourist Board, the Development Board for Rural Wales, the Welsh Development Agency and Cadw.

Cardiff Bay Development Corporation

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to his answer of 22 February, Official Report, column 470, if he will announce the start date for the quinquennial review of the Cardiff Bay development corporation.

Mr. David Hunt: A financial management and policy review will be undertaken during the 1993-94 financial year, starting on a date yet to be decided.

School Site, Swansea

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what proposals he has for the future use of the site at Llwynmawr, Swansea, earmarked for a school.

Mr. David Hunt: The site at Llwynmawr road, Swansea is owned by the West Glamorgan county council. In 1990 the council asserted that the land was required for future school building, but I understand that the council now regards the site as being surplus to requirements.

Bees

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is his assessment of the effect of the bees pest Varroa in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: There are at present no confirmed cases of Varroa in Wales. The importance of disease prevention, however, is fully appreciated; a search of apiaries was conducted in Wales last autumn to establish if the disease was present, and a further search will be carried out this spring. If any cases of Varroa are confirmed, appropriate control measures will be implemented.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many bees officers are currently employed in Wales; what was the number in 1985; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: There were seven bees officers employed in Wales in 1985. It is proposed to employ seven bees officers in 1993.

Milk

Dr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what arrangements are currently in place for the administration of milk quotas in Wales.

Mr. David Hunt: My Department and the Intervention Board executive agency are responsible for administering milk quotas in Wales. Certain functions are currently performed on our behalf by the Milk Marketing Board for England and Wales.

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the number of farms in Wales for which dairy produce represents more than 10 per cent. of their production, or an equivalent threshold for which information is available, on a county basis.

Mr. David Hunt: The information is not available in the form requested.

The following table shows the number of holdings in Wales for which over 10 per cent. of the total standard gross margin (SGM) of the holding is attributable to dairy cows. The SGM is a financial measure based on the output of an enterprise less its variable costs.

DEFENCE

Middle East (Export Controls)

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what recent meetings he, Ministers or officials of his Department have had with the Defense Technology Security Agency of the United States Department of Defense in regard to harmonisation of export control policy for the middle east.

Mr. Aitken: P5 and G7 sub-group meetings of officials last year considered aspects of export controls policy for the middle east. These meetings included officials from my Department and, on some occasions, from the DTSA.

European Armaments Agency

Sir John Hunt: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the role and operation of a European armaments agency.

Mr. Aitken: The proposal to create a European armaments agency is under consideration with our partners in European armaments co-operation. It is too early to say what conclusions may be reached.

Defence Companies (Redundancies)

Mr. Hutton: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his oral answer to the hon. Member for Wallasey (Ms Eagle) of 9 March, Official Report, column 769, if he will list the defence companies which have made redundancies since 1990; and what were the total numbers of redundancies in each case.

Mr. Aitken: My Department does not keep such a list in the form suggested but was aware on 9 March of some 43,000 announced job losses in defence companies since July 1990. This is at best an approximate estimate for it includes some civil sector jobs lost by these companies; it does not identify how many of the job losses are due to reductions in United Kingdom defence expenditure; it does not include job losses among some smaller defence companies which were not announced in the press or notified to my Department; it does not differentiate between redundancies, retirements or natural wastage; and it does not take account of jobs gained by some defence companies as a result of new orders.

Kuwait

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when the United Kingdom signed a memorandum of understanding on defence procurement with Kuwait; when the programme office was set up; what orders have so far been placed; and how much income his Department has received in brokerage fees from United Kingdom firms.

Mr. Aitken: The United Kingdom signed a memorandum of understanding on defence equipment and related services with Kuwait on 2 December 1992. The Kuwait programme office was set up on 4 January 1993. There have been no contracts placed so far and my Department will not receive brokerage fees from United Kingdom firms. Where, however, my Department undertakes a major management rôle on behalf of a customer—in this case the Kuwait Government—a fee is charged to cover departmental expenses commensurate with the work involved.

Iraq (Industrial Establishments)

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what information he has on the current activities of (a) the Al-Kindi research complex, (b) the Salah Al-Din state establishment, and (c) the Nassr state establishment in Iraq.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: All three facilities, which are monitored under UN Security Council resolutions, serve Iraq's military industry. The Al-Kindi research complex is a missile and artillery research and development facility, the Salah Al-Din state establishment manufactures electronic items and the Nassr state establishment is a major steel producer.

Reserve forces

Sir John Hunt: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make it his policy to encourage employers to allow reservists to take necessary leave of absence to follow their duties.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: It is my Department's policy to encourage employers to support membership of the volunteer reserve forces by their employees including the taking of the necessary leave. The National Employers Liaison Committee runs a very successful national campaign aimed primarily at employers, which is supported by regional and local initiatives by the Territorial Auxiliary and Volunteer Reserve Associations. Over 3,000 employing organisations have received certificates acknowledging the support they have pledged.

Stand-off Missile

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he intends to issue the cardinal points specification for the conventionally armed stand-off missile; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Aitken: We expect to issue the cardinal points specification (CPS) for the conventionally armed stand-off weapon later this year.

The CPS is being prepared in the light of responses to the Department's request for information, which was issued to industry in August 1991. It is our intention that the selected option should be one that minimises the additional development needed to meet the requirements of the RAF.

Chieftain Tanks

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many Chieftain tanks are to be sold by his Department to Pakistan; and what modifications will be made to them before they are sold.

Mr. Aitken: Discussions with the Pakistani Government on the possible sale of a number of upgraded Chieftain tanks are at an early stage.

Self-propelled Gun

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects delivery of the 155 mm AS90 self-propelled gun to commence; and when it will be completed.

Mr. Aitken: The first delivery took place on 4 February 1993. Deliveries are expected to be completed in mid-1995.

"Options for Change"

Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to the answer of 16 February, Official Report, column 122, on which subhead of the defence estimates the special capital compensation payments made in respect of "Options for Change" are included.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: For financial year 1992-93 provision for the special capital compensation payments to armed forces personnel is made in class I, vote 3, subheads A1, A2 and A3. For financial years 1993-94 and 1994-95, following the reorganisation of class I votes, provision for such payments will be made in class I, vote 1, subheads G2, I2 and J2.

Written Answers to Questions

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

C-LIX Court Listing

Mr. Oppenheim: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department when the current trial period of the C-LIX court listing information service will come to an end.

Mr. John M. Taylor: The C-LIX court listing field trial has been planned to take place in a number of phases. The first of these, linking the Central Criminal Court to five sets of barristers' chambers, is currently under way. This will be extended in April to include other London Crown court centres and additional sets of chambers. A further phase is planned in which the range of end-users will be increased to include solicitors' firms and interested members of other criminal justice agencies—for example, police and the Prison Service.

The formal end date of the field trial has not yet been fixed, but a full evaluation is expected before the end of this year.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Electoral Registration

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what opinion research his Department has commissioned into the advertising for last year's electoral registration campaign; and when the results of this research will be made available.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Pre- and post-campaign research, taking a sample of 1,800 respondents, was commissioned following the autumn 1992 electoral registration poster campaign.

A copy of the advertising monitor summary of results for the electoral registration campaign—autumn 1992 has been sent to the House of Commons Library.

Elderly People (Threats)

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what review has been undertaken into developments in the level of the threat of grievous bodily harm, rape, robbery or murder facing elderly people; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jack: Statistics of crime recorded by the police can provide national trends in crime risks by age only for murder. The rate of murder against those aged 70 or more has declined since 1980 in England and Wales, and that for those between 50 and 69 years is relatively stable; the numbers involved are small.

The British crime survey can provide information on trends in violence against the elderly between 1981 and 1991. The proportion of those aged 60 or over who were victims of robbery, wounding, common assault or any sexual offence showed no change over the period: about one in 200 of those aged 60 or more were a target in 1991. Trends in all these statistics are continually monitored.

ESDA Evidence

Mr. Miller: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what ESDA evidence has been adduced in (a) the case of Paul Malone and (b) the case of the Birmingham Six.

Mr. Jack: A report on ESDA tests on certain documents was submitted to my right hon. and learned Friend by Mr. Malone's solicitor in support of representations about the safety of his conviction. I understand that further ESDA tests have been carried out at the request of the chief constable of Cheshire. The results of both sets of tests are currently being considered by officers of the Metropolitan police who are reinvestigating the case.

A description of the evidence of ESDA tests adduced in the final appeal of the Birmingham Six is to be found on pages 42-52 of the judgment of the Court of Appeal on 27 March 1991—R v. McIlkenny and others—a copy of which is in the Library.

Mr. Miller: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many anomalies have been identified by ESDA evidence affecting the case of Paul Malone.

Mr. Jack: I understand that the results of ESDA tests on certain documents relating to Mr. Malone's conviction are among matters being examined by officers of the Metropolitan police as part of their further inquiries into this case. The significance of these results cannot properly be assessed until the investigation as a whole has been completed. When I have received the investigating officers' report on the case, I will, of course, give it full and careful attention.

Young Offenders

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many 10-year-olds have been charged with crimes in the youth courts in the last two years for which figures are available; and how many have been convicted.

Mr. Jack: The information readily available centrally on the number of 10-year-olds prosecuted in 1990 and 1991 is given in the table. Data on people charged are not held centrally.

Prisoners (Assault)

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proportion of prisoners in each prison establishment committed assaults (a) on other prisoners and (b) on prison officers between April 1992 and February 1993, and for each of the previous 10 years.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The available information is for the number of assaults which were punished under the prison discipline system. Some individuals may have committed and been punished for more than one assault in any period and would in that event be counted more than once. The figures for April 1992 to February 1993 are given in the table. Figures for 1989—April to December—1990 and 1991 were published in "Statistics of offences against prison discipline and punishments England and Wales 1989, 1990 and 1991"—Cm 1236, 1651 and 2066—copies of which are available in the Library of the House. I regret that the information is not available prior to 1 April 1989.

Police Force (Ethnic Minorities)

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police officers and what proportion of the total number in each police force area in England and Wales were (a) men and (b) women from ethnic minority groups in each of the last 10 years; and what proportion were in senior grades.

Mr. Charles Wardle: I will write to the hon. Member.

Race Relations Act

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what conclusions he has reached on the proposals from the Commission for Racial Equality for changes to the Race Relations Act 1976; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The Government are giving careful consideration to the Commission for Racial Equality's recommendations and will respond formally in due course.

Blakenhurst Prison

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the revised opening date for HM prison Blakenhurst.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: It is the current intention to open Blakenhurst prison on 26 May 1993 subject to satisfactory completion of the preparatory work being carried out by the contractor.

No-crime Offences

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proportion of offences were reported as no-crimes for each police force in England and Wales for each of the last 10 years, and at the latest available date.

Mr. Jack: Figures are not available centrally, but many forces publish "no crime" totals in their chief constable's annual reports.

Racial Incidents

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many instances of racial assault and racial harrassment were reported to each police force area in England and Wales in each of the last 10 years; and how many prosecutions and how many convictions resulted.

Mr. Charles Wardle: Information is not available before 1988. The figures since then are set out in the table. Figures for 1992 are not yet available. Figures on prosecutions and convictions are not held centrally, and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

All forces respond to racial attacks as a priority, and their responses are systematically monitored by Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary. The increase in reports to the police might indicate an increase in the confidence of victims in the ability and willingness of the police to help.

Fines, London

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people were fined in courts in the Metropolitan police district in each of the six months up to the latest available date; and, of that number, how many people defaulted on their fines.

Mr. Jack: The information readily available centrally on the persons fines in the Metropolitan police district in the last six months of 1991 is given in the table. Data on people defaulting on their fines are not held centrally.

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many fixed penalty notices were issued in the Metropolitan police district in each of the first six months of 1992; and how many were paid and how many were unpaid.

Wolds Prison

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will arrange for the reports of the Home Office controller at the Wolds remand centre to be placed in the Library; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: No. The controller's reports on Wolds provide management information which, like such material on other prisons, is not made public. The report of HM chief inspector of prisons, who is due to carry out an inspection in May, will be published and the board of visitors will be publishing their report for 1992 on 6 April. The Prison Service intends to publish information about the performance of all prisons, directly and privately managed, on a regular basis in its annual report. An interim report on the Wolds will be published shortly, at the end of its first year of operation.

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department which Prison Service practice or procedures are required to be followed by the contractor under the terms of the contract at HM prison Wolds.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The contractor is required to follow the practices or procedures relating to:
Inmates Personal Record System (Form No. 2050);
LIDS (the inmate database system);
the reporting of population levels;
Assisted Prison Visits Scheme;
Prison Visitors Scheme.

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners are being held at the Wolds at the latest available date; and what proportion of them are from ethnic minority groups.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: On 19 March, 310 prisoners were unlocked at Wolds remand prison. Of these, 22—7·1 per cent.—were members of ethnic minority groups.

Supply and Transport Contract

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if his Department will pay compensation to Beck and Pollitzer following the cancellation of the contract in respect of the supply and transport functions of his Department.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The contract in respect of the warehousing and distribution function was not signed and there will be no compensation paid to Beck and Pollitzer.

Prison Population

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are his most up-to-date projections for the prison population for 2000 and 2010 for (a) women, (b) remand prisoners, (c) sentenced male prisoners and (d) young people under 21 years.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Projections of long-term trends in the prison population to 2000 were published in the Home Office statistical bulletin 10/92 on 28 May 1992. Copies are available in the Library of the House. We intend to publish updated projections to 2001 soon.

Cash Limits

Sir John Wheeler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proposals he has for changes to the 1992-93 non-voted cash limit within his responsibility.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The local authority capital non-voted cash limit will be increased by £202,000 from £109,141,000 to £109,343,000. The increased provision results from the transfer of unallocated supplementary credit approvals from the Welsh Office to the Home Office, for the purpose of the replacement of fire service mobilisation and communications systems.

Charities

Sir John Wheeler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to bring into effect the remaining provisions of the Charities Act 1992.

Mr. Jack: It is our intention to bring the 1992 Act fully into force at the earliest opportunity—consistent with effective preparation and consultations. I therefore intend to bring the further provisions into effect by the following dates:
By the end of 1993: further fees regulations;
by the end of March 1994: provisions on professional fund-raising (Part II of the Act);

by the end of June 1994: accounting provisions (contained in Part I of the Act);
by the end of 1994: public charitable collections (Part III of the Act).

Where possible we will, however, seek to bring the provisions into effect earlier than the dates given.

DEFENCE

Royal Irish Regiment

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the annual cost of monitoring the religious affiliation of the (a) part-time and (b) full-time members of the Royal Irish Regiment.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The annual cost of collating statistics on the religious affiliations of the Royal Irish Regiment, which is required of all public authorities in Northern Ireland under the Fair Employment (Northern Ireland) Act 1989, is estimated to be £300.

RAF Brawdy

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what studies have been undertaken to establish the use made by RAF Chivenor and RAF Valley of the Pembrey range and Welsh low-flying area when RAF Brawdy was unable to operate due to poor weather conditions.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: None.

Fleet Maintenance Organisation

Mr. David Martin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 12 November, Official Report, columns 882-83, if he has reached a decision on the future of the fleet maintenance and repair organisation, Portsmouth.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I have given full and careful consideration to the representations made on the proposals I announced on 12 November 1992, Official Report, columns 882-83, to cease refit work at the fleet maintenance and repair organisation, Portsmouth and to reduce excess capacity among the work force. I have decided to proceed with these proposals, taking account of the overall problem of excess refit and repair capacity in the United Kingdom.

Sea Training, Portland

Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 12 November, Official Report, column 883, if he has reached a decision on the future of operational sea training at Portland.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Having given full and careful consideration to the representations made, I have decided to proceed with the transfer of operational sea training from Portland to Devonport and to close Portland naval base by April 1996. We will continue to consult the trades unions about the implications for staff, and will also work closely with the Portland area local authorities to investigate possible alternative commercial uses for the naval base.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Money Market Rates

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the range and average level of overnight money market rates on the inter-bank markets in London each month from September 1992 to January 1993.

Mr. Nelson: The range and the average level of overnight money market rates on the interbank markets each month from September 1992 to January 1993 were as follows:

Overnight interest rates[1]

	Range	Average[2]
1992
September	180 – 3½	9 11/32
October	100 – 4	9¼
November	14¼ – 2½	7 13/16
December	9¼ – 2	6 13/16
1993
January	100 – 1½	6 23/32

[1] These are quoted rates as observed by the Bank of England, and are not comprehensive. As they are quoted rates, transactions did not necessarily take place at these rates, and it is also possible that transactions took place at other rates.

[2] The average is based on daily observations taken at 10.20 am.

Forestry

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will state the cost to the Exchequer of tax reliefs for afforestation in each of the 10 years up to 1993.

Mr. Dorrell: The estimated cost of allowing tax relief for afforestation under schedule D was of the order of £10 million a year between 1983-84 and 1987-88. No estimates are available of the cost of relief allowed for 1988-89 to 1992-93 under the transitional provisions introduced when forestry was removed from the scope of taxation in 1988-89.

TRANSPORT

Channel Tunnel Rail Link

Sir Keith Speed: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he last discussed the proposed Ashford international passenger station with the chairman of British Rail; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport made a statement about Ashford international passenger station yesterday.

Residential Properties

Mr. Hendry: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many vacant residential properties are owned by his Department in each county; what are his plans for reducing this number; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: As at 31 December 1992, the latest date for which figures are available, my Department held 3,432 residential properties in connection with road schemes in England, of which 721 were vacant. Details of these properties are held by departmental region and are set out in the table. To break down the figures to county level could be done only at disproportionate cost.

Region	Total stock	Vacant stock
South East	894	181
South West	130	27
West Midlands	256	78
North West	405	91
Northern	31	7
Yorkshire and Humberside	65	20
East Midlands	43	13
Eastern	617	183
London	991	121
TOTAL	3,432	721

My Department is actively participating in the work of the task force on Government Departments' empty houses, as announced by my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment in a written answer to my hon. Friend, the Member for Reading, West (Sir A. Durant), on 8 December 1992, Official Report, column 578. Our aim is to let these properties wherever possible on short-term leases, and to sell them as soon as the road building schemes allow us to do so.

Motorways

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many representations he has received from private companies seeking to invest in and construct new motorways or to increase the capacity of existing motorways.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: Many of the companies that participated in bids for the concessions for the Dartford-Thurrock crossing, the second Severn crossing and the Birmingham northern relief road have also advocated an expansion of the role of private finance in the operation and improvement of the existing motorway network. Our planned Green Paper on motorway charging will invite views on the possibilities.

Public Transport

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list those local authorities which have provided financial support to maintain or retain public transport services.

Mr. Freeman: In metropolitan areas, powers to provide financial support for local public transport services are exercised by the passenger transport authorities, which formulate policies for the provision of such support, and by the passenger transport executives, which provide support in line with those policies. In non-metropolitan areas in England and Wales, both county and district councils have powers to provide financial support for public transport services; and in Scotland, regional and island councils exercise similar powers. In London, local authorities have not been required to support local public transport services since 1989-90, when they ceased to pay a levy towards the grant made available to London Regional Transport.

Details of the way in which these powers have been exercised by all the authorities concerned could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Options Review

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what consideration he has given to reviewing the rules governing the economic assessment of alternative transport options, including rates of return on investment; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: My Department's publication "The Role of Investment Appraisal in Road and Rail Transport"—a copy of which is in the Library—sets out the technical procedures used or required by the Department for appraising proposed investment in road and rail transport.

The procedures for evaluating transport investment proposals are kept under constant review, one of many considerations being that of consistency between modes. The same rate of return of 8 per cent. in real terms is used for appraising all public sector investment in transport.

M25

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what research he has commissioned on the air quality within vehicles on the M25.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: No research has been carried out on air quality in vehicles specifically on the M25. However research has been done recently on air quality in vehicles generally in urban areas, on motorways and on rural roads. It is described in chapter 2 of the first report of the quality of urban air review group published in January by the Department of the Environment.

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what research he has commissioned to assess the effect of the M25 on ambient air quality.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: Some monitoring of air quality near junction 11 of the M25 was carried out in 1986 to help develop a computer model which the Department uses to assess the likely impact of new major roads and motorways when they are planned. There is a considerable body of work on the way in which roads and traffic more generally affect air quality both locally and further afield. This is described in the joint evidence provided to the Royal Commission on environmental pollution by my Department and the Department of the Environment last December.

Jet Skis

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish figures on the number of recorded accidents around the United Kingdom coasts involving (a) speedboats and (b) jet skis, and the number of non-speedboat/jet ski users who have been (i) killed, (ii) seriously injured and (iii) received minor injuries in such incidents in each of the last five years.

Mr. Norris: My Department does not hold the required statistics. The best readily available information is from accident records held by the Department of Trade and Industry. The most recent of these show that in 1990 there were five accidents at sea involving jet skis and one involving a motor boat which resulted in personal injury. None of the injuries was classified as serious.

Diesel Smoke Emissions

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his answer of 16 February, Official Report, columns 150-51, how his Department's diesel smoke emission test which has been suspended differs from tests which are carried out in the other member states of the EC; and what reports of engine damage have been reported in those countries.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: None of the other EC member states has as yet introduced metered checks of diesel smoke into annual roadworthiness tests. They are required to do so by the EC roadworthiness directive by 1 January 1996.

Bulk Carriers

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what consideration his Department has given to the investigation of the safety aspects of bulk carriers; and what research is currently planned or proposed.

Mr. Norris: There is a substantial programme of research being conducted on behalf of my Department aimed at improving safety on bulk carriers. Projects are being undertaken examining wave-induced vibrations in large vessels, the behaviour of iron ore cargoes, cement and other bulk cargoes. Investigation into the hazards of spontaneous heating and combustion of coal cargoes are also under way and a tender to investigate other aspects of bulk carrier and large crude oil tanker operations will shortly be issued.

Channel Tunnel

Mr. Mills: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects the Channel Tunnel Safety Authority to publish its fourth annual report.

Mr. Freeman: I understand that the Channel Tunnel Safety Authority published its fourth annual report today. I am arranging for copies to be placed in the Library.

Stansted Airport

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he has identified a preferred route for a second runway at Stansted airport; and what role his Department will be playing at the forthcoming public inquiry into the plan by Uttlesford district council.

Mr. Norris: The runway capacity working group is undertaking a detailed examination of four airports, including Stansted airport, covering the notional runway alignments identified in the Civil Aviation Authority's report CAP570 and others. It will ultimately be for promoters rather than Government to make specific proposals. The Department does not expect to be taking any part in the forthcoming public inquiry into the Uttlesford district plan.

Maritime Rescue

Mr. Macdonald: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the agreed minimum staffing at the maritime rescue co-ordination sub-centres in Scotland; and on how many days in the past three months the staffing level at Oban, Stornoway, Belfast, Pentland, Shetland or Forth has been below three people.

Mr. Norris: The planned minimum staffing levels at the maritime rescue sub-centres in Scotland and Northern Ireland is normally three watchkeepers. Because of a small number of vacancies, absence through sickness or training requirements staffing fell below this level on the following number of six-hour periods in the past three months:—

	Number
Forth	1
Pentland	Nil
Shetland	37
Belfast	Nil
Oban	9
Stornoway	4

The maritime rescue co-ordination centres at Aberdeen and Clyde have the capability to take over co-ordination of any incident where a MRSC is unable to cope for any reason. Additionally, a member of the district management team is on call at each MRSC should he be required. Contingency plans also exist for further reinforcements of the watch in an emergency.

Plutonium

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will give details of his assessment of the environmental hazards involved in the transport of radioactive material by sea, assuming the worst case scenario of a ship carrying plutonium.

Mr. Norris [holding answer 9 March 1993]: Her Majesty's nuclear installations inspectorate published a safety assessment on the transport of plutonium in the form of nitrate solution between Dounreay and Sellafield in 1979. A further study into the radiological consequences of the loss at sea of the contents of a plutonium package was carried out by the safety and reliability directorate of the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority in 1984. Copies of both reports are available in the Library.

Motorways

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to speed up the introduction of advanced traffic management systems on the M25.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: I have announced today an experimental scheme on a section of the M25 which will introduce advanced traffic management systems with the aims of cutting stress for drivers, speeding up journey times and reducing accidents.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what studies he has made of motorway traffic control measures in Germany and the Netherlands; and what conclusions he has drawn from them.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: We have studied with interest the measures introduced in Germany in 1989 on the A5 autobahn approaching Frankfurt and in the Netherlands in 1992 between Utrecht and Amsterdam. These have informed our proposals for an experimental scheme on the M25 which I have announced today.

Mr. William O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport for what distance the M26 runs parallel to another motorway where it joins (a) the M20 and (b) the M25.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: The information is as follows:

(a) The M26 and M20 run broadly parallel over a distance of about 2·8 miles to merge east of Wrotham in Kent.

(b) No part of the M26 runs parallel with another motorway where it joins the M25.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 23 March.

Sir Peter Tapsell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 23 March.

The Prime Minister: This morning, I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Sudan

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what Her Majesty's Government are doing to raise human rights violations against religious and racial minorities in Sudan at the United Nations Security Council and to encourage the United Nations to follow up the General Assembly resolution of December 1992 on the human rights situation in Sudan.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We were a prime mover in the adoption of the UN General Assembly last December of a resolution condemning the Sudanese Government's human rights record; and in the adoption this month of a resolution in the UN Commission on Human Rights, which provides for the appointment of a public rapporteur to investigate the human rights situation in Sudan. We will keep under review the possibility of further UN involvement.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what Her Majesty's Government are doing to engage the United Nations in the peace process in Sudan's civil war.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We welcome the undertaking given on 23 February by both the Government of Sudan and Dr. John Garang of the Sudanese People's Liberation Army's Torit faction to meet for further talks under Nigerian auspices in Abuja. We will keep under review the possibility of a United Nations role at some stage of the peace process.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what Her Majesty's Government are doing to assist the Sudanese Government to enable international aid to reach non-Muslims there.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Since the beginning of the current food crises in November 1989 Britain has provided £19 million in bilateral humantarian relief to the largely non-Muslim population in southern Sudan. A further £2 million has been provided to help the displaced elsewhere in the country, many of whom are from the south.

In a demarche on 7 March we and our EC partners urged the Government of Sudan to ensure that the conditions exist to allow humanitarian relief to reach all those in need.

Bangladesh (Burmese Refugees)

Mr. Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations have been made to the Bangladeshi Government concerning the forced repatriation of Rohingya refugees to Burma.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We have made the Government of Bangladesh well aware of our concern that all repatriations of Rohingya refugees to Burma should be voluntary.

Maastricht Treaty

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 12 January, Official Report, column 723, if he will list, with reference to the content of the draft treaty discussed by the Council of Ministers of the European Community on 30 September 1991 (a) those provisions and relevant articles, not now included in titles II, III, or IV of the treaty on European union, (b) those provisions and relevant articles included elsewhere in the treaty on European union and (c) provisions and relevant draft articles not included in the treaty on European union.

Mr. Garel-Jones: As I said in my answer of 12 January, the draft treaty discussed by the Council of Ministers on 30 September 1991 provided for a unitary structure which included both the common foreign and security policy and justice/home affairs matters within the treaty of Rome. To provide the detailed information requested would involve disproportionate cost.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Bosnia (Aid)

Mr. Ronnie Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on progress in supplying aid in areas occupied by Bosnian Muslims.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Approximately 115,000 tonnes of relief supplies have been delivered to victims of the conflict in Bosnia by the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees who is responsible for co-ordinating the international relief effort to the former Yugoslavia. More than 1·6 million people, mostly in Muslim areas, rely on this effort.

Most supplies are provided by UNHCR's road convoys, to which the British Government are one of the largest contributors. Nearly 20,000 tonnes of supplies have been delivered throughout Bosnia by our vehicles. However, it has proved difficult to maintain adequate levels of supplies to the besieged enclaves of eastern Bosnia. The United Nations have been able to supply Sarajevo by road and airlift, but in eastern Bosnia road convoys have continually been impeded by local militia.

We welcome the United States airdrop as a short-term measure to overcome these obstacles and have contributed some £250,000 in aid supplies towards this operation. But the priority remains the opening of road supply routes, since this is the only practical way of providing adequate supplies to the area.

Guatemala

Mr. Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what aid has been given to Guatemala for the repatriation of Guatemalan refugees; and what support will be offered in the future.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Following a request from the United Nations High Commission for Refugees through our embassy in Guatemala city, an RAF Hercules, in successive sorties between 28 and 31 January, flew a total of some 100 tons of emergency food and other supplies to the north of the country to provide assistance for the first group of returning refugees from Mexico. Our embassy in Guatemala City continues to monitor the situation.

Sri Lanka Dams

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what statistics he has for electricity generated by the Victoria dam in Sri Lanka since 1985.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Statistics for electricity generated by the Victoria dam are as follows:

Year	Unit generation (GWH)
1985	586
1986	838
1987	454
1988	523
1989	610
1990	611
1991	483
1992	588
[1]1993	116

[1] January and February

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how much British aid has been given to the Victoria dam in Sri Lanka.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: A total of £113 million was provided in support of the Victoria dam project.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what response the Minister for Overseas Development has made to the National Audit Office report on the shortfall of output by the Victoria dam in Sri Lanka.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The Overseas Development Administration's evaluation study of the project concluded that the maximum total of firm and secondary energy would be 800 GWH per year, almost 92 per cent. of that anticipated in the project feasibility study. It also concluded that the shortfall in production against prediction had a number of causes which could not have been anticipated. These included changes in the hydrological database; the diversions of irrigation water out of the Mahaweli and the amounts of water stored at Kotmale; and changes in the scope and nature of systems models and in operating policies.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment the Minister for Overseas Development has made of the use of British aid in the resettlement of evacuees from the site of the Victoria dam in Sri Lanka.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We have made a detailed evaluation of the Victoria dam project, which includes a substantial section on resettlement. This evaluation was critical of the way in which resettlement issues were handled. No British aid was used for resettlement. This was because, at the outset of the project, the two Governments agreed that resettlement would be handled by the Government of Sri Lanka.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment the Minister for Overseas Development has made of the commercial return to the United Kingdom of the Victoria and Samanalawewa dams in Sri Lanka.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Both dams were constructed under British aid primarily for the economic benefit of Sri Lanka. There were also some commercial returns to the United Kingdom, as British companies were awarded contracts financed in part or whole by British aid.

Some additional work has been awarded to a British contractor including construction of roads and a new town. More generally, Britain has enhanced its reputation in the power construction sector in Sri Lanka and British companies continue to pursue business opportunities in Sri Lanka in this sector.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information the Overseas Development Administration has on leaks of the Victoria and Samanalawewa dams in Sri Lanka into limestone bedrocks.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: At the Victoria dam, there were problems shortly after impounding with limestone on the right bank of the reservoir. This was overcome in 1982-83 by grouting under pressure down to 100 ft.

At Samanalawewa dam there is a leak on the right bank of the reservoir. Grouting has not been entirely satisfactory, so the ODA funded geophysical studies and an international panel of independent experts to review the situation. The panel concluded that the dam was safe, and that its stability could not be affected even by many times the maximum credible leakage, but recommended remedial works for economic reasons. A programme for these works is currently under preparation.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the total of British aid towards the Samanalawewa dam in Sri Lanka.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: A total of £19 million was provided in support of the Samanalawewa dam.

EDUCATION

Manufacturing Industry

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what steps he is taking specifically to promote an understanding of manufacturing industry in schools and colleges.

Mr. Forth: The national curriculum offers pupils opportunities to acquire knowledge, skills and understanding relevant to manufacturing industry as part of their preparation generally for later life and for more specialised courses and training after the age of 16. The National Curriculum Council has published guidance on how these can be delivered within an industrial context.

The Government is encouraging schools and colleges to make available to 16 to 19-year-olds high quality vocational qualifications to complement A levels. A range of national vocational qualifications is available covering the skills needed in specific manufacturing jobs. Broadly based general NVQs, which develop the skills, knowledge and understadnding underpinning a range of occupations in manufacuring industry, are being piloted in a number of schools and colleges with a view to making them widely available from next September.

Bullying

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what inquiries or studies his Department has made of bullying in schools and its effects; and if he will make a statement on the results of any such inquiries or studies.

Mr. Forth: The Department is currently supporting a research project at Sheffield university which is evaluating the effectiveness of various intervention strategies designed to counter bullying. That project completes its work in August 1993. It is intended that the outcomes should be reflected in further practical guidance to complement the "Action Against Bullying" pack developed by the Scottish Council for Research in Education, which the Department sent to all schools in England in July 1992.

Voluntary Activities

Mr. Enright: To ask the Secretary of State for Education how many hours per week, on average, are devoted by (a) school staff and (b) school pupils to voluntary activities outside school hours; and what information he has as to their equivalent figures for the United States of America, France, Germany and Japan.

Mr. Forth: Data on the amount of time teachers in maintained secondary schools in England spent on extra-curricular activities were collected as part of the 1992 secondary school staffing survey. On average, full-time teachers recorded spending about one and a half hours on these activities in the survey week—13 to 19 January 1992. No corresponding data are available for pupils in secondary schools or for teachers or pupils in primary schools. Likewise, equivalent figures are not held centrally for the other countries listed.

Homework

Mr. Enright: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what assessment he has made as to how many hours per week, on average, secondary school students spend on school work at home; and what information he has on the equivalent figures for the United States of America, France, Germany and Japan.

Mr. Forth: Arrangements for setting homework are left to the discretion of individual schools and LEAs and there is no centrally held information on the time that pupils spend on this.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Pneumoconiosis

Mr. Clapham: To ask the President of the Board of Trade (1) how many mineworkers employed by the British Coal Corporation are diagnosed pneumoconiotics in each of the age bands under the mineworkers' pneumoconiosis compensation scheme;

(2) how many mineworkers employed by the British Coal Corporation and suffering from pneumoconiosis are in receipt of a weekly pension under the mineworkers' pneumoconiosis compensation scheme;

(3) what was the average age of coal miners at the date of diagnosis of pneumoconiosis over the last 10 years;

(4) how many coal miners diagnosed to be suffering from pneumoconiosis over the last 10 years had their claims backdated to an earlier development date.

Mr. Eggar: This is a matter for British Coal.

Ramfield plc

Mr. Cryer: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what amount of regional industrial development grant has been paid to Ramfield plc for the development and construction of a factory on Euroway estate, Bradford; and if he will give the dates of publication of regional industrial development grants during the past 10 years to Ramfield plc in the Employment Gazette.

Mr. Sainsbury: No regional industrial development grant has been paid to Ramfield plc.

Clarke Foods Ltd.

Mr. George Howarth: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he has received an interim report from the receivers appointed following the collapse of Clarke Foods Ltd.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: An interim report has not been received from the administrative receivers of Clarke Foods (UK) Ltd.

Deregulation

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, pursuant to his answer of 16 March to the hon. Member for Harwich (Mr. Sproat), Official Report, column 208, if he will list the organisations from which each of the chairmen of his Department's deregulation task forces are to be seconded; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: The seven chairmen and their task forces are:

Duncan Bluck, Director, John Swire & Sons—communications and transport;

Chris Spackman, Managing Director, Bovis Construction—construction;

Malcolm Bates, Deputy Managing Director, GEC—engineering industries;

John Robb, Chief Executive, Wellcome—chemicals and pharmaceuticals;

Sir Sydney Lipworth, Chairman of the Monopolies and Mergers Commission—financial services;

Nigel Whittaker, Corporate Affairs Director, Kingfisher—other services; and Michael Heron, Chairman, Post Office—food, drink and agriculture.

Regional Assistance

Mr. Madden: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what recent representations he has received concerning the retention of assisted area status by Bradford and the granting of assisted area status to Keighley; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Sainsbury [holding answer 22 March 1993]: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Fatchett) on 12 March, Official Report, column 778.

WALES

Multiple Occupancy Houses

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make it his policy to provide for licensing and mandatory inspection of all houses in multiple occupancy in Wales.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Local housing authorities must consider housing conditions in their areas annually. They already have powers to inspect and register houses in multiple occupation.

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the level of financial resources provided by his Department for the enforcement and application of current housing laws to houses in multiple occupancy in Wales in each year since 1989.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: It is for individual housing authorities to determine locally what proportion of the overall resources available to them should be used for this purpose.

Village Halls

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what support is currently given by his Department to assist village halls with the cost of essential works related to new food, safety and hygiene regulations and the Children Act 1989.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Village halls can be eligible for financial support from the Welsh Office under a range of grant schemes, including the rural initiative capital grants scheme, the child and family services grant scheme and the voluntary youth services, village halls and community centres programme. Such grants might be used for improvements to meet requirements of food safety and hygiene regulations and the registration conditions of the Children Act 1989.

Education Authorities

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish a list of education authorities in Wales with the total number of pupils for which each education authority is responsible.

Sir Wyn Roberts: Information on the total number of pupils for which each local education authority in Wales was responsible, as at January 1992, is given in the table. Figures exclude pupils in sixth-form colleges.

	Number
Clwyd	67,594
Dyfed	57,085
Gwent	74,700
Gwynedd	34,670
Mid Glamorgan	95,972
Powys	18,198
South Glamorgan	65,207
West Glamorgan	60,702

Dentistry

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the total number of (a) dental consultants and (b) administrative dental officers in Wales; and if he will indicate how many within each category are female.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: There were 42 hospital dental consultants in Wales at 30 September 1991. Of these, one was female. There were six chief administrative dental officers/directors of dental public health, whose duties were purely administrative, at 31 March 1993. Of these, one was female.

Unfit Housing

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what percentage of the housing stock in the districts of (a) Aberconwy, (b) Dinefwr, (c) Dwyfor and (d) Preseli, at the latest available date, (i) was unfit, (ii) required over £3,000 spent on it to render it fit, (iii) lacked basic amenities and (iv) lacked amenities where the head of the household is over pensionable age; and if he will make a statement on the strategy of the Welsh Office with regard to improving the housing stock in such areas.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The latest available information is from the 1986 Welsh house condition survey and is shown in the table:

Percentage of all first homes

			Lacking exclusive use of basic amenities (3)
	Unfit (1)	Repair costs £3,000 and over (2)	All dwellings	Where head of household is over pensionable age
Aberconwy	1·4	11·7	2·2	0·0
Dinefwr	13·9	17·8	7·5	1·1
Dwyfor	16·9	29·3	7·6	1·8
Preseli	11·9	16·8	3·8	0·4

Source: Welsh House Condition Survey 1986
(1) Unfit dwellings, as defined in Section 604 of the 1985 Housing Act.

(2) The estimated cost of repairs in 1986 which would be required to meet the standard for improvement grants.
(3) Those dwellings which lack exclusive use of one or more of the following: w.c. with entrance inside the building; a fixed bath or shower; a plumbed in wash hand basin; a plumbed in kitchen sink and a hot and cold water supply at the previous three points.

Very substantial resources have been made available to local authorities in Wales for the renovation of the housing stock. A further Welsh house condition survey is currently under way. The results are expected around the end of the year.

Housing, Dwyfor

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what proposals he has received with regard to improving the condition of housing in the Dwyfor district; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Dwyfor district council has submitted its housing strategy and operational plan to the Welsh Office. This includes its proposals for improving the condition of housing in the district. A copy will be placed in the Library of the House.

Care and Repair Schemes

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the factors he takes into consideration when deciding on (a) his number of schemes and (b) the areas selected for implementing care and repair schemes funded by the Welsh Office; and when he next intends to make an announcement concerning further extensions of such schemes.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Scheme locations are selected for funding on the basis of demographic and other data, including the advice of Care and Repair Cymru, and in the light of available resources. I expect to be in a position to announce allocations to the care and repair initiative for 1993-94 shortly.

Local authorities can themselves establish arrangements to provide help and assistance to renovation grant applicants on an agency basis.

Hospitals

Mr. Hain: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what effect the allocation of capital to finance the planned phase 2 extension at the Princess of Wales hospital will have on either the timetable, or the amount allocated, for construction of the new Neath and Port Talbot hospital with full general hospital facilities.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: My right hon. Friend's statement on 4 March 1993 confirmed that capital was available for both schemes. The nature of the new Neath and Port Talbot hospital will be informed by the outcome of the service review commissioned by West Glamorgan health authority.

Hill Livestock Compensatory Allowance

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many specialist hill sheep farmers in Wales (a) received higher rate hill livestock compensatory allowance and (b) received lower rate hill livestock compensatory allowance in each year since 1979.

Mr. David Hunt: There is a differential in the rate of HLCAs as between payments for ewes in the less-favoured area (severely disadvantaged area)—SDA—and the LFA (disadvantaged area)—DA; and also between hardy breed ewes and other ewes within the SDA. Payment to claimants may be based on a combination of these rates, depending on their individual circumstances; detailed statistics to show the breakdown are not available. However, of almost 15,000 HLCA claimants in Wales, about 61 per cent. have some or all of their land within the LFA (SDA) and will therefore be eligible to have some or all of their claims paid at the rates for ewes in the SDA.

Livestock Identification Scheme

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the organisations which have made representations to him on the livestock identification scheme.

Mr. David Hunt: I have received representations about livestock identification schemes from the farming unions in Wales, representatives of livestock auctioneers and individual farmers.

Forestry Commission (Land Sales)

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will set out his targets for the sale of Forestry Commission land in Wales in the current year and for each of the next three years.

Mr. David Hunt: The Forestry Commission has sold 900 hectares of forest land in Wales in the current financial year. As announced in Cm 2214, "The Government's Expenditure Plans 1993-94 to 1995-96 for the Departments of the Secretary of State for Scotland and the Forestry Commission", table 13.10, the Commission plans to sell 15,000 hectares of forest land in Britain in each of the next three years. The proportion of this that will be sold in Wales will depend on the state of the market, particularly the demand for forest land in different parts of Britain. Over the past three years, 20 per cent. of the sales have been in Wales, but it is likely that the proportion will be smaller over the next few years.

Cash Limits

Mr. Richards: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what proposals he has for changes to the cash limits for his Department in the current financial year.

Mr. David Hunt: The cash limits for Welsh Office/local authority capital will be reduced by £11,528,000 from £449,172,000 to £437,644,000 and the cash limit for Welsh Office/Housing for Wales will be increased by £11,326,000 from £156,469,000 to £167,795,000.

These changes largely reflect a transfer of £11,326,000 from local authorities to Housing for Wales which will enable housing associations to provide additional housing units.

The cash limit for WO/LACAP will also be reduced by £202,000 in respect of the transfer of unallocated fire service supplementary credit approvals to the Home Office —HO/LACAP—to facilitate the replacement of fire service mobilisation and communications systems. A corresponding increase will be made to the HO/LACAP cash limit.

None of these changes will add to the planned total of public expenditure.

EC Secondments

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many persons and of what grade or level have been seconded to (a) the European Commission and (b) UKREP.

Mr. David Hunt: Four Welsh Office staff have been seconded to the European Commission since 1989. Two were higher executive officers and two were administrative trainees. There have been no secondments to the UKREP.

Public Bodies

Mr. Wyn Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list each of the non-departmental government bodies and other bodies to which he makes appointments, with the names of each appointee and the date on which each was appointed; what was the selection procedure for appoinment in each case; and whether a Minister interviews those being considered before appointment.

Mr. David Hunt [holding answer 9 March 1993]: As the information requested is some 36 pages in length, I have arranged for a copy to be placed in the Library of the House.

Welsh Language Television

Mr. Hanson: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what steps he is taking to improve Welsh language televison reception in north-east Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: I have been asked to reply.

It is for the broadcasters to determine the engineering priorities aimed at extending or improving reception of

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Compulsory Competitive Tendering

Mr. Pope: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what consultations he had with the European Commission prior to issuing guidance on the implications for market testing of the Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations 1981.

Mr. Waldegrave: The guidance is an explanation, not an extension, of the current position on the application of the Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations. As such, the need for consultations with the European Commission did not arise.

Correspondence

Mr. Ancram: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will publish the latest figures showing the volume of correspondence from hon. Members to Ministers and agency chief executives, the targets set for reply and the percentage of replies sent within target.

Mr. Robert Jackson: The 1992 figures are set out in the table. Although there have been a large number of changes to the basis on which figures are collected, the table also sets out figures showing ministerial correspondence in 1991 first published on 3 July 1992, Official Report, columns 711-12

Storm Damage

Mr. Kynoch: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland, which local authorities will benefit from the Bellwin scheme invoked after the severe storms in January 1992; and by how much.

Mr. Lang: Only one authority, Shetland islands council, submitted a claim for grant under the Bellwin scheme following the storms in January 1992. This claim has been assessed, and I have decided to approve payment of £61,897 in grant to help meet an undue financial burden which the council suffered in responding to those storms under the terms of the scheme which I announced on 10 January last year. Payment of grant will be made to the council today.

Community Care

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) by what means social work departments' joint discharge arrangements with health boards have been evaluated in connection with the care in the community programme;

(2) what measures were taken to evaluate the feasibility of the joint discharge arrangements made by each social work department with its health boards;

(3) what arrangements he has made for public access to written submissions on the integration of joint discharge arrangements between health boards and social work departments;

(4) what assessment he has made of progress in consultations between social work departments and health boards on transfer arrangements under care in the community;

(5) what plans he has to monitor implementation of arrangements for discharge from hospital into community care.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 19 March 1993]: Agreements between social work authorities and health boards on discharge from long-stay hospitals are an essential component of community care plans. All plans submitted to the Scottish Office have been evaluated with this in mind and followed up by meetings between the community care implementation unit of the Scottish Office and local authorities and health boards. All community care plans are public documents. Discharge arrangements will be one of the aspects of community care monitored by the social work services inspectorate. In February 1992 guidance was issued on the care programme approach for persons being discharged from mental hospital. We are about to issue practice guidance on the discharge of persons from acute hospitals.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what guidance has been given to the appropriate local authorities on implementing an individual's choice to be placed in residential or nursing home care when assessed for community care needs.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 18 March 1993]: The direction on choice of residential accommodation and associated guidance which has been issued to authorities will ensure individuals have a real choice.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) what assessment he has made of the extent of consultation between each social work department and the health boards on the subject of co-ordinating and integrating arrangements for the discharge of patients into community care; and what plans he has to monitor the effective and humane implementation of such arrangements;

(2) what arrangements he has made for public access to the documentary submissions concerning the integration of joint discharge arrangements between health boards and social work departments; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 18 March 1993]: Agreements between social work authorities and health boards on discharge from long-stay hospitals are an essential component of community care plans. All plans submitted to the Scottish Office have been evaluated with this in mind and followed up by meetings between the community care implementation unit of the Scottish Office and local authorities and health boards. Departmental Spending

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what percentage share of total departmental spending was accounted for by non-departmental public bodies in each year since 1979.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 19 March 1993]:
The percentages requested are estimated to be as follows:

	Per cent
1978-79	5·8
1979-80	4·5

The percentages have been calculated by reference to total expenditure within the Secretary of State's responsibility, as published in the departmental reports —Cm. 1515, 1915 and 2214—and similar publications for earlier years. There are discontinuities in the base expenditure lines which mean that the percentage calculations are not wholly comparable.

Expenditure information for non-departmental public bodies is taken from the Cabinet Office publication "Public Bodies" for years subsequent to 1980-81 and similar publications for earlier years. The figures used to calculate the percentages comprise grant and grant in aid to executive bodies.

The increase in 1990-91 was largely accounted for by a one-off grant to the Scottish new towns associated with a premature repayment of outstanding non-housing loan debt. Non-departmental public bodies expenditure in 1991-92 was substantially affected by a £170 million increase in grant in aid to Scottish Homes to enable it to repay short-term loans inherited from the Housing Corporation in Scotland. The other significant factor was the transfer of responsibilities for training to Scottish Enterprise and Highlands and Islands Enterprise.

Public Bodies

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many appointments to the public bodies listed in "Public Bodies" for his Department were made from names supplied by the public appointments unit; and if he will list them.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 19 March 1993]: The Scottish Office maintains its own public appointments list and therefore makes limited use of names from the public appointments unit. The Scottish Office public appointments list is used as a source of names of suitably qualified candidates for consideration for a wide range of appointments which I make. From time to time, the public appointments unit passes names to the Scottish Office for the public appointment list, and vice versa. No central records are kept of the source of names of those who are appointed to public bodies.

GP Fund Holders

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many general practitioners in (a) Inverclyde, (b) Strathclyde and (c) Scotland as a whole currently have fund-holding status; how many more have submitted applications for such status; and what is the number in (a), (b) and (c) who have decided not to apply for fund-holding status.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 18 March 1993]: Infor mation is provided on the basis of health board areas and only for those practices which have formally expressed interest in applying for fund-holding status and for those practices where health boards are considering formal applications to join the fund-holding scheme. The table sets out the current position.

Education Colleges (Capital Expenditure)

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what assessment he has made of the effect of the imposition of value added tax on all capital expenditure projects initiated by colleges of higher and further education after 1 April; what consultations he has had with the appropriate funding councils on this; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 19 March 1993]: In the 1993-94 allocations of capital grant to the further education colleges in Scotland provision has been made for the costs of value-added tax. Grant-aided colleges of higher education are currently liable for value-added tax on capital expenditure projects, and that will continue after 1 April 1993. There is no Further Education Funding Council in Scotland. The further education colleges will receive grant from the Secretary of State for Scotland.

Sheriff Court, Greenock

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when the refurbishment of the Greenock sheriff court will be completed and the court recommence its work therein; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 22 March 1993]: The final phase of the refurbishment and extension of Greenock sheriff courthouse is scheduled for completion in May 1994. The building will then be fully commissioned and reoccupied in August 1994.

Speech Therapists

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many speech therapists were employed, on a full-time or part-time basis, in (a) Inverclyde, (b) Strathclyde and (c) Scotland as a whole (i) in 1984 and (ii) at the latest available date.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 22 March 1993]: The information requested for Scotland, Strathclyde and its constituent health board areas is detailed in the table. The information for the administrative district of Inverclyde can be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Dental Care (Children)

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many times each year school children are examined by a dentist in (a) Strathclyde and (b) Scotland as a whole.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 22 March 1993]: The community dental service is required to screen all children in local education authority schools at least three times in each child's school life. In areas of poor dental health and where availability of general dental services is poor, such screening may be more frequent. The number of dental inspections carried out for children of school age in each of the health board areas within Strathclyde region and in Scotland as a whole for the period October 1991 to September 1992, the last 12-month period for which information is available, is shown in the table.

Newton Street Railway Tunnel

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what recent discussions he has had with ScotRail and Strathclyde regional council concerning the repairs to be carried out to the Newton Street railway tunnel; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 22 March 1993]: The repairs to the Newton Street railway tunnel are matters for British Rail and Strathclyde regional council, through Strathclyde passenger transport executive. My right hon. Friend did, however, take the need for the repairs fully into account in Strathclyde regional council's capital allocations provision for 1992-93 and 1993-94. I understand that the works are expected to be carried out between October 1993 and May 1994.

Milk Quota

Dr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what arrangements are currently in place for the administration of the milk quota in Scotland.

Sir Hector Monro [holding answer 22 March 1993]: The Scottish Office Agriculture and Fisheries Department is responsible for the administration of milk quotas in Scotland. Certain functions are currently performed on its behalf by the three milk marketing boards in Scotland and by Kennerty Dairies, in respect of Shetland producers, under the terms of individual agency agreements. The Intervention Board executive agency also performs certain milk quota functions on a United Kingdom basis.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Religious Affiliations

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) what is the annual cost of monitoring the religious affiliation of the employees of (a) the Northern Ireland Housing Executive, (b) the water service in Northern Ireland and (c) employees of the Western health and social services board;

(2) what is the annual cost of monitoring the religious affiliation of the employees of the Department of Education headquarters.

Mr. Mates: The information cannot be provided in the form requested, as these bodies monitor gender and disability of their employees as well as religious affiliations and it is not possible to separate costs purely attibutable to the religious aspect.

The following information is available, however:

(a) The chief executive of the Northern Ireland Housing Executive has advised me that the cost of all monitoring during 1991-92 was £26,000.

(b) The annual costs of equal opportunities monitoring in the Western health and social services board is £54,300.

(c) Monitoring for the whole of the Northern Ireland civil service is undertaken centrally by the equal opportunities unit, located in the Department of Finance and Personnel, but is not undertaken on a departmental, functional or geographical basis. The annual running costs for the equal opportunities unit which also has responsibility for developing, formulating, co-ordinating and monitoring the equal opportunities policy for the whole of the Northern Ireland civil service is £230,000.

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the annual cost of monitoring the religious affiliation of the employees of the Northern Ireland Office who work in Belfast.

Mr. Mates: With regard to the annual cost of monitoring the religious affiliation of Northern Ireland civil servants working for the Northern Ireland Office, I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer I gave him today. The cost of monitoring home civil servants is negligible.

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the annual cost of monitoring the religious affiliation of the Royal Ulster Constabulary.

Mr. Mates: The information requested is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the annual cost of monitoring the religious affiliation of the employees of the Police Authority for Northern Ireland.

Mr. Mates: Monitoring of the religious affiliation of the employees of the Police Authority for Northern Ireland is undertaken centrally by the Northern Ireland civil service equal opportunities unit. I would therefore refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer I gave him today.

EC Secondments

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many persons, and of what grade or level, have been seconded to (a) the European Commission and (b) UKREP.

Mr. Mates: From 1984 to the present time the Northern Ireland civil service has seconded the following officers to the European Commission:

1 at Unified Grade 5 level (Assistant Secretary)
4 at Unified Grade 7 level (Principal)
1 at Deputy Principal level (equivalent to Senior Executive Office)
2 at Administration Trainee level
1 Senior Agricultural Economist
1 Principal Statistician
1 Principal Economist
1 Industrial Accountant
1 Veterinary Officer

There has also been the following secondments to the office of the United Kingdom representative:

2 at Unified Grade 7 level (Principal)
1 at Deputy Principal level (equivalent to Senior Executive Officer)

Publicity

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, pursuant to his answer of 2 June 1992 to the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson), Official Report, column 439, what is his Department's (a) current outturn estimate for publicity expenditure for 1992-93 and (b) budgeted publicity expenditure for 1993-94.

Mr. Mates: [holding answer 25 February 1993]: Publicity expenditure figures are:

Year	£
1992-93	6,446,300
[1]1993-94	6,059,000

[1] Budgeted.

Prevention of Terrorism Acts

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many people were (a) arrested or (b) stopped and questioned under the terms of the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act in 1990.

Mr. Mates [holding answer 3 March 1993]: The statistics relate to the total numbers of arrests under section 14 of the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1989; and of examinations for more than one hour, and detentions, under section 16 of that Act, rather than to the total numbers of individuals involved.

In Northern Ireland in 1990, there were 1,764 arrests under section 14 of the Act, but there is no record of anyone being examined for more than one hour, or detained, under section 16.

Departmental Functions

Mr. Dykes: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the work of the Department of Economic Development since 1982.

Mr. Atkins: [holding answer 18 March 1993]: The Department of Economic Development has policies to encourage inward investment; to promote the competitiveness of local industry by identifying and removing obstacles to growth, building up management and work-force skills and supporting innovation; to stimulate the development of an enterprise culture and the growth of small firms; to ensure quality of opportunity in employment; and to provide a sound regulatory framework for the conduct of business in Northern Ireland through legislation on companies health and safety at work, consumer protection and industrial relations.

Against the background of the Single European market, the Department adopted a new strategy which was set out in "Competing in the 1990s: The Key to Growth". The strategy focuses on activities designed to improve business performance and competitiveness and on helping to grow in a sustained and profitable manner.

All the DED businesses—Industrial Development Board, Local Enterprise Development Unit, Training and Employment Agency, Industrial Research and Technology Unit and the Northern Ireland Tourist Board —have published and are implementing new corporate plans within the framework of the overall strategy.

Since the inception of the Industrial Development Board, in September 1982, investment projects worth a total of £3,011 million have been secured, an overall total of 45,019 new jobs have been promoted and 71,157 jobs safeguarded.

Since 1982 the Local Enterprise Development Unit, LEDU, has offered over £210 million to small businesses in Northern Ireland.

Under its local enterprise programme. LEDU has also assisted the establishment of a network of 34 local enterprise agencies which provide 1.3 million sq. ft. of workspace, housing more than 600 businesses employing 3,200 people.

Harland and Wolff plc was privatised in September 1989 and Short Brothers plc in October 1989.

On 2 April 1990 the Department launched the Training and Employment Agency. The agency's aim is to assist economic growth in Northern Ireland by ensuring provision of training and employment services which contribute to companies becoming more competitive and individuals obtaining the skills and competence needed to secure worthwhile employment.

Following a strategic review of tourism policy in 1989, a new strategy was implemented which aimed to maximise the potential of tourism as a generator of wealth and creator of employment. New tourism legislation came into force on 1 April 1992 which placed the Northern Ireland tourist board in the pivotal role to promote, market and develop Northern Ireland as a tourist destination.

The Industrial Research and Technological Unit, established in 1993, has facilitated the establishment of high-quality research and development projects which are aimed at strengthening both the technological infrastructure of Northern Ireland, and the competitiveness of industry.

The Department has also published an energy strategy entitled "Engergy for the 1990s and Beyond". The document described Northern Ireland's strategic energy objectives against the rapidly changing energy scene in Northern Ireland.

The electricity industry was restructured during 1992. The generating stations were split from the remainder of Northern Ireland Electricity and sold to the private sector by means of trade sales. Plans for the flotation of NIE are well advanced.

The Government have considerably strengthened the law against unlawful discrimination in employment in Northern Ireland through the introduction of the Fair Employment (Northern Ireland) Act 1989. It represents the most radical anti-discrimination law ever enacted in the United Kingdom. Through the monitoring information which has been gathered and published by the Commission, a clearer picture has emerged of the extent of the problem of inequality in the work force. Already, a small but helpful improvement in the situation is evident.

The Department has introduced a substantial volume of new health and safety at work legislation, including that required by EC directives. Consumer protection legislation has been introduced to enforce EC directives on product liability and price marketing. In 1985 the General Consumer Council for Northern Ireland was established.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Vaccine Damage

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many awards under the terms of the Vaccine Damage Payments Act where pertussis vaccine was claimed to be the cause have been made for each year since 1988; and how many applications have been refused.

Mr. Scott: The information is not available in the form requested. The table lists all awards and disallowances since 1988.

Year	Awards	Disallowances
1988	5	38
1989	2	53
1990	—	40
1991	2	41
1992	[1]16	36

[1]The increase in awards for 1992 was due to a combination of factors and includes a number of awards for claims made in earlier years, some consequent upon vaccine damage tribunal findings.

Administrative Headquarters, Leeds

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on the arrangements for recruiting personnel to work at the new administrative headquarters in Leeds.

Mr. Burt: When a vacancy first arises in DSS in Quarry house in Leeds, consideration is given to staff who are available within the organisation. Vacancies for clerical posts which cannot be filled in this way are advertised in the local Employment Service jobcentre or local press. Vacancies in specialist posts are drawn to the attention of staff in other Government Departments, advertised in the national press or possibly filled by the use of executive search agencies.

Pneumoconiosis

Mr. Clapham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many posthumous claims for pneumoconiosis were made in the last 10 years under the state scheme and under the mineworkers' pneumoconiosis compensation scheme.

Mr. Scott: This information is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. The mine workers' pneumoconiosis compensation scheme is a matter for British Coal.

Pensions

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the information about the transfer to the state retirement pension which is given to women who are in receipt of invalidity benefit, shortly before they attain the age of 60 years; what interviews dealing with these matters are offered to such women; and if he will place copies of the relevant documents in the Library.

Mr. Scott: The administration of invalidity benefit is a matter for Mr. Michael Bichard the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member with such information as is available and a copy will be placed in the Library.

Letter from Mr. M. Bichard to Dr. Norman Godman, dated 22 March 1993:

As Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency it is my responsibility to answer questions about relevant operational matters. I am therefore replying to your recent Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Social Security asking if he will list the information about the transfer to the state Retirement Pension which is given to women who are in receipt of Invalidity Benefit (IVB) shortly before they attain the age of 60 years, and what interviews dealing with these matters are offered to such women.

Four months before pension age (age 60 for women, 65 for men) a Retirement Pension claims pack is automatically issued by one of our Area Computer Centres direct to the customers' address.

The claims package for women includes a Retirement Pension claim form (BR1), an information sheet (BR33) containing the rate of Retirement Pension the customer is entitled to at pension age and other advisory information, also a leaflet AC1 which gives the details of the option of having their Retirement Pension paid by Automated Credit Transfer (ACT) into their Bank/Building Society account.

Form BR1 advises customers requiring further information to get in touch with their local Social Security office, the same advice is given on form BR33. In addition form BR33 gives the Social Security Freeline number.

A woman aged 55-59 in receipt of IVB is issued with a letter 16 weeks before she reaches aged 60 advising her that as she is in receipt of IVB she may choose to elect to remain on that benefit rather than claim her Retirement Pension which may be at a lower rate than her IVB. It also explains that her choice may be affected by the fact that Retirement Pension is taxable but IVB is not.

The District Office would not as a matter of procedure offer an interview to women approaching age 60 who were in receipt of Invalidity Benefit. However the normal interview facilities offered by all offices would be available to these ladies if they approached their District Office for advice.

I hope that you find this reply helpful. I enclose copies of relevant documents and have arranged for copies to be placed in the Library. A copy of this letter will appear in the Official Report and a copy will also be placed in the Library.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Industrial Waste

Mr. Roger Evans: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what progress has been made in phasing out the dumping of industrial waste at sea; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: I can confirm that, in accordance with my statement of 22 February 1990, this practice has now been brought to an end. The final licence for sea disposal of liquid industrial waste expired at the end of February and no further licences for disposal of industrial waste at sea will now be issued.

I have taken this action well ahead of our commitment under the London convention to phase out sea disposal of industrial waste globally by 1995. This action also anticipates new arrangements agreed last year under the Paris convention on the protection of the marine environment of the north-east Atlantic.

EMPLOYMENT

Labour Statistics

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what percentage of people aged (a) 20 to 25 years, (b) 26 to 30 years, (c) 31 to 35 years, (d) 36 to 40 years, (e) 41 to 45 years, (f) 46 to 50 years and (g) 51 to 55 years are currently unemployed; and what percentage of each group is currently seeking employment.

Mr. McLoughlin: Unemployment levels for pre-determined age bands, expressed as a percentage of the work force in those particular age bands, are available using either the International Labour Organisation measure of unemployment, obtainable from the quarterly labour force survey, or the monthly claimant count measure. To be included in either of these measures, an unemployed person should be available for work and actively seeking employment. The table gives the extent of the readily available data from both sources—claimant unemployment rates by age are available only nationally and on a quarterly basis.

Figures are not available for the subtotal of youth unemployment on this basis.

Mr. McLoughlin: The available information concerning the numbers and rates of fatal and other injuries caused by workplace accidents in Wales in 1990-91 and 1991-92—provisional figures—is provided in the table. We do not regularly collect information on the number of days lost through accident or injury in the workplace.

Unemployment

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many long-term unemployed people were registered on 1 March, or on the nearest available date, in (a) Lewisham, Deptford and (b) the London borough of Lewisham; how many of these she expects to be offered the opportunity to participate in the learning for work scheme announced in the Budget; and how many of these she expects to take part in the community action programme announced in the Budget.

Mr. McLoughlin [holding answer 19 March 1993]: On 14 January, the latest date for which figures are available, there were 3,834 claimants unemployed for over a year in the Lewisham, Deptford parliamentary constituency, and 8,901 in the Lewisham local authority district. The number of learning for work opportunities which will be available in each area from September will be determined in negotiations with local training and enterprise councils. Announcements will be made in due course of the number of opportunities, under community action, which the Employment Service will be making available in each area from the summer.

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if she intends to establish a work start pilot project in the constituency of Lewisham, Deptford, or the London borough of Lewisham.

Mr. McLoughlin [holding answer 19 March 1993]: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State today announced that work start pilots will be run by Tyneside TEC, Devon and Cornwall TEC, and by the Employment Service in East Kent and in south and south-west London, which covers the boroughs of Southwark, Croydon, Bromley, Lambeth, Wandsworth, Merton and Sutton.

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many persons were unemployed for 12 months and more in Britain in May 1979 and on the latest available date.

Mr. McLoughlin: [holding answer 19 March 1993]: In October 1983, the earliest date for which comparable figures are available, 1,089,060 claimants in Great Britain had been unemployed for over 12 months. This compares with 974,181 in January 1993. All figures are on the unadjusted basis.

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many unemployed people have started up their own businesses in (a) the London borough of Lewisham and (b) the constituency of Lewisham, Deptford, in the last year; and how many more she expects to do so under the new business start-up scheme announced in the Budget.

Mr. McLoughlin [holding answer 19 March 1993]: Information on the numbers of unemployed people starting up their own businesses in Lewisham and Deptford is not available from this Department in the form requested.

Wool Industry

Dr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many people were employed at the latest available date in the wool industry in England and Wales.

Mr. McLoughlin [holding answer 19 March 1993]: Figures at the level of industrial and geographical detail specified are available only from the census of employment. The number of employees in employment in the woollen and worsted industry at September 1989 in England and Wales stood at 28,400. The results of the 1991 census of employment will be available from 8 April.

ENVIRONMENT

Local Authority Debts

Mr. Moss: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the debt burden of the London borough of Harlow, Newcastle metropolitan district, Wellingborough district council and Huntingdonshire; and what proportion of their respective budgets is attributable to interest payments on those debt burdens.

Mr. Robin Squire: The information is as follows:

Total external debt, including both temporary and long-term debt at 31 March 1992 is:

	£ million
Harlow DC	41·3
Newcastle upon Tyne MDC	457·1
Wellingborough BC	44·7
Huntingdon DC	29·3

Budgeted external interest payments for 1992-93, expressed as a percentage of revenue expenditure, including HRA expenditure and that funded by sales, fees and charges and external interest receipts, is:

	Per cent.
Harlow DC	6·5
Newcastle upon Tyne MDC	9·9
Huntingdon DC	3·5
Wellingborough BC	15·7

Homelessness

Mr. Hendry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment which local authorities have not provided details of the numbers of homeless families for inclusion in the most recent statistics on homelessness published by his Department this week; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Baldry: Information on the number of households for whom local authorities accept responsibility to secure permanent accommodation under the homelessness provisions of the 1985 Housing Act is reported in part E of the quarterly P1 return.

The statistics for the fourth quarter of 1992, published on 15 March 1993, were based on responses from 94 per cent. of English local authorities and included estimates for others which had not provided full information.

Of the local authorities listed, Wandsworth and Redbridge did provide details of households in temporary accommodation. Late returns have since been received from Allerdale, Cambridge, East Hertfordshire, Torbay and West Devon.

I welcome this opportunity to thank authorities for their improved response to the homelessness return over the last year. I particularly commend the inner London boroughs which have made the effort to send more timely returns, despite the large volume of applications they have to deal with.

I hope that this improved response will be maintained and that other authorities will be able to provide their returns more promptly in future so that we can more accurately monitor the number of households who have to seek priority rehousing from local authorities. This is particularly important at a time when we will be watching to see whether the downward trend in homeless acceptances which emerged in 1992 is maintained in 1993.

Plymouth Development Corporation

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he is yet in a position to announce who he will be appointing as chairman and members to the board of the Plymouth development corporation.

Mr. Redwood: Subject to the approval of Parliament to the establishment of the Plymouth urban development corporation, I have decided to appoint Vice Admiral Sir Robert Gerken KCB, CBE to the chairman of the Corporation. Sir Robert is a past flag officer Plymouth and lives in the city.

The board will have nine other members. Councillor John Ingham, leader of Plymouth city council, is to be the deputy chairman. Three other members of the board will represent the city council—Tom Savery, leader of the Conservative group, and councillors Tudor Evans and Jean Melder. Simon Day, leader of Devon county council, will also be on the board.

I have also decided to appoint Mr. Jonathan Harris FRICS, chairman and managing director of the Carlisle Group plc. The remaining appointments will be announced shortly.

East Thames Corridor

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to set up a task force to oversee development of the east Thames corridor; and what area will be covered by the development plans.

Mr. Baldry: An announcement will be made on this very shortly, following which I will write to the hon. Member.

Mr. Evennett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress has been made in producing the revised regional planning guidance for the south-east and proposals for the east Thames corridor.

Mr. Howard: The new draft regional planning guidance for the south-east, a report by consultants Llewelyn Davies on the development potential of the east Thames corridor and a consultation paper on the Government's approach to that area's development will be published tomorrow at 10 am. Copies of these documents will be placed in the Vote Office and the Library at that time. The guidance will aim to meet the development requirements of the recovering economy in the south-east and the housing needs of its people for the period up to 2011, while responding to the range of environmental concerns and opportunities. It will emphasise the need for development to continue to take place throughout the region but recognise that in the medium to longer-term development opportunities in the eastern parts of the region, particularly the east Thames corridor, will have an increasingly important part to play. The consultation paper on the east Thames corridor will set out reactions to the consultants' findings and proposals for a task force to consider the future planning of that area.

Earnings

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment by what amount would a couple with earnings of £70 a week, with two children, paying £30 a week rent and £10.54 in council tax, need to increase their earnings to secure an additional take-home pay of £4.42 per week.

Mr. Burt: I have been asked to reply.

A couple with two children, paying £30 a week rent and with earnings of £70 per week, would be entitled to family credit of £61.18. In order to secure an additional take-home pay of £4.42 a week they would need to increase their earnings by £5.09 a week. This assumes that the question refers to a community charge of £10.54, which is the correct amount in the circumstances described, rather than council tax which does not take effect until April 1993.

Renewable Energy

Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment to what extent the Government are committed to developing renewable energy sources as a means of limiting environmental destruction and pollution; how much money has been invested in renewable energy research for each year from 1985 to 1992; what plans he has to reduce Britain's dependency on, and consumption of, oil; and what plans the Government have drawn up to limit the amount of environmental damage caused by the drilling and transportation of oil.

Mr. Eggar: I have been asked to reply.

The Government are committed to the development of sources of renewable energy with prospects of being economically attractive, and environmentally acceptable. My Department has invested the following amounts on research, development, and demonstration as part of its programme on renewables.

Financial year	Outturn (£ million)
1985-86	13·2
1986-87	12·0
1987-88	16·3
1988-89	16·0
1989-90	17·9
1990-91	20·8
1991-92	24·6

The renewables orders under the non fossil fuel obligation have resulted in contracts being signed for 600 MW of plant so far.

The Government also continue to promote cost-effective energy efficiency measures which reduce the demand for fuel and emissions associated with their use.

The Government are fully committed to meeting their obligations on reducing pollution from offshore oil and gas activities. These obligations stem from agreements reached within the Paris Commission. Concerning the transportation of oil, in addition to the Department of Transport inquiry into the loss of Braer, the Government have announced a second inquiry, chaired by Lord Donaldson, to consider whether any further measures are appropriate and feasible to protect the United Kingdom coastline from pollution due to merchant shipping.

HEALTH

Prescriptions

13. Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the average total cost of a prescribed item now; and what was the average cost in 1979.

Dr. Mawhinney: The estimated average total cost of a prescribed item to the national health service in England for 1993-94 is £7·95. In 1979 it was £2·42.

26. Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what has been the percentage rise in the cost of a prescription since 1979.

Dr. Mawhinney: On 1 April 1993, 757 per cent. in real terms. The charge remains substantially less than the average total cost of a prescribed item to the national health service. Only one in five prescribed items dispensed by community pharmacists and appliances contractors now attracts a charge, compared with two in five in 1979.

GP Fund Holders

Mr. Peter Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many general practitioner fund holders are due to start operating in April; and if she will make a statement.

Dr. Mawhinney: Around 600 further practices are expected to join the scheme from 1 April, when one in four of the population will be covered by the scheme.

21. Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many general practitioners currently have fund-holding status; how many more have applied; and what is the number of practices which neither have nor have applied for fund-holding status.

Dr. Mawhinney: Over 3,000 general practitioners in 585 practices are now fund holders. Around 600 more practices are expected to join the scheme from 1 April. The figure for the number of applications made for fund-holding status is not held centrally.

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what guidelines she issues to general practitioner fund holders about the registration of people with disabilities;

(2) what representations she has had from disability support groups about discrimination in registering people with disabilities by general practitioner fund holders.

Dr. Mawhinney: An allegation of discrimination has been drawn to my attention by a local disability group. I understand that the issue has now been resolved. General practitioners have always had the right to decide whether or not to accept a patient on to their lists. We have now given patients the right to register with any doctor of their choice, who is willing to accept them. We endorse the advice issued by the General Medical Council that it is unacceptable to discriminate against patients on any grounds.

Fund-holding GPs have no financial reason to refuse to accept patients. The level of funding is set individually for each practice and takes into account factors such as the number of chronically sick and disabled people and other potentially "high-cost" patients. In addition, regions hold contingency reserves to meet any unforeseeable changes, such as an increase in the number of patients requiring high-cost treatment.

Community Care

15. Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how she intends to ensure that there is a wide diversity of provision of community care services.

Mr. Yeo: We have always made clear our commitment to a real choice of services for users and a mixed economy of care. We have reinforced this with initiatives such as the statutory direction on choice, giving people the right to enter the home they prefer, the conditions attached to the special transitional grant—which will mean that most of the funding for community care services will be spent in the independent sector—and the establishment of a users' and carers' group to provide direct feedback to Ministers.

Tomlinson Report

16. Dr. Goodson-Wickes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment she has made of the accident and emergency services for London, following the Government's decision on the Tomlinson report.

Mr. Sackville: We announced our policy for London after fully considering the evidence on accident and emergency services, both in the Tomlinson report and in other studies. We will consult on the specific changes we have outlined in the policy document "Making London Better". Good emergency services for the full range of cases will continue to be available.

Health Helpline

17. Mrs. Angela Knight: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment has been made of the effect of the health helpline for patients.

Mr. Sackville: As a direct result of the national launch all regions have reported a fourfold increase in the number of inquiries dealt with by their helpline to over 17,000 calls in the first month since the launch.

The vast majority of callers to the service have expressed support for the health line and all regions report that they are beginning to receive repeat inquiries and calls from new users who have had the service recommended to them by satisfied customers.

Residential Care

19. Mr. Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps his Department is taking to encourage local authority associations to meet service providers to develop common forms of contract for residential care.

Mr. Yeo: We have already encouraged the local authority associations and representatives of service providers to establish forums where this kind of issue can be discussed. The Department would be happy to offer further assistance should all concerned find that helpful.

Health Promotion Clinics

20. Mr. Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will make a statement on the future of services provided in health promotion clinics.

Dr. Mawhinney: From 1 July 1993 payments to general practitioners for health promotion clinics will be replaced by annual payments for structured health promotion programmes, which could include clinics, concentrating, in the first instance, on reduction of smoking, coronary heart disease and stroke.

There will also be separate payment for chronic disease management programmes for asthma and diabetes, and a two-year transitional scheme to help protect existing activity outside the scope of the new programmes.

Cumberland Infirmary

22. Mr. Martlew: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations she has received with regard to the delay in the construction of stage two of the Cumberland infirmary.

Mr. Sackville: No such representations have been received.

NHS Trusts

23. Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many national health service trusts are due to start in the Wessex region in April; and if she will make a statement.

Dr. Mawhinney: From 1 April 1993 10 units will become operational as national health service trusts in Wessex. This will bring the total number of trusts in the region to 22.

28. Mr. Garnier: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many NHS trusts are due to start work in the Trent region in April; and if she will make a statement.

Dr. Mawhinney: From 1 April 1993 16 units will become operational as national health service trusts in Trent. This will bring the total number of NHS trusts in the region to 29.

Amenity Beds

24. Mr. Willetts: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many amenity beds there are in the NHS; and what annual revenues they yield.

Mr. Sackville: There were 2,956 amenity beds in England in 1990-91. The associated annual revenue was £1·3 million.

Priority Patients

25. Mrs. Helen Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what additional resources will be made available to health authorities to allow them to ensure that no patients are kept waiting for treatment until the new financial year if they are in priority need.

Mr. Sackville: The Government have invested an additional £2·5 billion in the national health service this year and patients who require urgent treatment will be given proper priority. The Government also plan to invest a further £1 billion for 1993-94 which could enable a further 190,000 more in and day patients to be treated.

Maternity Units

27. Mr. Trimble: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many maternity units had (a) fewer than 1,000 births and (b) between 1,000 and 1,500 births in 1992.

Mr. Sackville: The information requested is not yet available. We hope that it will be available in May.

Natural Medicines

Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what amount of funds is being made available for research into the role of natural medicines into the key areas identified by the White Paper for priority action.

Mr. Sackville: Neither natural therapies nor natural medicines have been separately identified for research funding in relation to the "Health of the Nation" strategy.

Publication of Accounts

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health on what date the accounts of health authorities and health trusts for 1991-92 became available for publication.

Mr. Sackville: Each national health service trust is required to hold a public meeting by 30 September at which its annual report and accounts and any audit report on the accounts are presented. Health authorities are not obliged to publish their annual accounts individually, but are encouraged to prepare annual reports to meet local accountability requirements. After they have been audited the accounts of individual health authorities and NHS trusts are in the public domain and we would expect those bodies to make copies available on request.

The Department of Health summarises the accounts of health authorities, family health services authorities and NHS trusts in England and submits them to the Comptroller and Auditor General by 30 November each year. After audit the summarised accounts are presented to Parliament and subsequently published.

Suppliers' Bills

Dr. Twinn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, if she will require health authorities and NHS trusts to declare in their annual reports how quickly they pay their suppliers' bills; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Sackville: No. All national health service bodies are currently expected to pay their suppliers in accordance with contractual terms and sensible practice. Any changes to the present range of disclosures required in statutory company accounts would be adopted.

AIDS (Medical Staff)

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to her oral answer of 11 March, Official Report, column 1107, to the hon. Member for Sheffield, Brightside, if she will carry out a full review of the recent AIDS doctor case in Bolton; if she will make it her policy to review the existing guidelines so as to allow doctors' names to be published and to establish a duty on health workers to report known AIDS cases among colleagues; and if she will make a statement.

Dr. Mawhinney: The Department is reviewing guidance in the light of the recent HIV/AIDS cases among health care workers, including the Bolton doctor.

Health care workers have the same rights to medical confidentiality as any patient. Health care workers also have an ethical duty not to place their patients at risk. If they undertake invasive procedures and suspect or know that they are HIV positive, they must remain under close medical supervision and obtain occupational advice on the possible need to alter their practices. If physicians are aware that an infected health care worker under their care has not followed advice to modify their practice, they must inform the relevant authority. Forthcoming departmental guidance on the management of infected health care workers will clarify advice on confidentiality.

Food Poisoning

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research has been done into the link between plated food served in hotels and botulism and food poisoning generally.

Mr. Sackville: The Department of Health is presently funding two projects specifically related to the organism responsible for botulism.

The first project, funded at the Institute of Food Research, Norwich, looks at the factors affecting the heat resistance of spores of non-proteolytic strains—those capable of growth and toxin production at low temperatures—of Clostridium botulinum and the effect of preservation conditions on heat-damaged spores.

The second project, funded at the Campden Food and Drink Research Association, seeks to determine the growth potential of Clostridium botulinum non-proteolytic types B and E following heat treatment in foods containing lysozyme—a naturally occurring substance which can protect Clostridium botulinum spores.

Ambulance Service

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many ambulance services are failing to meet the maximum response times set by the patients charter; and what action she is taking to improve response times.

Mr. Sackville: In 1991-92, the latest year for which information is available and before the patients charter was published, 20 ambulance authorities in England failed to achieve the standards set out in the patients charter for responding to calls. Under the national health service internal market it is for purchasers of services to set the standards required of service providers. This should ensure continued improvement in the standards met by ambulance authorities. The Government are concerned to see the charter standards achieved and we are monitoring closely ambulance authorities which still need to improve performance.

Stillbirth

Mrs. Wise: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will outline the definition of stillbirth used by (a) the World Health Organisation and (b) other major developed countries.

Mr. Sackville: The World Health Organisation does not suggest a definition of stillbirth, but does define fetal death, which would include stillbirths. This and further information about statistical data can be found in the WHO publication "International Statistics Classification of Diseases and Related Health Problems, Tenth Revision, Volume 1, 1992." A copy is available in the Library.

Copies of relevant pages from a publication by the Institut de Demographie—"Are Live and Stillbirths Comparable All Over Europe?," Working Paper 170, University of Louvain, January 1993—are also in the Library. Copies of the working paper are being obtained and one will be placed in the Library. This extract gives the legal criteria for registration of stillbirths in European countries at 1 January 1991. The entry for England and Wales show the age of gestation as 28 weeks. This was reduced to 24 weeks by the Stillbirth (Definition) Act 1992 which took effect on 1 October 1992.

Pharmacies

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many appeals against a family health service authority refusal to enter into a contract with a pharmacy for the dispensing of NHS prescriptions have been heard in the last year for which figures are available.

Dr. Mawhinney: For the year ending 31 March 1992, 37 appeals were made and heard against family health service authority refusal to award a contract to dispense national health service prescriptions.

Administrative Headquarters, Leeds

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will make a statement on the arrangements for recruiting personnel to work at the new administrative headquarters in Leeds.

Mr. Sackville: The new administrative headquarters in Leeds has been staffed mainly with existing civil servants, many of whom relocated to Leeds with their jobs. Clerical and secretarial posts have been filled successfully through local recruitment exercises.

Tranquillisers

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information campaigns have been launched by her Department in the last year on issues relating to tranquilliser addiction.

Dr. Mawhinney: The booklet "Drugs—A Parent's Guide", promoted by the Department's national anti-drug publicity campaign launched in March 1992, contains information on tranquilliser use and misuse.

Physiotherapists

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will make it her policy to extend the provisions of the Opportunity 2000 initiative to the national health service to cover physiotherapists.

Mr. Sackville: The Opportunity 2000 initiative applies to all occupational groups.

NHS Vacant Properties

Mr. Hendry: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many vacant residential properties are owned by each regional health authority; what are her Department's plans for reducing this number; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Sackville: This information is not available centrally. From a recent survey we estimate that across the national health service 1,800 residential properties are vacant. This figure excludes places in hostels for nurses and other staff.

In conjunction with the task force on Government Departments' empty homes, we are considering measures to bring more of these empty properties back into use.

Consultants (Merit Awards)

Dr. Goodson-Wickes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what were the grades of merit awards granted to consultants in the National Health Service in 1991-92, categorised by region and specialty.

Dr. Mawhinney: The information is shown in the table.

Breast Cancer

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will make it her policy to extend the current breast cancer screening programme by individual invitation to women over 64 years of age.

Mr. Sackville: There is evidence to suggest that women over the age of 64 are less likely to accept routine invitations to screening. Should experience show a strong demand we will look again at including this age group within the recall programmes.

Children in Care

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will seek to amend the Children Act to enable social services departments to initiate wardship proceedings as a means of taking a child into care.

Mr. Yeo: No. The Children Act 1989 sought to rationalise the grounds for placing children in care within a single statutory framework. In so doing the new legislation removed the rights of local authorities to initiate wardship proceedings as a means of taking a child into care. If local authorities wish to place a child in care they must demonstrate that the statutory threshold criteria for the making of a care order apply—section 31 of the Children Act 1989—and that the order will positively contribute to the welfare of the child—section 1(5).

Eastman Dental Hospital

Dr. Goodson-Wickes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what will be the future of the Eastman dental hospital, following the Government's reaction to the Tomlinson report.

Dr. Mawhinney: The Government response to the Tomlinson report was set out in the document "Making London Better". As with the other postgraduate teaching hospitals it is the intention that the Eastman dental hospital enters the national health service internal market as a trust in April 1994.

Environmental Health Officers

Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many environmental health officers are employed in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Sackville: This information is not available centrally.

Secure Accommodation

Lady Olga Maitland: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the average waiting time for a youth before being allocated a place in a secure unit.

Mr. Yeo: This information is not available centrally.

GPs (Computers)

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what amount has been spent in primary care on computer reimbursement in each of the last 10 years.

Mr. Sackville: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave her on 25 January at columns 528-32.

The general practitioner computer reimbursement scheme came into effect on 1 April 1990.

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many general practices have computer systems.

Dr. Mawhinney: A survey in 1991 indicated that 63 per cent. of practices had their own computers or shared facilities with other practices. A survey of the current position has recently been commissioned.

Ethnic Minorities

Mr. Sumberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action she is taking to improve health services for people from black and ethnic minorities.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: We are determined that people from black and ethnic minorities should benefit fully from the national health service. We already have programmes to promote better recognition of specific needs and to overcome cultural and other barriers to using health services.

There are convincing demonstrations of good practice in places where voluntary organisations and the health service are delivering high-quality services to the local black and ethnic minority population.

We need to spread this good practice. My noble Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State has appointed a task force to report to her on the action to be taken. Membership is drawn from community groups, the national health service and the Department to consider action at all levels to ensure the wide application of current best practice.

We are looking to the task force for advice on early action—on how to secure the measurable, practical progress which we regard as esential. This will complement the initiative to improve equal opportunities in the staffing of the national health service, which will itself help to improve the responsiveness and cultural sensitivity of services.

Community Care

Mr. Jim Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment she has made of the extent to which the distribution of the community care transitional grant reflects need within local authority areas.

Mr. Yeo: The distribution provides a balanced transition from the present pattern of spending by the Department of Social Security towards one based on local authorities' standard spending assessment. The grant will provide an opportunity for authorities and service providers to adjust to the arrangements, ensuring that all authorities are able to meet their new statutory obligations from April this year.

Psychiatric Patients

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps her Department is taking to care for psychiatric patients released into the community; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Yeo: We required all district health authorities to implement the care programme approach from 1 April 1991 in collaboration with local social services departments for all psychiatric patients about to be discharged into the community. The needs of each patient, both for continuing health and social care and for accommodation, are systematically assessed and appropriate arrangements made. These include the appointment of a key worker to keep in close touch with the patient and to monitor that the agreed health and social care is given. If an adequate package of care cannot be agreed and provided in the community, the patient must be offered alternative in-patient care.

We are also paying the mental illness specific grant to local authorities to enable them to improve the social care they provide for mentally ill people. The grant amounts to £31·4 milliion in 1992-93 supporting expenditure of £44·8 million. Next year, 1993-94, the grant will be £34·4 million supporting expenditure of £46·6 million, an increase of 9 per cent.

The Department's social services inspectorate is monitoring the impact of the mental illness specific grant and its first report has been issued.

Xenotransplantation

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment she has made of the potential dangers of xenotransplantation.

Mr. Sackville: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on 15 February at column 80.

Premature Births

Mrs. Jane Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the estimated average cost per child to her Department in terms of its after care and treatment of children born prematurely, weighing less than 1,500 grams, who develop retinopathy of prematurity to advanced stage 3 and who do not respond to treatment.

Mr. Sackville: This information is not available centrally.

Bone Marrow Treatment

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if she will list in full the facilities for bone marrow treatment within the NHS in London; and what plans she has for the future of such facilities;

(2) if she will provide additional funding to help secure the necessary treatment for sufferers of Batten's disease; and if she will make a statement;

(3) what steps she is taking to protect the bone marrow unit at the Westminster children's hospital; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Sackville: We expect health authorities, when deciding upon the allocation of resources in the national health service, to give proper consideration to funding appropriate treatment for patients suffering from Batten's disease.

The care of children who had already started treatment at the bone marrow transplant unit of the Westminster children's hospital will be transferred to the new Chelsea and Westminster hospital in the next few weeks. Alternative arrangements for treatment will be found for children not yet treated, who are suitable for transplantation and where matched donors have been identified and agreed.

There are a number of other facilities in London for bone marrow transplant treatment which include Great Ormond Street and Hammersmith hospitals. The provision of these facilities is a matter for local discussion between relevant professionals, health authorities and providers.

Executive Training Programmes

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will make a statement on (a) the content of her Department's executive training programmes, (b) the cost per year of these programmes in 1992-93 and 1993-94 and (c) her policy on the use of cosmetic courses for women hospital managers.

Dr. Mawhinney: The content of executive coaching consists of:

initial diagnostic interview;
up to 12 hours one to one sessions with a coach designed around individual needs;
a follow-up interview six months after completion of the coaching.

The average cost of the programme is £1,500 per person which compares favourably with other forms of management development.

Approximately £100,000 has been spent on the programme in 1992-93 with a second tranche of 45 women contracted to join the programme in 1993-94; the approximate cost is £67,500.

Ministerial policy on individual positive image sessions is that these will not be available through the women in the national health service management development programme.

Lewisham Hospital

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the cost of new office kitchen and waiting room facilities being prepared at Lewisham hospital for the chairman of Lewisham hospital NHS trust.

Mr. Sackville: The use of capital funds for the refurbishment of the site and facilities at Lewisham Hospital is a matter for local management. The hon. Member may wish to contact Sir Philip Harris, chairman of the Guy's and Lewisham national health service trust for details.

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she has now approved the establishing of the Lewisham hospital NHS trust.

Dr. Mawhinney: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has approved the establishment of the Lewisham hospital national health service trust, which will come into being on 1 April 1993.

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if she has now decided who is to be the chairman of the Lewisham hospital NHS trust;

(2) what are the terms of contract under which Sir Philip Harris has been offered the position of chairman of the proposed new Lewisham hospital NHS trust.

Dr. Mawhinney: Sir Philip Harris has been invited to serve as chairman from 21 March 1993 until 31 October 1995 under the normal rules.

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are the total start-up costs of the proposed new Lewisham hospital NHS trust.

Dr. Mawhinney: The national health service management executive has made available £206,000 for the expenditure incurred by the Lewisham unit during its shadow period.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Committee of the Regions

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what criteria will be used to select representatives of British local government to sit on the EC Committee of the Regions.

Mr. Garel-Jones: No final decisions have yet been taken, but clearly United Kingdom members on the Committee of the Regions should have a broad range of expertise in order to deal with the issues which the committee will address.

Korea

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will publish a précis of the non-proliferation treaty agreement covering the Korean peninsula; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Under the terms of the non-proliferation treaty both North and South Korea undertake not to manufacture or otherwise acquire nuclear weapons. The text of the separate joint North/South Korean declaration for a non-nuclear Korean peninsula has been deposited in the Library of the House. This declaration has not yet been implemented.

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of whether Team Spirit manoeuvres how being carried out in South Korea run counter to the spirit of the non-proliferation treaty; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad: Team Spirit is a routine defence training exercise, normally held annually, involving United States and Republic of Korea forces. It is misleading to try to link such exercises to the non-proliferation treaty and obligations arising therefrom.

Foreign Affairs Council

Mr. Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Esher (Mr. Taylor), 16 March, Official Report, columns 127-28, what were the voting figures recorded in the meeting of the Foreign Affairs Council held on 8 March.

Mr. Garel-Jones: There were no votes at the Foreign Affairs Council on 8 March.

Diplomatic Posts

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many British staff are employed in diplomatic posts in each of the member states of the European Community, with a separate number for each post.

Egypt (WENA Hotels)

Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations HM embassy in Egpt has made recently to the Egyptian authorities regarding the experiences in Egypt of the United Kingdom company WENA Hotels.

Mr. Douglas Hogg [holding answer 19 March 1993]: Her Majesty's ambassador discussed the affairs of WENA Hotels with the Egyptian Minister of Tourism on 27 January.

Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action he proposes to take to safeguard the interests in Egypt of the United Kingdom company WENA Hotels.

Mr. Douglas Hogg [holding answer, 19 March 1993]: We understand that WENA Hotels is taking its dispute with the Egyptian Hotels Company to arbitration. We are in close touch with WENA Hotels, its Egyptian lawyer and the US embassy in Cairo, and will be in touch with the Egyptian authorities as necessary should WENA Hotels experience further difficulties.

Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will discuss with the United States Government the experiences in Egypt of the United Kingdom company WENA Hotels and the interests of its British and American shareholders; and if he will make joint representations with the United States Government to the Egyptian Government.

Mr. Douglas Hogg [holding answer 19 March 1993]: We are in close touch with the US Embassy in Cairo on this matter. We understand that WENA Hotels is taking its dispute with the Egyptian Hotels Company to arbitration. We will be in touch with the Egyptian authorities as necessary, should WENA Hotels experience further difficulties.

NATIONAL FINANCE

11 Downing Street (Catering)

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 10 March, Official Report, column 576, how many outside contractors have been used for functions at 11 Downing street since 1987; if he will list them; and whether the contracts were put out to public tender.

Mr. Nelson: Information going back to 1987 is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. The contractors engaged to provide catering services for official functions at 11 Downing street are selected from an approved list of contractors who have the necessary security clearance. For security reasons, these contracts are not usually put out to public tender.

Council Tax

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many farms have been placed in each council tax band in each of the local authority areas of Wales.

Mr. Nelson: The information is not readily available and can be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Smoking

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the estimated number of smokers in the United Kingdom; and what are the total projected tax revenues from each tax applied to tobacco products in 1992-93.

Sir John Cope: Estimates for the numbers of smokers in Great Britain in 1990 indicate that there were around 15 million smokers.

Our latest estimate for total receipts from tobacco duties in 1992-93 is £6·1 billion. Within this total, the likely yield from cigarette duties (specific and ad valorem) is £5·6 billion; from cigars is £0·1 billion; from hand-rolling tobacco is £0·3 billion; and from other smoking and chewing tobacco is £0·£1 billion. Latest consumers' expenditure data suggest that the VAT yield from tobacco products is likely to be around £1·5 billion in 1992-93.

Value Added Tax

Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much he expects to raise from value added tax in each year from 1992-93 to 1995-96 levied on (a) industry's fuel costs, (b) domestic electricity supply, (c) domestic gas sales and (d) other domestic fuels.

Sir John Cope: Separate forecasts of value added tax yield from industrial fuel costs, domestic electricity supply, domestic gas sales and other fuels are not available. "The Financial Statement and Budget Report 1993-94" shows the estimated yield from applying value added tax to domestic fuel and power as zero in 1993-94, £950 million in 1994-95 and £2,300 million in 1995-96. There is no current estimate of revenue raised from applying value added tax to industrial fuel costs.

EC Directive

Mr. Haselhurst: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he intends to implement article 27 of the Council directive 92/50/EEC.

Mr. Portillo: The Government intend to implement Council directive 92/50/EEC as a whole by 1 July 1993, together with Council directive 89/665/EEC insofar as it is relevant, by means of legislation under section 2(2) of the European Communities Act 1972.

Finance (No. 2) Bill

Mr. Burns: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when the Finance (No. 2) Bill will be published.

Mr. Dorrell: The Finance (No. 2) Bill will be published on Wednesday 14 April.

GDP and Purchasing Power

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will provide for each county (a) a figure for gross domestic product per head and (b) a purchasing power standard per head compared with the EC average.

Mr. Nelson [holding answer 22 March 1993]: The latest available information relating to gross domestic product by county for 1989 was published in the November 1991 issue of "Economic Trends". Eurostat, in its "Rapid Reports" series on the regions, publishes estimates on purchasing power standards. The latest report to appear showing detail below regional level for 1989 was published in 1991. Copies of both publications are available in the House of Commons Library.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Research Expenditure

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what are the annual figures for spending by the Northern Ireland Office on commissioning research from the higher education sector for each year from 1989-90 to 1993-94.

Mr. Mates: The figures requested are as follows:

1989-90	366,642
1990-91	759,123
1991-92	1,079,305
1992-93	[1]1,015,527
1993-94	[1]597,469

[1] Estimate.

Religious Affiliations

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the annual cost of monitoring the religious affiliation of the employees of the Fire Authority for Northern Ireland.

Mr. Atkins: £25,000.

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the annual cost of monitoring the religious affiliation of the employees of the Standing Advisory Commission on Human Rights.

Mr. Mates: Monitoring of the religious affiliation of Northern Ireland civil service employees of the Standing Advisory Commission on Human Rights is undertaken centrally by the equal opportunities unit in the Department of Finance and Personnel. I therefore refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer I gave him on 23 March.

The cost of monitoring home civil service employees is negligible.

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the annual cost of monitoring the religious affiliation of the employees of the Probation Board for Northern Ireland.

Mr. Mates: I am informed by the Probation Board for Northern Ireland that, at current costs and based on current practice, it estimates, to the nearest £500, the annual cost to the board representing the input of staff to monitoring work in relation to religious affiliation, gender and disability, to be £4,500. The board is not able to disaggregate the respective proportions of the total accounted for by these three components.

Education

Mr. Peter Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what were the main proposals of the report commissioned from Coopers and Lybrand in 1986 into the operation of the Department of Education in Northern Ireland; what actions have been taken by the Department in light of its recommendations; and if he will publish the report.

Mr. Hanley: The internal top structure review of the Department of Education for Northern Ireland, carried out in 1986 by Coopers and Lybrand, recommended that: a "top management" support group be established; the finance and personnel functions of the Department be grouped into a single Division; a separate policy planning division be established; and the divisional structure of the Department should reflect the regional structure of education administration in Northern Ireland rather than the functional areas of educational activity.

All but the last of these recommendations were accepted and implemented.

The report was an internal administration document and will not be published.

Electricity Privatisation

Mr. Molyneaux: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he expects to complete the privatisation of the electricity supply industry in Northern Ireland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Atkins: It is the Government's intention to proceed straight away with the necessary preparations to allow Northern Ireland Electricity to be floated in the early summer.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Civil Appeals Office

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what is the procedure for complaints to the civil appeals office; and how these complaints are dealt with.

Mr. John M. Taylor: The chief clerk at the civil appeals office generally replies to formal complaints about the civil appeals office.

More complex matters are referred to the court administrator at the royal courts of justice to investigate.

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many complaints there have been in the last three years to the civil appeals office about erroneous advice given to members of the public.

Mr. John M. Taylor: Four complaints have been made to the civil appeals office in the last three years about erroneous advice given to members of the public.

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many complaints there were in 1990, 1991 and 1992 about the civil apeals office; and what was the subject matter of the complaints in each year.

Mr. John M. Taylor: There were 36 complaints about the civil appeals office in 1990, 32 in 1991, and 49 in 1992. The categories of subject matter were:

	1990	1991	1992
Listing	6	7	12
Judicial decision	14	11	18
Staff error	12	12	11
Erroneous advice	2	—	2
Other	2	2	6
	36	32	49

Of these, three were found to be justified in 1990, three in 1991 and five in 1992.

Cash Limits

Mr. Milligan: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what plans there are to change the cash limit for class X, vote 1—Administration of Justice: England and Wales.

Mr. John M. Taylor: The cash limit on class X, vote 1 will be reduced by £11,885,000 from £756,376,000 to £744,491,000. This reflects provision for current and capital grants to local authorities for magistrates courts which will not be required, largely because audited claims for the balance of 1991-92 expenditure, which are submitted and paid during 1992-93, have proved to be lower than expected.

Legal Aid

Mr. Stern: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what target his Department has set for reducing the rate of growth in the unit cost of legal aid cases.

Mr. John M. Taylor: The rapid rise in the unit cost of legal aid cases in recent years is a major cause for concern. Reducing the rate of growth in unit cost is one of my Department's top priorities. Our target is to contain the unit cost growth in legal aid remuneration so that by March 1996 it does not exceed the rate of inflation.

PRIME MINISTER

Government Hospitality Fund

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his answer, of 9 March, Official Report, column 517, if he will list the number and names of outside contractors used by the Government hospitality fund for official functions; how many and which caterers were used at official functions other than those arranged by the Government hospitality fund; and, in each case, whether the contract was put out to tender.

The Prime Minister: There are three caterers (Crown Catering Group, Leiths Good Food and Ring and Brymer) employed by the Government hospitality fund for functions at 10 Downing street. Only one caterer (Lady Blennerhassett) is employed for official functions other than those arranged by the Government hospitality fund. For every GHF function at 10 Downing street, quotations are called for from the approved caterers.

Royal Prerogative

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Prime Minister which clauses of the European Communities (Amendment) Bill affect the royal prerogative; and if he will list the extent to which each of those clauses limits the current extent of the royal prerogative.

The Prime Minister [holding answer 22 March 1993]: As appears from the Order Paper, the Queen's consent to the Bill is to be signified on Third Reading. Her Majesty's consent has been sought because of clause 2 of the European Communities (Amendment) Bill. That clause limits the exercise of the royal prerogative in foreign affairs by preventing the United Kingdom from moving to the third stage of economic and monetary union until the move has been approved by Act of Parliament.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Paving Stones (Sales)

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will introduce legislation to provide that when sales of paving stones take place to a dealer the vehicle registration number and driver's name and address are required to be recorded with other details of the transaction and that such records are available for police inspection; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Charles Wardle: My right hon. and leaned Friend has no plans to do so. If the hon. Member is aware of any particular problem, my right hon. and learned Friend would be grateful if he would bring it to his attention.

Immigration (Carriers' Liability)

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, how many prosecutions of airlines under the Immigration (Carriers' Liability) Act 1987 have taken place in each year since its entry into force.

Mr. Jack: The Act creates no criminal offence, and therefore could not give rise to prosecutions. Proceedings against four carriers for the recovery of charges under the Act were initiated in the civil courts in 1990. The cases were settled out of court.

Police Complaints Authority

Sir John Wheeler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what changes he has made in the membership of the Police Complaints Authority.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Brigadier John Pownall will be retiring from his post as deputy chairman of the Police Complaints Authority on 31 July this year, having accepted my invitation to delay his departure for three months beyond his current term of appointment. I wish to take this opportunity to thank him for his service to the authority. As the last of its original members, Brigadier Pownall has made a distinguished contribution to the establishment of the authority as an accepted part of the police complaints system.

Mr. John Cartwright, the former Labour and Social Democrat Member for Woolwich, who has been a member of the authority since October last year, has accepted my invitation to succeed to the vacant deputy chairman post on 1 August.

Previous Convictions

Lady Olga Maitland: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has had regarding the Criminal Justice Act 1991 in relation to the ability of the courts to take into account all previous convictions when sentencing a defendant.

Mr. Jack: A substantial number of representations have been received from right hon. and hon. Members, sentencers, practitioners and members of the public about the sentencing provisions of the Criminal Justice Act, many of them concentrating on section 29.

All representations will receive careful consideration, and my right hon. and learned Friend made clear to this House on 2 March in column 147, that he is prepared to re-examine the 1991 Act in due course.

Car Crime

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent representations he has received about the levels of car crime; what were the figures for such crimes in each of the last four quarters for which figures are available; what conclusions he has drawn from the most recent monthly figures; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jack: We continue to receive many representations about car crime, which is rightly a matter of continuing concern to the public. The latest period for which recorded car crime statistics have been published is April-June 1992, and these figures are as follows, together with those for the three preceding quarters:

	Theft from	Theft of	Total Car Crime
3rd Quarter 1991	220,536	141,324	361,860
4th Quarter 1991	235,411	145,333	380,744
1st Quarter 1992	240,399	147,840	388,239
2nd Quarter 1992	234,912	137,734	372,646
Total	931,258	572,231	1,503,489

The figures for April-June 1992 show a reduction in car crime of some 2 per cent. on the corresponding quarter of 1991. Looking at the change over a longer period, car crime rose by 7 per cent. in the 12 months to June 1992 compared with the previous 12 months, whereas in 12 months to June 1991 it had risen by 23 per cent. The figures therefore suggest that car crime is rising at a significantly lower rate than before.

The themes of Car Crime Prevention Year continue to play a significant part in encouraging action to combat car crime. The advisory committee which I have set up to further inform policy development in this area recently met for the second time. In addition, we are actively promoting schemes such as the secured car parks initiative.

Drugs and Health Education

Mr. Rathbone: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to publish the report on drugs and health education in schools from the Advisory Council on the Misuse of Drugs.

Mr. Jack: We hope to publish the report, which is entitled "Drug Education in Schools: the Need for New Impetus", in June.

Young Offenders, London

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many young offenders in the Metropolitan police district were (a) cautioned by the police and (b) prosecuted; and what orders were made in respect of them in the last three available years.

Mr. Jack [holding answer 23 March 1993]: The information available centrally is given in the table.

Police Doctors

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department who is responsible for receiving and investigating complaints against police doctors.

Mr. Charles Wardle [holding answer 22 March 1993]: Complaints against police surgeons are normally made to the chief officer of the force concerned in the first instance. Where the complaint relates to specific matters of professional misconduct, it may be referred to the General Medical Council.

EDUCATION

Lip Reading

Mr. Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what representations he has received seeking an amendment to schedule 2 to the Further and Higher Education Act 1992, chapter 13, to allow lip-reading classes to be funded by the further education funding councils; and how he has responded.

Mr. Boswell: My right hon. Friend has received a number of representations about the arrangements under the Further and Higher Education Act 1992 for the provision of lip-reading classes for adults. Schedule 2 to the Act specifies the scope of the duty on the Further Education Funding Councils to secure further education for adults, including courses in lip reading and other communication skills. Under section 11 of the Act, LEAs' duty is to secure the availability of such provision where it does not fall within schedule 2. The requirement on both the funding councils and LEAs is to ensure that adequate provision is available, in their respective spheres of responsibility.

Student Grants

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he intends to increase mandatory student grants to take account of the additional expenditure on gas and electricity bills due to the imposition of value added tax on domestic fuel.

Mr. Boswell: It is my right hon. Friend's policy to review annually the overall level of mandatory support available to students through the basic grant and loan, in the light of forecast cost movements. Any increase is applied only to the loans element and to the supplementary allowances within the award, leaving the basic grant fixed at its present cash level. The rates for the 1993-94 academic year will be announced in due course.

Teachers' Salaries

Mr. Douglas French: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what percentage of each education authority's budget is spent on teachers' salaries.

Mr. Forth [pursuant to his reply, Official Report, 15 March, c. 19-20]: The table referring to the percentage of local education authorities' budgets spent on teachers' salaries should have included a figure of 56 per cent. for 1990-91 for Hereford and Worcester and not for Herefordshire as stated.

Education Expenditure

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will list details of funds expended per pupil in each local education authority in 1991-92; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Forth [pursuant to his reply, Official Report, 9 March, c. 520-21]: The table referring to unit costs in local education authorities should have included a figure of £1,520 for 1990-91 for Hereford and Worcester and not for Herefordshire as stated.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Research

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will give the annual total costs of the four largest European science and social science research projects.

Mr. Jackson: Several of the largest European collaborative science organisations fund a variety of projects and programmes from within a single core budget. Available information on specific projects, covering 1993 in-year capital and research costs, indicates that the largest research projects will be four European Space Agency programmes, as follows:

	1993 expenditure
Programme	£ million
Columbus
European element for International Space Station; development of Columbus Polar Platform; studies for future European Space Station	330
Ariane
Satellite Launcher	643
Hermes
Manned space flight study	159
ERS
European Remote Sensing Satellite	115

TRANSPORT

Concessionary Fares

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list all the local authorities in England and Wales which operate concessionary fare schemes for travel on the railways, indicating which of them operate schemes for (a) the elderly, (b) the disabled, (c) the blind and (d) young people.

Mr. Freeman: I am placing the information in the Library of the House, and I have sent the hon. Gentleman a copy direct.

Channel Tunnel Rail Link

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what changes in design or alignment he expects over those sections of the newly proposed fast rail route from London to the channel tunnel following an alignment and design already announced; and if he will give the reason for each such change.

Mr. Freeman: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport made a statement on the rail link on 22 March. Details of the route for consultation, the changes made in refining the route and the reasons for the changes are contained in the Union Railways report and other material deposited in the Vote Office.

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will estimate the approximate capital sum, at 1993 prices, which he expects will be required to construct the fast channel rail link from St. Pancras to Cheritan; and by what means he expects a return on such sums to be achieved.

Mr. Freeman: The estimated cost of the link is about £2·5 billion, towards which some Government support will be available in respect of domestic passenger benefits. Main sources of income will be fares, track charges and ancillary revenues.

London Crossrail Project

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport by what means he expects private capital invested into the London crossrail project to make a return comparable to that obtainable from other forms of lending.

Mr. Norris: The re-examination announced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his Budget statement of 16 March will be directed particularly at means to make the project attractive to the private sector.

Bridge Strengthening

Mr. Norman Hogg: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what progress has been made on rail bridge strengthening; when the programme will be concluded; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: I understand that the British Railways Board does not currently have any specific programme of rail bridge strengthening.

Mr. Norman Hogg: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what progress has been made on the road bridge strengthening programme; when it will be completed; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what progress has been made by local authorities in their road bridge strengthening programme; when the programme will be completed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: Heavier lorries, of 40 tonnes gross weight and 11·5 tonnes drive axle, will be allowed on roads in the United Kingdom from 1 January 1999. On trunk roads and motorways in England, some 8,000 structures are being assessed to determine whether they can safely carry this additional load. Strengthening is being carried out where necessary as part of a co-ordinated and cost-effective programme of road and bridge improvements.

Good progress is being made. All assessments are planned to be completed by the end of 1995, at a total cost of about £50 million. All strengthening is planned to be completed by the end of 1998, at a total cost of about £200 million.

Local highway authorities in England are being encouraged, through the transport supplementary grant system, to undertake a similar programme on structures for which they are responsible and they will be asked to include a progress report in this year's transport policies and programme submissions.

Arrangements are also being made for a programme of inspection and strengthening of road bridges owned by British Rail and other transport undertakings.

Road Schemes (North-West)

Mr. Matthew Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what progress he has made with plans for the link road from the M57 to the A565; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: This is Sefton metropolitan borough council's scheme, and its progress is a matter for the council. I understand that a public inquiry was held recently into the council's planning application.

Mr. Matthew Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to upgrade the A570 Ormskirk to Southport road; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: We have two schemes in the national programme; the A570 Ormskirk bypass and the A570 Scarisbrick-Pinfold bypass. We expect to consult the public about possible route options later this year.

Mr. Matthew Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what road schemes are (a) under construction and (b) planned but not under construction in the north-west; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: The major (over £1 million) schemes in our trunk roads programme are as follows:

Schemes on non-trunk roads are the responsibility of the region's 18 local highway authorities.

Road Schemes (Compulsory Purchase)

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what are the rules for assessing compensation for property compulsory purchased for road schemes; what allowance is made for negative equity; in how many cases in the last two years compulsory purchase orders have been made in respect of property which is subject to negative equity; and what advice is given to owners of such property by his Department.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: The long-standing principle of the statutory compensation code is that the owner of property subject to compulsory purchase is compensated on the basis of its current value on the open market, discounting any depreciation or enhancement attributable to the scheme for which the property is needed. Residential owner-occupiers normally qualify in addition for a home loss payment of 10 per cent. of market value, up to a maximum of £15,000.

I am aware of, and fully understand, the concern that in current housing market conditions there could be cases where compensation offered fell short of the mortgage debt. No such cases have arisen. However, where people fear they may be affected in this way in future as a consequence of forthcoming schemes, we are inviting them to write to us with full details of their situation. This will help me, my right hon. Friend and my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Planning, who has the main responsibility for the compensation code, to assess the position and consider what action might be needed.

Catalytic Converters

Mrs. Wise: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what studies he has made of the different effectiveness of catalytic converters in reducing emissions as between long journeys and the short journeys more typical of urban travel; and with what result.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: The Transport Research Laboratory, the Warren Spring laboratory and the Motor Industry Research Association have all been studying emission rates from in-service vehicles equipped with catalysts, and their final report is expected by mid-1993. Preliminary data indicate that a catalyst has very little effect for the first kilometre. For longer journeys, however, average emissions of carbon monoxide, hydrocarbons, oxides of nitrogen, and carbon dioxide are reduced by:

(a) for trips of 4 km, 62, 65, 58 and 15 per cent. respectively against journeys of 1km; and

(b) for trips of 11 km, 76, 85, 62 and 37 per cent. respectively.

For trips beyond 11 km, further reductions are minimal.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Infra-red Detectors

Mr. Steen: To ask the Chairman of the Accommodation and Works Committee what savings are expected as a result of the fitting of infra-red detectors in the Palace of Westminster; and how such savings have been calculated.

Mr. Ray Powell: This is a matter for the Serjeant at Arms.

Anti-tank Missiles

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if Her Majesty's Government have decided to co-operate with European partners in a new anti-tank missile programme.

Mr. Aitken: The United Kingdom is continuing to participate in the development of third generation anti-tank guided missile programmes, known as TRIGAT, in collaboration with European partners.

Polly Peck

Mr. Rogers: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what arrangements were made by his Department concerning the interests of Polly Peck plc and the Turkish Government, in relation to shipping movements in the Mediterranean in the years 1981 to 1989.

Mr. Aitken: I am unaware of any such arrangements. If the hon. Gentleman provides more details, I shall be happy to investigate further.

Britannia Royal Naval College

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has regarding the Britannia royal naval college in Dartmouth.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The Britannia royal naval college, Dartmouth, provides new entry naval officers with a broad view of the naval profession, preparing them for further training in the fleet or elsewhere. While a study is under way examining the future of all seven naval training establishments, there are no current plans to alter the role of the college.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Sellafield

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen), on 15 March, Official Report, column 50, if he will set out those matters relating to British Nuclear Fuels' operations and Sellafield which he does not regard as being matters for the company in respect of answers to parliamentary questions.

Mr. Eggar: In broad terms, questions directly relating to Government policy are matters upon which Ministers answer in Parliament, while questions relating to the day-to-day affairs of a particular company are for that company. Questions are considered individually as they arise. Those about the functions of particular buildings at Sellafield should normally be addressed to the company.

Assisted Area Status

Mr. Robert Ainsworth: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what are the consequences for an area which loses assisted area status with regard to objective 2 status and therefore access to European regional development fund and European social fund funding from the European Community.

Mr. Sainsbury: There are no necessary consequences. Eligibility for objective 2 of the structural funds does not depend on national assisted area status.

The eligibility of areas for objective 2 will be reviewed after revised structural funds regulations have been adopted by the Council of Ministers, probably this summer.

Most European social fund assistance is available without geographical restriction.

International Atomic Energy Authority

Mr. Parry: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will place in the Library a copy of the report by the British representative on the International Atomic Energy Authority's meeting in Vienna in February; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: Proceedings of the board of governors meeting in February were held in private, as set out in the rules of procedure of the board of governors.

Aerospace Programmes

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what was his Department's expenditure on aerospace research in the last financial year; what is the planned expenditure for the current and next three financial years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Sainsbury: Expenditure on civil aerospace research and technology demonstration was £16·4 million during financial year 1991-1992 and during the current year expenditure is forecast at £19·2 million. Information on expenditure planned for the coming three financial years is published in "The Government's Expenditure Plans", a copy of which is available in the Library.

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will set out the aerospace programmes that have received launch aid payments in the last five years; the value of the launch aid in each case; and if he will make a statement on the Government's future plans for aerospace launch aid.

Mr. Sainsbury: The following aerospace programmes have received launch aid over the last five years:

Programme	Launch aid made available £ million	Total launch aid paid to date £ million
Airbus A320	249·3	249·3
EH101	60·0	57·4
Airbus A330/340	447·1	447·1

The Government will consider any future application for launch aid on its merits.

Strategic Technology Acquisition Plan

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he plans to publish his Department's aviation committee's report, "The National Strategic Technology Acquisition Plan;" and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Sainsbury: The DTI aviation committee's national strategic technology acquisition plan for aeronautics contains commercially sensitive information and is, therefore, not available for publication.

Electricity

Mr. Dover: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what information is available on the comparative costs of electricity produced from (a) opencast coal, (b) deep mined coal, (c) oil, (d) gas, (e) wind power, (f) wave power, (g) tidal barrages, (h) hydro-power, (i) nuclear power and (j) imported coal.

Mr. Eggar: Evidence on comparative generation costs, received by the coal review, has been placed in the Library of the House. Additionally the report of the renewable energy advisory group, published by my Department last December as energy paper No. 60, contains estimates of costs for a number of renewable sources of generation.

Auditing

Mr. Ronnie Campbell: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on current auditing procedures and practices in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: I refer the hon. Member to the first annual reports of the five recognised supervisory bodies and the Auditing Practices Board's first review of its activities, copies of which have been placed in the Library.

Mr. Ronnie Campbell: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what consideration he is giving to the establishment of a Government regulatory body to ensure adequate standards of auditing and compliance to United Kingdom and European law by accounting practices operating in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: The new regulatory regime for company auditors in part II of the Companies Act 1989, which came into force on 1 October 1991, places responsibility for the supervision of auditors upon the five recognised supervisory bodies. I have no plans to alter those arrangements.

Japanese Dividends

Mr. Leighton: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what was the value of dividends repatriated by Japanese companies operating in the United Kingdom to Japan in the last 10 years.

Mr. Nelson: I have been asked to reply.

The value of dividends remitted to Japan by Japanese companies operating in the United Kingdom is given in the table for the latest 10 years for which information is available.

HEALTH

Leighton Hospital, Crewe

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what role her Department has played in the decisions relating to the consequences of the overspend at Leighton hospital, Crewe; and if she will make a statement.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what discussions have been held with the chairman of Merseyside regional health authority about the overspend for Leighton hospital, Crewe.

Mr. Sackville: Discussions have taken place between the Mid Cheshire hospitals trust, the National Health Service Management Executive and Mersey regional health authority. The trust will meet its financial obligations at the end of this year. The trust is discussing with Crewe health authority the possibility of additional funding to enhance existing services.

Cervical Screening

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will make a statement upon the effect of the new general practitioner regime on the promotion of cervical screening.

Dr. Mawhinney: There has been no change in the arrangements for target payments to general practitioners for cervical cytology. GPs receive target payments for reaching either 50 per cent. coverage of women in the target population (the lower target) or 80 per cent. coverage (the higher target).

Over 90 per cent. of GPs in England and Wales are achieving the targets and over 70 per cent. the higher target.

Mr. Sackville: The number of conceptions to women aged under 20 in England and Wales during 1990, which resulted in live births, stillbirths or legal abortions were 115,055. This represents a rate of 69·0 per 1,000 women in the age group 15 to 19. Data for 1991 and 1992 are not yet available. Comparable data on numbers of conceptions in a calender year are not available for Scotland or Northern Ireland. Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many children in each of the last three years born in Lambeth were registered without the name of the father; and what percentage of births each year this represents.

Mr. Sackville: In 1989, there were 753 live births outside marriage solely registered by the mother in the London borough of Lambeth. This represented 16·8 per cent. of all 1989 live births in the borough. Equivalent figures for 1990 and 1991 were 721 and 723 live births respectively. This represented 16·6 per cent. of all live births in the borough for both 1990 and 1991.

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what number and percentage of children born in Lambeth in each of the last three years were born of parents who were not married.

Mr. Sackville: In 1989, there were 2,184 live births outside marriage in the London borough of Lambeth. This represented 48·7 per cent. of all 1989 live births in the borough. Hospital Grades

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when the results of her Department's survey of the ethnic make-up of each hospital grade will be published.

Dr. Mawhinney: Information on the ethnic origin of nurses, midwives, senior and general managers will be collected centrally from September 1993, followed by all other staff groups in September 1994. Results will be available in autumn 1994 and autumn 1995 respectively. In order to provide a general picture the Department is currently conducting a "snapshot" survey of the ethnic origin of all employees in a sample of provider units. Subject to the quality of data supplied, results will be available in the autumn.

Hepatitis B

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is her estimate of the percentage of doctors who have had Hepatitis B vaccinations.

Dr. Mawhinney: This information is not available centrally. Independent studies indicate that the number of doctors immunised against Hepatitis B varies from 50 per cent. of those practising to a much higher figure—up to 90 per cent.—among surgeons who are at a greater risk from transmission of the disease.

Hypothermia

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many deaths were attributed to hypothermia in each of the last five years; and what is the projected number of such deaths in the coming two years.

Mr. Sackville: The number of deaths (a) with hypothermia as the underlying cause of death and (b) with any mention of hypothermia on the death certificate, England and Wales, 1987-91 is shown in the table:

Year	Underlying cause	Mentions
1987	269	559
1988	194	440
1989	166	372
1990	152	368
1991	249	534

Note: The information for 1992 is not yet available. The projected number of deaths from hypothermia is not calculated.

Nurses (Community Work)

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans she has to make it possible for experienced hospital nurses to work in the community in accordance with paragraph 27 of "Making London Better".

Mr. Sackville: The London implementation group and Thames regions will be discussing retraining arrangements with training providers, as the transfer of hospital nurses to community and primary care nursing is best handled at local level.

Newbury

Mr. Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are the latest available estimates from the Registrar General of Populations of those aged 17 years and over, plus 63 per cent. of those aged 16 years, for the parliamentary constituency of Newbury; and what are the equivalent electoral registration figures.

Mr. Sackville: There are 81,939 parliamentary electors on the 1993 register for the Newbury constituency. Population estimates are not available for parliamentary constituencies.

Speech and Language Therapy

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many speech and language therapy posts cover special schools within each district health authority in England; how many posts were vacant at the latest available date; and what assessment she has made of the extent of problems in recruitment to speech and language therapy posts.

Dr. Mawhinney [holding answer 23 March 1993]: Information on the number of speech and language therapy posts covering special schools are not available centrally. In 1991 the number of whole-time equivalent speech therapists employed in the national health service in England was 2,979, an increase of 57 per cent. since 1982. The vacancy rate in funded posts has fallen from 11·8 per cent. in 1990 to 6·8 per cent. in 1992.

Ms Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many housing benefit internal reviews were received by each borough in Cleveland during 1990, 1991 and 1992; how many review boards were held by each borough during the period; and how many (a) social security appeal tribunals and (b) medical appeal tribunals were held for the county in this period.

Mr. Burt: The information available is in the tables.

The following figures have been provided by the local authorities concerned:

Local authority	April 1990 to April 1991		April 1991 to April 1992
	Housing benefit internal reviews carried out	Housing benefit review boards held	Housing benefit internal reviews carried out	Housing benefit review boards held
Hartlepool	1,500	20	64	12
Langbaurgh	137	11	102	12
Middlesbrough	345	15	41	17
Stockton on Tees	182	8	30	4

The following figures have been provided by the Independent Tribunal Service, and cover the county as a whole:

	January to December 1990	January to December 1991	January to December 1992
Medical appeal tribunals	74	76	124
Social security appeal tribunals	[1] [2]215	[2]402	493

[1] Figures available from April to December 1990 only.

[2] These figures including some cases heard at Hartlepool social security appeal tribunal which did not emanate from the county of Cleveland.

Benefits Statistics

Mr. Robert Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will give details of the total annual expenditure on benefits for people in employment, broken down into (a) family credit, (b) income support, (c) housing benefit and (d) community charge benefit for the last available year.

Mr. Burt: The latest available information shows that, at May 1991, the annual expenditure was:

	£ million
Family credit	566
Income support	480
Housing benefit	490
Community charge benefit	110

Housing Benefit

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the average time being taken to process housing benefit claims in the Chelmsford local authority area; what powers he has to intervene where a local authority fails to deliver an adequate service in processing housing benefit; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Burt: This Department is responsible for the scope and structure of the housing benefit scheme, but the day to day administration is the resonsibility of individual local authorities. Quality of service is a local matter, as for all local authority services. Ministers and the departmental accounting officer are involved if the statutory requirements of the housing benefit scheme are not being implemented or if central Government funds are not being properly administered or accounted for.

Information on the average length of time taken to process a housing benefit claim is not available. However, during 1991-92, Chelmsford borough council processed 11 per cent of all claims for housing benefit within 14 days of receipt of all the necessary information.

Social Fund

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security for the current financial year, how many grants and how many loans were awarded from the social fund; and what was the average amount in each category for the Lewisham district office.

Mr. Scott: The administration of the social fund is a matter for Mr. Michael Bichard, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member, and a copy will be placed in the Library.

Letter from Michael Bichard to Ms Joan Ruddock, dated 23 March 1993:

As Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency, it is my responsibility to answer questions about relevant operational matters. I am therefore replying to your recent Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Social Security about awards from the Social Fund in Lewisham and Brixton District.

Details of the number of grants and loans awarded for Lewisham and Brixton District for the period 1 April 1992 to 28 February 1993, the latest for which figures are available, are in the Library. The average amounts of awards in this period are £378 for grants, £274 for budgeting loans and £93 for crisis loans.

I hope you find this reply helpful. A copy of this letter will appear in the Official Report and a copy will be placed in the Library.

Disability Living Allowance

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many disability living allowance claims have gone to review during the last year; and in how many reviews the claim has been allowed.

Mr. Scott: The administration of disability living allowance is a matter for Mr. Michael Bichard, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member, and a copy will be placed in the Library.

Letter from Mr. Michael Bichard to Dr. Tony Wright, dated 23 March 1993:

As Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency, it is my responsibility to answer questions about relevant operational matters. I am therefore replying to the points raised in your recent Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Social Security asking how many Disability Living Allowance (DLA) claims have gone to review during the last year; and in how many reviews the claim has been allowed.

A customer can request a review on any grounds within 3 months of the original decision; outside this period, a review can still be requested but on limited grounds, for example where the Adjudication Officer has been ignorant of a fact which would have affected entitlement or where there is an award of benefit and the customers's condition has changed. Generally speaking if a customer is dissatisfied with the original decision on his claim, then a review request is likely to be received within 3 months. I assume from the wording of your question, that it is this category with which you are particularly concerned.

Between February 1992 and the end of February 1993 a total of nearly 81,500 reviews both within and outside 3 months have been received. Of decisions given on these applications almost 22,000 related to reviews requested within 3 months of the original decision notification; and nearly 9,600 were in the customers favour.

All figures are provisional and rounded and may be subject to amendment.

Finally, I hope you find this reply helpful. A copy of this letter will appear in the Official Report and a copy will also be placed in the Library.

SCOTLAND

Contaminated Land

Mr. Kynoch: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he intends to announce his proposals for registers of land subject to contaminative uses under section 143 of the Environmental Protection Act 1990; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang: I have considered carefully the comments made on our proposals to introduce public registers of land which may be contaminated under section 143 of the Environmental Protection Act 1990. In consultation with my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment, I have concluded that introducing such registers would not achieve the environmental objectives for which they were designed. I do not therefore intend to proceed with their introduction.

Our aim is to improve the environment; to ensure that pollution is properly tackled; and that, where possible, contaminated land is brought back into good use. Registers were intended to facilitate this. However, in practice they have been perceived as introducing an unfair and unacceptable degree of blight and uncertainty into an already subdued property market. This additional loss of market confidence threatens in turn to undermine the investment needed for land reclamation and urban regeneration and, in so doing, to increase the pressure for development on greenfield land.

I remain committed to our underlying environmental objectives, but intend to find a way forward that encourages a responsible partnership of private and public sector interests in identifying, assessing, and then dealing with contaminated land as appropriate. I therefore intend to look beyond registers, with their focus on identifying possible problems, at possible solutions. Such an approach will help reduce market anxieties and encourage the pragmatic co-operation through which I believe we can bring contaminated land in Scotland back into more widespread and beneficial use.

As a first step, I therefore intend to initiate a wide-ranging review of the underlying issues. Initially we will examine the current powers and responsibilities of public authorities; thereafter we will consider wider issues such as the options for identifying, assessing and treating contaminated land and the regulatory burden on the private sector and mechanisms for recovering the costs of such rehabilitation. In this, I will liaise closely with my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment and, in Scotland, with Scottish Enterprise and Highlands and Islands, Enterprise.

My aim will be to ensure effective arrangements, both to remove the threats posed by contaminated land and to take advantage of opportunities such land offers for regeneration; to ensure a better understanding by all concerned of the ways in which that can be achieved; and to ensure restored confidence in the viability of our approach to this important environmental issue. In the meantime, public authorities in Scotland will continue to exercise their existing duties and powers to safeguard public health and the environment; including the provision of information on land as appropriate.

ENVIRONMENT

Compulsory Competitive Tendering

15. Mr. Riddick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will extend the range of local services put out to compulsory competitive tendering.

19. Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on compulsory competitive tendering for white collar services.

Mr. Robin Squire: Yes. My right hon. and learned Friend announced last November details of the Government's decision to extend compulsory competitive tendering to a wide range of local authority professional and corporate services. Arrangements for implementation are now being discussed with the local authority associations and others.

Mr. David Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will initiate statutory action against the London borough of Lambeth for failing to comply with compulsory competitive tendering legislation.

Mr. Robin Squire: My Department has today served five notices on Lambeth under section 19A of the Local Government Planning and Land Act 1980 and section 13 of the Local Government Act 1988. These notices relate to possible failure to keep true and fair accounts for work carried out by the authority through its direct labour organisation and failure to submit to my right hon. and learned Friend statements showing that the required financial objectives in respect of this work have been met.

The notices require the authority to respond to the matters concerned by 30 April 1993. My right hon. and learned Friend will consider, in the light of Lambeth's responses, whether he should proceed to give directions under the Acts.

Council Tax

16. Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the levels of council tax for a band D property in Shropshire and in Powys.

Mr. Redwood: The average headline band D council tax set in Shropshire is £570. The average set in Powys is £304. As my hon. Friend will be aware, these amounts are not comparable because of the different valuation bands and local government finance arrangements applying in Wales and England.

House Building

17. Mr. Skinner: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the latest figures for house building for 1992-93 in the public sector; and what plans he has to increase local authority dwellings.

Mr. Baldry: Housing associations are now the main providers of social housing through new build, renovation of existing dwellings and a whole range of other measures, including those announced as part of the autumn statement. An extra 66,000 housing association homes supported by Housing Corporation grants will be made available to new tenants during the financial year 1992-93.

The Government see the primary tasks of local authorities as to manage effectively their large stocks of council housing and to enable others to provide new housing.

Urban Policy

20. Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on his plans for future initiatives on urban policy.

26. Mr. Bill Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on his plans for future initiatives on urban policy.

Mr. Howard: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave earlier to the hon. Member for Lewisham, West (Mr. Dowd).

Housing Associations

21. Mr. Barron: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what assessment he has made as to the likely effect on the building of houses by housing associations of the reduction of housing association grants.

Sir George Young: Increasing the private finance input into housing association schemes enables us to produce significantly greater numbers of new homes with the available public resources. The reduction in the average housing association grant rate for rented schemes from 72 per cent. in 1992-93 to 67 per cent. in 1993-94 was achieved through lower costs without any significant impact on the affordability of rents implied. Associations put forward more than four and a half times the number of schemes that could be supported by the resources available for next year. This clearly demonstrates their confidence in being able successfully to undertake schemes at the grant rates available, and to achieve the higher output that we have sought.

22. Mr. Bryan Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what assessment he has made of the effect of the percentage of housing association grants in 1995 on the level of housing association rents.

23. Mr. Hutton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received about housing association grant rates.

Sir George Young: The Government have not yet taken any decision on grant rates for housing association development beyond those for 1993-94, but have made clear their objective to increase the proportion of private finance in new housing association schemes. Final decisions will be taken on grant rates for 1994-95 and beyond when we have assessed the likely impact on rents and on associations' ability to raise private finance. This work is currently being undertaken. Ministers receive representations throughout the year on rates of housing association grant from many organisations, including the National Federation of Housing Associations, individual housing associations and other national and local bodies.

25. Mr. Colin Shepherd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many homes have been bought by housing associations as part of the special scheme announced in the autumn statement.

32. Lady Olga Maitland: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many extra houses have been bought by housing associations since the autumn statement.

Sir George Young: By 12 March 12,611 purchases had been completed. We expect this total to rise to almost 18,000 by the end of the month.

35. Dr. Liam Fox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he expects the Government's target of 153,000 housing association homes over the years 1992-93 to 1994-95 to be reached.

Mr. Baldry: We expect our target to be exceeded comfortably, due to the additional funds made available this year in the autumn statement, the highly competitive prices currently being achieved by housing associations and the increased contribution from private finance which enables us to provide more units for a given amount of public funding.

Council House Repairs

24. Mr. Dickens: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he has taken to ensure that council tenants can get repairs carried out quickly.

Mr. Baldry: The Housing and Urban Development Bill includes provisions for a new right to repair to enable council tenants to get small urgent repairs affecting their health, safety and security, carried out by an alternative contractor, if the first contractor does not complete work within a specified time.

Irish Sea and Liverpool Bay (Pollution)

27. Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on pollution in the Irish sea and Liverpool bay.

Mr. Maclean: The four reports of the Irish sea study group in 1990 on the environmental health and management of the Irish sea suggested that the general health of the Irish sea was similar to comparable semi-enclosed seas. The United Kingdom and Irish Governments have set up a co-ordination group to review research and monitoring programmes and advise on priorities for further work to improve our knowledge of environmental issues affecting the Irish sea.

Community Charge Collection

28. Mr. Thomason: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the 10 councils with the worst community charge collection figures.

Mr. Redwood: Most authorities have made a determined effort to collect the community charge and by the end of December English authorities had collected 76 per cent. of their budgeted income for this financial year. But some authorities are way behind. The worst collection rate this year is to be found in Hackney, only 45·5 per cent., followed by Langbaurgh, Islington, Middlesbrough, Plymouth, Brent, Teesdale, Lambeth, Camden and Harlow.

Energy Conservation

29. Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what action he proposes to take to encourage energy conservation in domestic properties.

Mr. Maclean: My Department will continue to promote energy efficiency in housing through a combination of publicity and information programmes, targeted Government grants and regulatory measures.

Housing Subsidy (Macclesfield)

30. Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations have been received by his Department from Macclesfield borough council about the level of housing subsidy under the allocation of resources in the revenue support grant.

Mr. Baldry: Macclesfield borough council made no representations to my Department during last autumn's consultation exercise on the draft housing revenue account subsidy determinations for 1993-94.

The chairman of the council's housing services committee wrote to my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Planning on 22 February, about Macclesfield council's entitlement to housing revenue account subsidy for 1993-94. I have replied on my hon. Friend's behalf and have sent a copy of my letter to the hon. Member.

Private Rented Sector

31. Mr. Merchant: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will examine ways of providing further encouragement to the private rented sector.

Mr. Baldry: We have already taken a number of steps to encourage this sector, but we are keen to explore further initiatives to stimulate additional growth.

Local Authority Debt

33. Mr. Peter Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the current debt burden of (a) the London borough of Harlow, (b) Newcastle upon Tyne metropolitan district, (c) Wellingborough district council and (d) Huntingdonshire; and what proportion of their respective budgets is attributable to interest payments on those debt burdens.

Mr. Robin Squire: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East on Tuesday 23 March 1993.

34. Mr. David Martin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement about the level of council debt.

Mr. Robin Squire: At 31 December 1992, the total outstanding debt of local authorities in England stood at £37·5 billion. We will continue to encourage authorities to reduce their outstanding debt using sums which they have set aside for this purpose.

Market Testing

36. Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what new proposals he has to alter the conditions for bids for market testing in his Department.

Mr. Baldry: Bids for market testing will be subject to the normal tendering procedures that pertain for all procurements undertaken by my Department. The Department will ensure that in-house bids are entered on the same terms as those from the private sector.

East London River Crossing

37. Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will reconsider his approval of the route for the southern approach to the east London river crossing.

Mr. Baldry: No.

Open Spaces Society

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what grant has been made available to the Open Spaces Society in each of the last three years from his Department; what grant will be given for 1993-94; what criteria have been used in deciding the level of grant for the forthcoming year; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maclean: Over the past three years the Open Spaces Society has received grants from the Department's special grants programme as follows:

1990-91	£37,285
1991-92	39,280
1992-93	40,150

The society was advised that 1992-93 would be the final year of the latest agreed period of funding. Their application for further support, from the new environmental action fund, therefore competed for limited resources with the many others we received.

Given the large number of worthy voluntary groups eligible for support from the fund, it would not be right for any one group to expect full support for an unlimited period. However, the society's work in protecting common land and town and village greens is highly regarded by the Department and I have therefore decided that the society should receive some further support for another three years towards its work in this area. This will amount to £15,000 in 1993-94 reducing to around £10,000 in 1995-96, giving time for the society to seek alternative sources of funding after that.

Correspondence

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish the letter of 4 March to the hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent from the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Lord Strathclyde.

Mr. Maclean: Copies of the letter will be placed in the Library.

Hampshire Structure Plan

Mr. James Hill: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he proposes to publish his comments on the Hampshire structure plan.

Mr. Baldry: We are currently considering the report and recommendations of the panel which held the examination in public into the plan and expect to publish proposed modifications to the plan within the next few days.

Hazardous Waste

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent communications he has had with the European Commission on the application in the United Kingdom of EC directive 78/319/EEC on toxic and dangerous waste.

Mr. Maclean: The Commission has made three informal inquiries about the directive within the last six months.

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the current status of Council regulation COM(92)601 final SYN276 of 4 January on the evaluation and control of environmental risks of existing substances, following the re-examination by the European Commission.

Mr. Maclean: I refer the hon. Member to explanatory memorandum No. 4260/93 submitted by the Department of the Environment and the Department of Employment on 18 February. As the memorandum said, the regulation is expected to be adopted by the Council of Ministers on 23 March, and will come into force 60 days after publication in the Official Journal of the European Communities.

Organochlorines

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make it his policy to set a timetable for phasing out discharges of organochlorines in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Maclean: No. The system of controls under the Environmental Protection Act 1990, the Water Industry Act 1991 and the Water Resources Act 1991 provides a comprehensive means of controlling the discharge of organochlorines to sewers and rivers.

Toxic Waste

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make it his policy to set a target date for the phasing out of the consent system established to allow companies to discharge toxic substances into rivers and river estuaries in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Maclean: No. Water is a legitimate disposal route for certain types of waste and the system of consents and authorisations under the Water Resources Act 1991 and the Environmental Protection Act 1990 provides a comprehensive means for controlling substances discharged to the aquatic environment and for securing improvements in water quality.

Rhinoceroses

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what action he is proposing to protect remaining numbers of rhinoceroses in Africa and Asia;

(2) what financial assistance he has offered to the International Rhinoceros Foundation to assist in its programme to conserve rhinoceroses;

(3) what financial support he intends to give to the United Nations environment programme and convention on international trade in endangered species to protect the remaining number of rhinoceroses.

Mr. Maclean: The Government recognise the need for urgent action and have made a major contribution to international efforts to save rhinoceroses from extinction. My Department works closely with the Overseas Development Administration, through which major financial support for conservation overseas is given, and the Foreign and Commonwealth Office.

My Department has not received any requests from the International Rhinoceroses Foundation for financial assistance, but we are currently funding wildlife projects abroad worth £18 million and many of these will benefit rhinos. In addition, since 1990, we have committed £167,200 to projects which aim to protect the rhino, including £33,600 specifically for a project in Tanzania. Further, we have recently provided £20,000 for rhino de-horning operations in Zimbabwe and have given financial support to TRAFFIC, an organisation monitoring the trade in rhino horn.

The United Nations Environment Programme and the CITES secretariat are planning a major international conference in Nairobi in June. This is intended to develop a long-term strategy for saving the rhino from extinction, based on conservation plans drawn up by rhino range states. We have already promised to provide £5,000 to help delegates from the rhino range states attend the conference and a further £20,000 for rhino conservation projects. We shall consider making further contributions on the basis of the plans which are put forward.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the British Government's policy on sanctions against Taiwan, Yemen and South Korea for possession of illegal rhinoceros horn; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maclean: The Government have made very clear their wish to see an end to the illegal trade in rhino horn and we have made substantial diplomatic efforts to this end.

At the recent meeting of the standing committee to the Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species, the United Kingdom firmly supported the dispatch of letters, warning of possible sanctions, to the relevant authorities in Taipei, Seoul and Sana'a. These letters advised that the committee would recommend a ban on trade in CITES goods if it considered at its next meeting that those authorities had not taken adequate action to end trade in, and stockpiling of, rhino horn. At the United Kingdom's instigation, the chairman of the committee is also writing to all CITES parties, urging them to take action, as we are, to support rhinoceros conservation and to end illegal trade.

Radioactive Discharges

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make it his policy to establish a target date for the ending of all discharges of radioactive pollution into the sea around the United Kingdom coastline.

Mr. Maclean: No. The present system of control is designed to prevent any such pollution.

Smoke Control Areas

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he had to make regulations on sales of unauthorised fuels in smoke control areas in (a) 1991 and (b) autumn 1992; and when he now expects to make those regulations.

Mr. Maclean: As required under section 140(5) of the Evironmental Protection Act 1990, the Advisory Committee on Hazardous Substances was consulted on the proposed regulations during 1991. A notice, under section 140(6) of the Act, announcing our intention to make regulations, was published last year in the London and Edinburgh Gazettes on 2 and 3 November, respectively. We are currently considering responses to the notice.

Environmental Awareness

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what assistance his Department will provide to United Kingdom applicants to the European Commission invitation to submit proposals relating to general measures to provide information and raise awareness about the environment, published in the Official Journal of the European Communities, column 54, 10 to 12 and 25 February.

Mr. Maclean: My Department supports the aim of increasing environmental awareness. The Commission has asked for proposals to be sent to it direct, not via member states, but we would be happy to advise any applicant who approached us.

Domestic Fuel

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress was made toward the commitment to prohibit the sale of high-sulphur fuel for domestic use by the end of 1992; and when he now intends to introduce regulations.

Mr. Maclean: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Blunkett) on 16 March, Official Report, 164-65.

Farm Valuation

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make it his policy to base the valuation of farms on the estimated value of the farmhouse only for council tax purposes.

Mr. Robin Squire: Working farmhouses will normally form part of composite hereditaments. As such, they will be banded according to the proportion of the value of the whole farm which can reasonably be attributed to the domestic use of the farmhouse.

Wild Birds

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many wild birds were imported into the United Kingdom in 1990; and how many of these birds and how many species were not properly identified.

Mr. Maclean: A total of 175,967 birds were imported into Great Britain in 1990. All such imports are subject to customs controls. Whenever necessary, HM Customs seek expert advice to assist with the identification of particular species. Imports of wild birds are subject to further independent health and welfare checks on entry into quarantine. The results of these checks are published in the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food's "Importation of Birds—Mortality Statistics from Quarantine Returns", copies of which are available in the Library of the House.

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to ban the import of wild-caught birds into the United Kingdom.

Mr. Maclean: In accordance with the provisions of the Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species, trade in 156 species of bird is already banned worldwide. In addition, the European Community has banned the import of 89 bird species throughout their range and a further 102 bird species from selected countries.

Together with our European Community partners and other CITES parties, we shall consider the need for restrictions on trade in further species on the basis of the best scientific evidence available.

Regional Water Companies

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has anything to add to his reply to the hon. Member for Newham, South concerning any liabilities of any regional water company, Official Report, 15 March, column 4.

Mr. Maclean: Customers of the regulated water and sewerage businesses of water companies are fully protected by the provisions of their licences, against liabilities incurred as a result of water plcs' other activities. This protection has recently been strengthened by the Competition and Service (Utilities) Act 1992, which requires the Director General of Water Services to ensure that the interests of customers are protected as respects any activities of the company which are not attributable to the exercise of its functions as a water and sewerage undertaker and, in particular, that transactions are carried out at arms length. The Director General has recently amended the licences of water and sewerage undertakers to enable him to fulfil this duty.

Planning Appeals

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment on how many occasions he has exercised his power to make an order for costs in respect of a planning appeal dealt with by written representations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Baldry: My right hon. and learned Friend has not yet brought into force the power, in section 322(2) of the Town and Country Planning Act 1990, to award a party's costs against another party for "unreasonable" conduct in a planning appeal decided on the basis of the parties' written representations. Following a public consultation exercise last year, we intend to publish shortly the Government's revised policy guidance on awards of costs in the entire range of planning proceedings.

Contaminated Land

Mr. Hawksley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when Her Majesty's Government expect to reach a decision on their consultative proposals for local authorities in England and Wales to set up statutory registers of contaminated uses of land under section 143 of the Environmental Protection Act 1990; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales and I have received a large number of comments on the consultative proposals we issued last July. I am placing in the Library a list of respondents.

Although there is widespread agreement that the problem of the contamination of land from past industrial activities is a serious one that needs to be addressed, there has also been substantial criticism of the proposals for the registers on three main grounds:

- that since the proposed registers would be based on the criterion of use or former use by a limited range of potentially contaminating activities it would include a large number of sites that are not actually contaminated, while missing other sites that are actually contaminated by other former uses not on the prescribed list;
- that since the register would record past potentially contaminative uses of land there would be no way of removing such sites from the register even if any contamination had been satisfactorily dealt with;
- that when sites are identified as actually contaminated it remains unclear in some cases what action should be taken, what remediation measures should be carried out and by whom, which regulatory authorities should be involved, and, where the liability for the cost of remediation or compensation should fall.

We have given very careful consideration to all comments received. The Government remain determined to ensure that land contamination does not give rise to unacceptable risks to health and safety, to ground water and the environment generally, and also to ensure that vacant urban and industrial land can be put back into good use wherever practicable. The responses to our consultation paper showed that the proposed registers would have made this objective more difficult by reducing confidence in the value of sites placed on the register, thereby exacerbating blight without giving any clear indication on how such sites could be brought back into good condition and confidence restored.

We are therefore today withdrawing our proposals for establishing registers of contaminative uses of land, and announcing a new wide-ranging review of the problems in this area. The review will be conducted by an interdepartmental group of officials under the chairmanship of my Department and will seek contributions from interested parties. Its terms of reference will be as follows:

> To review the powers and duties of public authorities which relate to the identification, assessment and appropriate treatment or control of land that could cause pollution of the environment or harm human health, having regard to the need to minimise the costs which existing and new regulatory burdens place on the private sector; to consider the mechanisms for recovering authorities' costs in controlling or remedying pollution of such land sufficient to ensure its safety for health and the environment, and its return to beneficial use where practicable to consider the applications of these for the role of the Environment Agency; to report initially on any statutory changes needed in the short term and on the scope of any longer-term studies that should be put in hand; and to undertake and report on those studies.

Meanwhile, local authorities will still have their long-standing statutory powers to find and deal with actual pollution which is a source of danger and to decide planning issues about contamination. They will therefore continue to keep information about land for those purposes and to give informed answers to queries. The Government will continue to provide technical guidance to assist authorities in their tasks.

Housing Partnership Fund

Mr. Knapman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he will announce the allocation of resources to local authorities under his Department's housing partnership fund for 1993-94.

Mr. Baldry: A list of the resources being allocated to local authorities under the housing partnership fund 1993-94, which is a component of the capital partnership programme, will be placed in the Library of the House tomorrow.

Home Improvements (Compensation)

Mr. Cran: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has reached conclusions following the consultation exercise on the new right to compensation from home improvements in the Housing and Urban Development Bill.

Mr. Baldry: In December, my right hon. and learned Friend and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales published a consultation paper entitled "Compensation for Tenants' Improvements". The consultation paper sought views from interested parties on the operation of a new mandatory scheme whereby local authority tenants can receive compensation for carrying out certain home improvements, once their tenancy ends. The Departments have together received 80 responses and I am today announcing our conclusions.

Subject to parliamentary approval, the new scheme will be applicable to secure tenants of local authorities; the Housing Corporation and Housing for Wales will be formulating proposals to ensure that tenants of housing associations will have similar rights under their tenants' guarantee. We intend to draw up a list of eligible improvements; other improvements, outside this core list, will be eligible for compensation under discretionary schemes run by authorities. The amount of compensation, payable once the tenancy ends, will be based on the costs incurred by the tenant, depreciated over time. We intend to provide for an element of discretion for authorities in the assessment of compensation—for example, to deal with situations where the improvement has deteriorated more rapidly that would have been expected. We also intend there to be both upper and lower limits on the amount payable in respect of improvements. We will be proposing minor amendments to the enabling powers in clause 110 of the Housing and Urban Development Bill, to reflect a number of suggestions from consultees on the operation of the scheme.

This new initiative, contained in our election manifesto, will further extend the rights of council tenants. It will encourage tenants to invest in their homes, by guaranteeing them due recompense. It will also stimulate further improvements in the condition of local authority housing stock.

The Department will consult during the summer on draft regulations governing the detailed operation of the scheme, with a target date of 1 April 1994 for the scheme to come into operation.

I have placed in the Libraries of the House copies of a note which gives further details of our proposals.

Construction Industry

Sir Michael Neubert: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environmnent what estimate he has made of changes in the level of activity in the bullding and construction industry following the Chancellor's autumn statement.

Sir George Young: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave on 27 January, Official Report, column 762. The measures announced by my right hon. Friend in the Budget recently reinforce our strategy to sustain growth and build a strong and sound economy.

Urban Programme

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environmnent if he will set out the criteria used to determine which local authorities qualify as urban programme authorities.

Mr. Robin Squire [holding answer 18 March 1993]: The current list of urban programme authorities, which are now known as urban priority areas, was drawn up following the 1981 census and amended in the light of subsequent information on unemployment levels and derelict land. Both of the latter sets of information were published; unemployment data in the regular statistical series from the Department of Employment and derelict land from the Department of the Environment's survey, Survey of Derelict Land in England 1982, DOE 1984.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Sea Fish Conservation Act

Mr. Steen: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the cost to the taxpayer of administering the Sea Fish Conservation Act 1992; how these costs are calculated; how many officials are involved in administration of the Act; and what was the 1992 manning level.

Mr. Curry: The estimated cost of enforcing days at sea and extending licensing to vessels of 10 m overall length and below is £1·5 million per year for the United Kingdom as a whole. Inspectorate manpower is being increased from 184 in 1992 to 233. There will be additional one-off costs associated with the sea fish licence tribunal which is being established to hear fishermen's appeals against their days at sea allocations, but it is not possible to indicate these with any precision, not least because much will depend upon the number of appeals.

EMPLOYMENT

Exchange Trading Schemes

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what support is given to the local exchange trading schemes in respect of the long-term unemployed.

Mr. McLoughlin: The Government already offer a wide range of help for long-term unemployed people to help them find work and promote a flexible and efficient labour market. We have no plans to extend this to local exchange trading schemes.

European Social Fund

Ms Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if it is her Department's policy to obtain Britain's full entitlement from the European social fund for each year since 1990; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The Department's general policy is to seek to commit and spend Britain's full allocation from the European social fund (ESF) in an orderly and cost-effective manner. We also have an obligation to ensure that sufficient funds are available to pay individual sponsors of projects up to the level agreed at the time of their application.

The European Commission's method of accounting for ESF expenditure and the fluctuations in the exchange rate since the United Kingdom's departure from the ERM have however combined to cause difficulties. The Commission recalculates the value of a year's programme using the exchange rate current at the time the final claims for payment are submitted to Brussels. This is at least 18 months after the start of a programme. It is now clear that under this method we are likely to receive fewer sterling receipts than anticipated when 1991 and 1992 plans and programmes were originally drawn up and individual projects were approved. We are urgently seeking a solution to this matter with the Commission, to ensure that we can meet our obligations to project sponsors in full.

Health and Safety

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is the total number of statutory instruments currently applying to health and safety at work; what consolidation is being undertaken; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. McLoughlin: There are currently 399 statutory instruments which apply to health and safety at work.

The Health and Safety Commission has a remit under section 1(2) of the Health and Safety at Work, etc. Act 1974 to seek to reform health and safety legislation, by means including consolidation, into a coherent system of regulations and approved codes of practice, and has made substantial progress. In the context of the Government's de-regulation initiative, the Commission is now undertaking a fresh review of the remaining health and safety legislation. The review will consider whether further repeals or simplification are possible without endangering acceptable health and safety standards.

Nuclear Installations Inspectorate

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is the current number of nuclear installations inspectors in post; what vacancies exist; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. McLoughlin: On 1 March 1993, 172 nuclear installations inspectors were in post in the Health and Safety Executive. The published planned target for 1 April 1993 is 179. Figures given are for full-time equivalent posts (part-timers are counted as half units).

Nine new inspectors are being appointed.

Factory Inspections

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is the average number of years between each visit of a factory inspector to factories employing less than 200 people; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. McLoughlin: Information is not available in the form requested. Visits to workplaces including factories are made for a variety of purposes including planned inspection, and visits to give advice and guidance as well as to investigate incidents or complaints.

When planning visits to workplaces the Health and Safety Executive give priority to premises which were known to pose a higher risk, or potential risk, to employees and the public.

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is the current number of factory inspectors in post (a) of a general nature and (b) specialists; how many vacancies exist; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. McLoughlin: On 1 March 1993, 708·0 factory inspectors and 253·0 specialist inspectors were in post in the Health and Safety Executive (HSE). The published planned targets for 1.4.93 were 739·5 and 242·5 respectively. Figures given are full-time equivalent posts (part timers) are counted as half units).

Forty five factory inspectors have been recruited and are due to start employment in HSE between April and June 1993.

Allied Colloids—Hickson and Welch

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what special measures have been instituted by the Health and Safety Executive following explosions at Allied Colloids Hickson and Welch, in West Yorkshire and to avoid a repetition of such incidents; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. McLoughlin: The Health and Safety Executive (HSE) has initiated investigations into the incidents that occured at Allied Colloids on 21 July and Hickson and Welch on 21 September 1992 respectively. The investigations involve the companies concerned very closely and attempt to identify the causes of the incidents and what precautions and remedial measures should be taken to prevent a recurrence. Discussions on the lessons to be learnt are continuing; HSE will publish separate reports on each of its investigations.

Self-employment

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if she will give the basis for the calculation of the number of self-employed persons currently engaged in work; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. McLoughlin: Self-employed estimates in the work force in employment series are derived from the 1981 census of population, updated annually from the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food's agricultural census and quarterly, for other sectors, from the labour force survey (LFS).

Before 1992 the LFS was carried out annually. The results were used to produce estimates for June; figures for other quarters were derived by interpolation.

From spring 1992, the LFS has been conducted every quarter in Great Britain. The LFS provides an alternative estimate of people who are self-employed, based upon the respondents' own assessment of their employment status.

Offshore Oil and Gas Industry

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment, pursuant to her answer of 15 March, Official Report, columns 62-63, if she will list the length of time which elapsed in each case between a recommendation for prosecution and court proceedings taking place; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Information on the dates on which prosecution was recommended, and the dates of conviction is as follows:

Company	Date of prosecution recommended	Date of conviction
Allseas Marine Contractors	20 August 1990	15 May 1991
Smedvig Ltd.	4 December 1990	9 March 1992
Amoco (UK) Exploration	4 December 1990	9 March 1992
Atlantic Drilling	17 April 1991	21 April 1992
Atlantic Drilling	17 April 1991	21 April 1992
Stena Offshore Ltd.	13 March 1992	9 May 1992
Stena Offshore Ltd.—employee	13 March 1992	8 May 1992
Sedco Forex Drilling Services Ltd.	12 June 1992	22 July 1992
ETPM Services (UK)	26 June 1992	26 November 1992
BP Exploration	21 September 1992	17 December 1992

Two recommendations failing to result in convictions were made on 5 December 1991, with the court decision on 22 May 1992.

Information on the dates when court hearings commenced are not readily obtainable and the reply therefore refers to dates of conviction.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if she will detail the time it took between reports of incidents involving breaches of health and safety laws in the offshore oil and gas industries and referrals made to the procurator fiscal in each of the past seven years; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: It is possible to determine whether reported incidents on offshore installations involve possible breaches of health and safety legislation only after the Health and Safety Executive inspectors have conducted their investigations. If as a result of investigation a recommendation for prosecution is made, details would be referred to the procurator fiscal forthwith.

Unemployment Benefit

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment under what circumstances an unemployed person earning £53 per week can receive unemployment benefit.

Mr. Burt: I have been asked to reply.

Unemployment benefit is not payable for any day on which net earnings exceed £2 and for any benefit week in which net earnings equal or exceed the lower earnings level for the payment of national insurance contributions—currenlty £54.

There are more generous rules for those undertaking public duties such as manning a lifeboat or serving as a member of the territorial or reserve forces.

WALES

Home Temperatures

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many homes in Wales have an indoor winter temperature lower than the recommendation of the World Health Organisation.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The information is not available centrally.

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the grants given by his Department for the repair and improvement of village halls in Wales during each of the last two years, with both the recipient and the amount of grant paid in each case.

Sir Wyn Roberts: Welsh Office support for the repair and improvement of village halls in Wales is provided through the capital grants to voluntary youth services, village halls and community centres programme and the rural initiative. Approved projects which describe themselves as "village halls" and the amount of grant aid, as opposed to the amount of grant allocated, in 1991-92 and 1992-93 for each one are as follows:

Council Tax

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many representations he has received on the poundage levels on Welsh properties regarding the council tax in the last 12 months; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Poundage applies to non-domestic properties under the non-domestic rating system. It is not a feature of the arrangements for levying council tax on domestic properties.

Executive Coaching

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales which health authorities and hospital trusts have enrolled female staff for executive coaching; at what cost; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: This information is not collected centrally.

Printing

Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what was the (a) budget and (b) estimated cost of all printing authorised by his Department in 1992-93; and what proportion of that budget was spent with companies based in Wales.

Mr. David Hunt: Within the budgets for publicity, forms, circulars and other material associated with the delivery of Welsh Office programmes, separate budgets are not maintained for printing. Estimates of spend to date or outturn for 1992-93 could not be produced except at disproportionate cost.

Compulsory Competitive Tendering

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what research has been undertaken by his Department on the impact of the introduction of compulsory competitive tendering in housing management upon joint community care plans drawn up by local authority housing and social services departments.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: None.

Welsh Development Agency

Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what estimate his Department has of the total expenditure of the Welsh Development Agency which is put out to contract; and what proportion of those contracts is with companies based in Wales.

Mr. David Hunt: This is an operational matter for the Welsh Development Agency. I have therefore asked the chief executive of the agency to write to the hon. Gentleman and for a copy of his response to be placed in the Library of the House.

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list for each of the last three years those planning applications submitted by the Welsh Development Agency which have been opposed because of damage to wildlife interests.

Mr. David Hunt: This information is not held centrally.

Immunisation

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the number and percentage of general practices in each family health service authority area in Wales that have reached the immunisation target; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Information on partnerships and single-handed practitioners receiving payments for the higher and lower targets for vaccination and immunisation and for vaccination and immunisation boosters is shown in the following tables:

Child Protection Registers

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many children have been placed on protection registers in each local authority area in Wales during each of the last five years.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Child protection registers provide the only centrally available source of information in this area.

Children placed on the registers are classified by categories of abuse—for example, neglect, physical abuse and sexual abuse.

Each addition to the register may be either an entirely new case or a reclassification of an existing registration. In particular in 1992, following implementation of the Children Act 1989, the category of grave concern was abolished and it is known that 86 of those added to the register were reclassifications from grave concern to other categories. Numbers of additions to the register are shown in the table.

It is not intended specifically to establish the extent of child abuse and comparisons between years may be affected by changes in the administrative arrangements of local authorities.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many unemployed people have been unemployed for one year or longer in Wales in each year from 1979 onwards by (a) local authority area and (b) travel to work area.

Mr. David Hunt: The earliest month for which data comparable with present coverage are available for local areas is June 1983.

All available unemployment figures can be assessed from the NOMIS database by House of Commons Library staff.

Strikes

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many (a) strikes took place and (b) working days were lost through strikes in Wales in each year since 1980.

Mr. David Hunt: The information requested is given in the following table:

Mr. David Hunt: The Department will not be represented at the launch of the Welsh anti-poverty network on 21 April. My officials however, will continue to maintain a regular dialogue with the network about its activities in Wales.

Wales European Centre

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how much is currently contributed by each local authority in Wales to the maintenance of the Welsh Development Agency office in Brussels; and what assessment he has made of the effect of the proposed local government reform in Wales upon future funding for the maintenance of the office.

Mr. David Hunt: The Wales European centre in Brussels was established by the WDA and has a range of sponsors. The local authorities in Wales, through their respective associations, contributed £154,000 in 1992-93 towards the total budget of around £400,000.

Following the reform of local government, the question of support for the Wales European centre will be a matter for the new unitary authorities.

GP Fund Holders

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many general practitioner fund holders will begin in April; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Offers of recognition have been made to 45 applicants, including three groups of two practices, who are preparing to become fund holders from 1 April. This will make a total of 71 general practitioner fund holders in Wales covering some 25 per cent. of the population.

Amenity Beds

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many amenity beds there are in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: As at 30 March 1992 there were 72 amenity beds in Wales.

1987	27,550,542
1988	28,626,125
1989	29,383,257
1990-91	30,032,752
1991-92	31,633,972

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many speech therapists there are in each health authority who practise among stroke victims; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The information requested is not available centrally.

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many speech therapists there were in Clwyd in 1983 and in the latest available year.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: At 30 September 1983 there were 12·7 whole-time equivalent speech therapists in post in Clwyd health authority. The corresponding figure for September 1992 was 33·9.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Since 1 September 1991 the Welsh Office has awarded grant of £50,308 to Relate to support its activities in Wales. I expect to announce a decision shortly about Relate's grant application for 1993-94.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Each Welsh health authority with the exception of Powys has contractual arrangements for the use of mobile lithotriptors. This is in accordance with the final report of the project group on lithotripsy.

Powys health authority has arrangements for its patients to be treated in hospitals outside Powys.

Clwydian Health Trust

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) what percentage of staff in the Clwydian Health Trust, Clwyd are assigned to administrative duties;

(2) what percentage of staff are (a) nurses, (b) doctors and (c) paramedics in the Clwydian Health Trust, Clwyd.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The trust will become operational on 1 April on which date staff employed solely at or for the purposes of the existing community and mental health unit will transfer to the trust. The latest available information on staff groups employed by Clwyd health authority within the unit is as follows:

Staff groups	Percentage of total (at 30 September 1992)

Professions allied to medicine[1]	5·6

[1] Numbers for paramedics not separately available.

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what was the amount of cash spent on refurbishing the headquarters of the Clwydian Health Trust.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: I understand that some £200,000 was spent in converting the structure of the former hospital building Mancot for use as the headquarters of the Clwydian Community Care NHS Trust. This has enabled the NHS trust to bring together all its headquarters staff with consequential improvements to efficiency.

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the number of confirmed cases of BSE, by county for each month since December 1992.

Mr. David Hunt: This information is not held centrally. However, according to statistics compiled by the County Planning Officers Society's committee No. 3, during the last four years 635 hectares of land received planning permission for opencasting in Wales, of which 364 hectares were derelict. All permissions for opencasting carry a requirement to restore fully the land involved.

Exports

Mr. Richards: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what he is doing to promote exports from Wales; what role the export development adviser for Wales has in these plans; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: I am introducing an exports initiative to improve further the exports performance of Welsh industry. Under the initiative, 30 Welsh companies will be represented by the Department at the premier United Kingdom trade fair for the Arabian Gulf which is to be held in Dubai next month. I have doubled the number of Welsh Office-led trade missions to overseas markets and have arranged for small and medium-sized Wales-based companies to join them at subsidised rates for the first time ever.

During the coming financial year our programme of missions will be:

June 6-11—Germany (Stuttgart) and Switzerland (Zurich)
August 14-26—Singapore and Malaysia (Kuala Lumpur)
September 12-24—USA (Seattle) and Canada (Vancouver and Toronto)

October 1-14—The Arabian Gulf (Dubai, Abu Dhabi, Bahrain, Saudi Arabia and Kuwait)

February 14-18—Belgium (Brussels)

March 13-18—France (Marseilles) and Spain (Barcelona)

A further eight missions will be arranged during 1994-95 and 10 during 1995-96.

In support of these trade missions and to provide specialist market information for new and existing exporters, my Department will mount at least one promotional seminar a month during the next 12 months. One of these missions will also be a training mission for those business people who have not yet been on an export mission. Seminars in hand include "Exporting for the Invisibles sector", "Approaching the French market", "Indo British Partnerships", and "Taiwan".

My Department already provides in Wales the full range of the Government's overseas trade services. The new Wales chamber of commerce and industry plays an important and complementary role in export promotion and, under joint finance arrangements with my Department, has made an export development adviser available to industry and commerce throughout Wales.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Prison Education

Mrs. Wise: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what measures and criteria of quality he uses when balancing quality and price in deciding to whom to award contracts for prison education.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: In deciding the providers to whom contracts should be offered, the prison service has taken into account price; relevant experience and financial status of the tenderer; and the management and staffing arrangements for delivering the range of services specified in the contract and ensuring that the quality of those services meets the required standards.

Hong Kong Entrants

Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many citizens of Hong Kong have applied for entry to the United Kingdom in each of the last three years; what information he has on the numbers in each case seeking to reside in Scotland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The available information relating to Hong Kong British dependent territories citizens and British Nationals (Overseas) is given in the table. Information on the person's intended destination within the United Kingdom is not available.

Hong Kong British dependent territories citizens and British nationals (overseas)

	Arrivals at United Kingdom ports[1]	Persons initially refused entry clearance in Hong Kong[2]
1990	82,100	60
1991	80,200	60
1992	[3]91,100	60

[1] Data cover admissions plus persons refused leave to enter and removed. The data may include some stateless persons from Hong Kong.
[2] Some may have been granted entry clearance subsequently on appeal.
[3] Provisional figure.

Legislation (Consultation)

Mr. Dowd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to review his Department's consultation procedures with local authorities and other public bodies with regard to the implications for them of any legislative changes, prior to their presentation to the House or implementation.

Mr.Kenneth Clarke: I have no such plans.

Farms (Thefts)

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many thefts from farms have been recorded in each police authority area within Wales during each of the last five years.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The information requested is not collected centrally.

Prison Service

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will indicate the extent to which parliamentary questions relating to the prison service after 1 April will be answered (a) directed by Ministers and (b) by the director of the Prison Service Agency in so far as they relate to (i) costs and average costs, (ii) staffing matters, (iii) events relating to discipline and (iv) contracting out.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: From 1 April 1993, when the prison service becomes an executive agency, the director general will have delegated responsibility for its day-to-day management. When a Member of Parliament asks a parliamentary question on a delegated matter, I will normally ask the director general to write to the Member. The question and the director general's reply will be published in Hansard. Questions relating to costs and average costs, staffing, disciplinary matters and operating aspects of contracting out will normally fall within the director general's delegated responsibilities. Questions relating to policy on contracting out the management of prison establishments will normally be answered by Ministers.

DEFENCE

Redundancies

Dr. Goodson-Wickes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what will be the reduction in civilian manpower in his Department in relation to the implementation of "Options for Change", expressed both in total numbers and as a percentage of its original targets.

Mr. Aitken: We propose to make a reduction of some 35,000 civilian posts by 1996-97 from the 1 April 1990 baseline of approximately 172,000—a 20 per cent. reduction.

Polaris

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many Polaris missiles have been purchased from the United States.

Mr. Aitken: In the late 1960s, the United Kingdom purchased 99 Polaris missiles, comprising rocket motors and ancillary equipment, from the United States. A further 70 rocket motor sets were subsequently purchased for spares and as part of the Chevaline development programme. In the early 1980s, the United Kingdom replaced existing stocks with 82 new rocket motor sets as part of the Polaris remotoring programme.

HMS Gloucester

Mr. Jamieson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what price has been agreed with Babcock Thorn for the refit of HMS Gloucester; and what was the price submitted by Devonport Management Ltd.

Mr. Aitken: It is not our practice to disclose bid or contract prices. I can confirm that best value for money will be obtained by allocating the refit to Babcock Thorn.

Trident

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if any decision has yet been taken on the number of missiles that will be deployed on each Trident submarine.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The deterrent capability to be deployed when Trident is in service from the mid-1990s onwards will be decided in the light of circumstances at the time.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if there is a requirement to test fire United Kingdom Trident missiles.

Mr. Aitken: There is a requirement to test fire United Kingdom Trident missiles in order to demonstrate the effectiveness of the United Kingdom strategic nuclear deterrent.

Submarines (Missiles and Warheads)

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answers of 18 March, Official Report, column 322, and to the hon. Member for Western Isles (Mr. Macdonald) of 26 January, Official Report, column 645, when it became his policy not to reveal the numbers of missiles and warheads carried on the United Kingdom ballistic submarines.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: It has been the policy of successive Governments not to reveal the current or planned numbers of missiles and warheads carried on the United Kingdom's ballistic missile submarines.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Nuclear and Chemical Weapons

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment his Department has made of the possession of nuclear or chemical weapons by republics of the former Soviet Union; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Garel-Jones: We understand that all tactical nuclear weapons of the former Soviet Union have now been withdrawn to Russia. A number of strategic nuclear weapons remain on the territory of Ukraine, Belarus and Kazakhstan. All are due for elimination under the terms of the START I treaty and its associated instruments. Completion of this process—which remains subject to Ukraine ratifying START I—would leave Russia as the only possessor of nuclear weapons amongst the republics of the former Soviet Union.

We were reassured that Russia, with the world's largest chemical weapons stockpile, was amongst the first to sign the convention on the prohibition of the development, production stockpiling and use of chemical weapons and of their destruction. Azerbaijan, Belarus, Estonia, Georgia, Kazakhstan, Lithuania, Moldova, Kyrgyzstan, Tajikistan and the Ukraine have also signed the convention.

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps are being taken by Her Majesty's Government to prevent the proliferation of nuclear and chemical weapons in the middle east, Africa and Asia.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The most important instrument of the non-proliferation regime is the nuclear non-proliferation treaty—NPT. As a co-depositary of the treaty, the United Kingdom is actively working to ensure that the 1995 NPT extension conference will endorse the indefinite extension of the treaty. The United Kingdom works with like-minded countries to ensure that International Atomic Energy Agency safeguards and nuclear export controls are implemented as effectively as possible.

The United Kingdom plays a leading role in the 24 member Australia group which seeks to harmonise international controls on chemical weapons precursors, dual-use chemical and biological equipment and technology, biological agents and toxins. These controls are reviewed and updated as required at the biannual meetings of the group. The early entry into force of the chemical weapons convention, which can be no earlier than January 1995, will provide the most effective mechanism for preventing the proliferation of chemical weapons. Some 140 states are already signatories of the convention. The United Kingdom will play an active part in the establishment of the Organisation for the Prohibition of Chemical Weapons which will oversee the implementation of the convention.

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is his Department's assessment of which middle eastern, African and Asian countries currently possess, or are near to obtaining, nuclear or chemical weapons; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: There are three states in these regions—Israel, Pakistan and India—not party to the non-proliferation treaty—NPT—which have significant unsafeguarded nuclear activities, though none has declared itself to have or to be seeking nuclear weapons. North Korea, which is not recognised by Her Majesty' Government, has recently announced its intention to withdraw from the NPT. It has significant nuclear facilities and has failed to co-operate fully with the International Atomic Energy Agency implementing its safeguards agreement. There are also a number of countries in these regions which have, or are believed to be seeking to acquire, an offensive chemical weapons capability.

North Korea

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the decision of the Democratic Republic of Korea's decision to withdraw from the non-proliferation treaty.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply given to the hon. Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn) on 18 March, Official Report, column 318.

Bosnia

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a further statement about Her Majesty's Government's policy towards enforcement of a no-fly zone over Bosnia.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We condemn the bombing of the village of Gladovici in eastern Bosnia, which was the first confirmed combat-related violation of the no-fly zone set up in United Nations Security Council resolutions 761 and 776 since 13 October 1992. We fully support the moves in the United Nations towards enforcement of the no-fly zone.

We shall also continue to assess the possible repercussions of enforcement on our ability to protect the humanitarian aid effort. The safety of British troops remains our paramount concern.

Yugoslavia

Mr. Hutton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will place in the Library a copy of Her Majesty's Government's response to the proposal to establish a war crimes tribunal in the former Yugoslavia, under Security Council resolution 808.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Yes. Under United Nations Security Council resolution 808 the United Nations Secretary-General should report by 22 April on the most effective and expeditious way to establish the tribunal. The United Nations secretariat has asked for informal contributions from member states to assist it in that work. We have provided comments in the form of a non-paper. I have arranged for a copy to be placed in the Library of the House.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Commonwealth Development Corporation

Mr. Hague: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what response has been made to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission report on the efficiency and costs of and the service provided by the Commonwealth Development Corporation.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: I have today placed in the Library of the House responses by the Commonwealth Development Corporation and the Government to the recommendations made in the Monopolies and Mergers Commission's report. The Government welcome the MMC's conclusion that

"CDC provides a particularly valuable form of assistance to the economies of developing countries".

The MMC was impressed

"by CDC's competence and by the dedication with which its staff work, often in difficult circumstances, towards the Corporation's objectives".

The Government regard the CDC as an important part of Britain's overall aid effort and it is the principal vehicle under the aid programme for directly assisting the private sector.

The commission made a number of recommendations to improve the efficiency and procedures of the corporation. The CDC has accepted 25 of 28 of these for implementation in whole or in part.

The MMC also recommended that some important issues, relating particularly to the corporation's capital structure and funding, should be considered in the context of the current quinquennial review of the CDC. A further statement on these issues will be made to the House once this review has been completed.

Eastern Europe (Tobacco)

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how much financial or technical assistance given by his Department to eastern European countries has gone to aid the production or marketing of tobacco products.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: It is Government policy not to support the tobacco industry under the aid programme. However, inadvertently, one manager from a Polish cigarette company's factory was attached to a United Kingdom company last year under a Foreign and Commonwealth Office—Overseas Development Administration know-how fund programme designed to increase management experience in Britain's market economy. This programme has brought more than 350 managers to the United Kingdom since 1990.

Eastern Europe

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how much of the financial and technical assistance provided to east European states includes contributions to new nuclear power installations.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The financial and technical assistance provided by the United Kingdom to eastern European countries does not include contributions to new nuclear power installations.

EDUCATION

Discretionary Awards

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Education how many discretionary awards were given by each local education authority in each year since 1985.

Mr. Boswell: The number of discretionary awards reported by each LEA for the academic years 1989-90 and 1990-91—latest available—are set out in the table. Some historical information on discretionary awards made by individual LEAs is published in past volumes of "Statistics of Education: Finance and Awards" and "Statistical Bulletins: Student Awards in England and Wales" copies of which are in the Library.

[1] LEAs unable to provide appropriate information.
[2] ILBs took over responsibility from ILEA for most awards in 1990-91; some awards were made by the London Residual Body.

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what was the amount of total resources allocated to and by each local education authority for discretionary awards in each year since 1985.

Mr. Boswell: It is for each LEA to set out its own budget for discretionary awards in the light of local needs and priorities. The Department does not collect information on any such planned allocations. The available information on expenditure for the years 1985-86 to 1987-88 and 1989-90 to 1990-91 made by LEAs is included in the table. Data for the academic year 1988-89 are not readily available and cannot be provided without incurring disproportionate costs.

[1]LEAs unable to provide appropriate information
[2]ILBs took over responsibility from ILEA for most awards in 1990-91 some awards were made by the London Residual Body.

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Education how many students applying for discretionary awards, in each local education authority, were refused such awards for each year since 1985.

Mr. Boswell: It is for each local education authority to decide on the allocation of discretionary awards in the light of local needs and priorities. The number of students refused discretionary awards is not held centrally.

National Curriculum

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Education (1) if he will make a statement about the level of support being provided to teachers of children with special educational needs to develop appropriate systems of assessment leading to level 1 of key stage 1 of the national curriculum;

(2) if he will take steps to develop a system of assessment within the national curriculum to take proper account of those children who are currently assessed as working towards level 1 of key stage 1;

(3) if he will make a statement about work being undertaken by local education authorities and schools to develop systems of assessment appropriate for children who are currently assessed as working towards level 1 of key stage 1 of the national curriculum.

Mr. Forth: The statutory assessment arrangements for key stage 1 already provide for teachers to assess those pupils who are working towards level 1, including those with special educational needs. Teachers are able to use the framework provided by the national curriculum, and extend it in the light of individual needs and circumstances, to identify suitable targets for those working towards level 1. These arrangements are kept under review by the School Examinations and Assessment Council—SEAC.

All local education authorities receive specific grant for education support and training to meet their in-service training requirements for assessment. This includes arrangements for teachers of children with special educational needs.

Arrangements to disseminate good practice between schools and LEAs' specialist advisers are encouraged.

SEAC has also given extensive guidance to LEAs and teachers on appropriate assessment arrangements for pupils with special educational needs. Additionally some LEAs, in conjunction with their schools, are developing further guidance for teachers of pupils working towards level 1.

SEAC's guidance, which is kept under review, provides for a considerable degree of flexibility which teachers are able to use in making adaptations to both testing procedures and the tests themselves. The effectiveness of these general assessment arrangements are also reviewed, as appropriate, during the periodic school survey programme conducted by the Office for Standards in Education.

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will undertake a survey of the effects of the introduction of the national curriculum and its associated assessment and testing on the work load of teachers and its impact on their health.

Mr. Forth: My right hon. Friend has no plans to do so.

Teacher Absence

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will publish information on the level of teacher absence from school because of ill health in each of the last five years and in 1979.

Mr. Boswell: Information on teacher absences was collected as part of the secondary school staffing survey of maintained secondary schools in England. However, it is available only for the years 1988 and 1992, when the percentage of tuition time affected by short-term absences of teachers for reasons other than in-service training or other professional duties was recorded as 4 and 3 per cent. respectively.

Teachers (Early Retirement)

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Education how many (a) head teachers and (b) teachers have been given early retirement in each of the last five years and in 1979.

Mr. Boswell: The number of (a) head teachers and (b) teachers in schools who have been given early retirement under the premature retirement arrangements in the financial years 1978-79 and 1988-89 to 1992-93 is shown in the table. The numbers relate to those teachers who retired before the normal retirement age of 60. They do not include teachers retiring for reasons of ill health.

Child Carers

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what measures he intends to take to help children who care for disabled or terminally ill relatives to attend school regularly.

Mr. Forth: Regular school attendance is important for all pupils. Where special circumstances exist at home, we look to schools to liaise closely with education welfare officers and local authority social services departments to ensure that children are not thereby prevented from attending school.

Truancy and Expulsions

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what is the latest information he has on the levels of (a) truancy and (b) expulsions in primary and secondary schools.

Mr. Forth: Truancy data will be published in local school performance tables for the first time this autumn. We will then have a clearer understanding of the levels of truancy nationally. Information on permanent exclusions from maintained schools was collected by the Department over a two-year period beginning with the summer term 1990. Returns from the second year are currently being analysed but preliminary results from an analysis of the first-year data show that there were some 3,000 permanent exclusions over that period. Exclusions in the primary phase accounted for 13 per cent. of the total.

Selection

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will publish a list of those schools which have expressed an interest in introducing selective admission procedures based on ability for secondary education.

Mr. Forth: The following self-governing state schools —grant-maintained schools—have published proposals under section 89 of the Education Reform Act 1988 to make a significant change of character by introducing arrangements for some or all pupils to be admitted by reference to ability: Castle Hall School, Kirklees, rejected on 21 May 1992; Avon Valley School, Warwickshire, withdrawn 24 March 1992; Southlands School, Berkshire, approved 16 February 1993; Queen Elizabeth Grammar School, Cumbria, minded to approve 5 March 1993. No other such proposals are currently before my right hon. Friend.

Nursery Education

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will make a statement about the value of nursery education in enhancing the performance of pupils at key stage 1 of the national curriculum; and what action he intends to take in the light of the evidence which is available to his Department on this subject.

Mr. Forth: Various research findings have indicated that nursery education has benefits in preparing many children for their primary schooling. There is no conclusive evidence of its benefits over the longer term or of its cost effectiveness relative to that of other forms of under-five provision. The Government believe that the patterns of provision for the under-fives are best left for local determination in the light of the available resources.

Teachers' Health

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will undertake a national survey of the effects of the introduction of the local management of schools and the national curriculum on the health of headteachers.

Mr. Forth: My right hon. Friend has no plans to do so.

Student Loans

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what are the latest figures for the number of students who have taken out loans from the students access funds; and if he will estimate the total amount of the loans.

Mr. Boswell: This information is not collected centrally.

Grant-maintained Schools

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education how many applications for grant-maintained status have been approved (a) without modification, (b) with modification in respect of the admission number, (c) with modification in respect of the date of incorporation and (d) with modification in respect of the admissions policy; and how many of such applications were published (i) before 1 December 1992, and (ii) after 1 December 1992.

Mr. Forth: This information could be provided only at a disproportionate cost.

Market Testing

Mr. Batiste: To ask the Secretary of State for Education which professional services within his Department have been subjected to market testing within the last 12 months and with what result; and which will be subjected to market testing within the next 12 months.

Mr. Boswell: A limited market test of the Department for Education library in 1992 led to the service being retained in-house. The Department's market-testing programme for the period after 30 September 1993 has not yet been finalised.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Church Business

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Lord President of the Council if he will introduce legislation to provide for the levying of charges on the Church of England for the passage of Church of England Measures along the lines of those levied on promoters of private Bills.

Mr. Newton: I have no plans to do so.

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed, as representing the House of Commons Commission if he will list the numbers and grades of staff whose work involves a significant amount of time spent on matters relating to Church of England or Church Commissioners' business in the House.

Mr. Beith: One assistant clerk—HEO/D—is made available as Commons secretary of the Ecclesiastical Committee and spends not more than 10 per cent. of his time on work associated with that committee. No other member of staff spends a significant amount of time on Church of England or Church Commissioners' business.

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Lord President of the Council how much time has been devoted to (a) oral questions to the right hon. Member answering on behalf of the Church Commissioners and (b) to the passage of Church of England measures, in Sessions 1990-91, 1991-92 and 1992-93 to date.

Mr. Newton: The information requested is as follows:

	(a) Oral Questions (Church Commissioners)	(b) Church of England measures
1990-91	35 minutes	1 hour 17 minutes
1991-92	15 minutes	1 hour 1 minute
1992-93 (up to 25 March 1993)	25 minutes	nil

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Lord President of the Council how many questions tabled to the right hon. Member answering on behalf of the Church Commissioners have been printed in the Order Paper; and how many received (a) oral and (b) written answers, for Sessions 1990-91, 1991-92 and 1992-93 to date.

Mr. Newton: The information requested is as follows:

	Total	(a) oral answer	(b) written answer[1]	(c) withdrawn
1990-91	44	18	26	—
1991-92	12	7	5	—
1992-93 (up to 25 March 1993)	48	16	30	2

[1] Includes questions tabled for oral answer which were not reached, and therefore received a written reply.

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the names of the (a) schools, (b) colleges and (c) universities which he and his ministerial colleagues have visited since April 1992; and if he will make a statement on the purpose and benefits of the visits.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The information is as follows:

Such visits provide opportunities to see institutions in operation and to discuss education matters with staff, students and pupils.

University Hospital

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement rescinding his instruction to South Glamorgan health authority to award the catering contract at the University hospital of Wales to Gardner Merchant.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The awarding of catering contracts is a health authority responsibility and South Glamorgan health authority advises us that it intends to take no further steps to implement the tendering exercise concerned with the provision of catering services at the University hospital of Wales.

Welsh Language

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, how many children in each local education authority speak Welsh as their mother tongue in Wales in absolute and percentage terms.

Sir Wyn Roberts: Information on the number of children who speak more Welsh than English at home will be available from the results of the 1992 Welsh social survey. The 1991 census collected data on whether children spoke Welsh but not on whether it was their first language. The numbers and percentage of children aged three to 16 speaking Welsh is published for Wales and counties—local education authorities—by the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys in the 1991 census national monitor for Wales—Cen 91 CM 55.

Midwives

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what consultations he has had with the south Glamorgan health authority regarding the offer of employment to its salaried diploma students graduating at the south East Wales School of Midwifery within the University of Wales College of Cardiff.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: My right hon. Friend has had no consultations with the South Glamorgan health authority on this subject. This is a matter for the authority as employer.

National Curriculum

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will undertake a survey of the effects of the introduction of the national curriculum and its associated assessment and testing on the work load of teachers and its impact on their health.

Sir Wyn Roberts: Implementation of the national curriculum and its associated assessment arrangements are being phased in over a number of years. The teaching and assessment requirements are already subject to periodic review, respectively by the Curriculum Council for Wales, National Curriculum Council and School Examinations and Assessment Council. In addition, the office of Her Majesty's chief inspectorate for Wales monitors and reports on the implementation of the national curriculum as part of its yearly inspection programme.

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement about the value of nursery education in enhancing the performance of pupils at key stage 1 of the national curriculum; and what action he intends to take in the light of the evidence which is available to his office on this subject.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The provision of nursery education in Wales for pupils under five is at the discretion of local authorities. A detailed analysis of the end of key stage 1 pupil performance and its relationship to the value of nursery education has not been undertaken by the Department.

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) if he will take steps to develop a system of assessment within the national curriculum to take proper account of those children who are currently assessed as working towards level 1 of key stage 1;

(2) if he will make a statement about work being undertaken by local education authorities and schools to develop systems of assessment appropriate for children who are currently assessed as working towards level 1 of key stage 1 of the national curriculum;

(3) if he will make a statement about the level of support being provided to teachers of children with special educational needs to develop appropriate systems of assessment leading to level 1 of key stage 1 of the national curriculum.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The statutory arrangements for key stage 1 already provide for teachers to assess pupils who are working towards level 1, including those with special educational needs. These arrangements are kept under review by the School Examinations and Assessment Council—SEAC.

All LEAs in Wales benefit from support funding under the grants for education, support and training programme to meet their in-service teacher training requirements for assessment and aspects of special educational needs, and networking arrangements to disseminate good practice between schools and LEA specialist advisers are encouraged.

General and specific teacher guidance material to support teachers' professional judgments in the assessment of pupils with special educational needs has been produced and distributed to all schools by SEAC. Additionally some LEAs in Wales in conjunction with their schools are developing further guidance to that provided by SEAC in support of pupils working towards level 1.

SEAC's guidance, which is kept under review, provides for a considerable degree of flexibility which teachers are able to use in making adaptations to both procedures and materials during the course of their professional assessments. The effectiveness of these general assessment arrangements is also reviewed, as appropriate, by the office of Her Majesty's chief inspector in Wales.

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will undertake a survey of the effects of the introduction of the local management of schools and the national curriculum on the health of head teachers.

Sir Wyn Roberts: I have no plans at present to undertake a survey on the effects of our local management of schools arrangements on the health of teachers. As regards the national curriculum, I refer the hon. Gentleman to my reply today on the work load of teachers.

Truancy and Expulsions

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the latest information he has on the levels of (a) truancy and (b) expulsions in primary and secondary schools.

Sir Wyn Roberts: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer I gave him on 24 February, at column 634, when I informed him that information on absence rates is not collected centrally although it is our intention for these details to be published on an individual school basis.

The Welsh Office has been monitoring permanent exclusions at maintained schools over a two-year period starting with the summer term 1990 under the national exclusions reporting system. Around 190 were permanently excluded in the period covered. Information on temporary exclusions is not collected by the Department.

Teachers (Ill Health)

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish information on the level of teacher absence from school because of ill health in each of the last five years and in 1979.

Sir Wyn Roberts: Data on the absence of teachers in maintained secondary schools in Wales were collected as part of the 1989 secondary school staffing survey. The percentage of tuition time affected by short term absences of teachers for reasons other than in-service training or other professional duties was recorded as four per cent. No data on teacher absence are available from the 1986 survey. No data are available for primary schools.

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many (a) head teachers and (b) teachers have been given early retirement on the ground of ill health in each of the last five years and in 1979.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The information requested can be provided only at disproportionate cost.

School Age Carers

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what measures he intends to take to help children who care for disabled or terminally ill relatives to attend school regularly.

Sir Wyn Roberts: It is for local education authorities to ensure that parents are fulfilling their statutory obligations as to their children's education. However, where special circumstances apply as when a child is involved in caring for infirm relatives, we would expect a local authority to consult as appropriate with any other agencies that are involved.

Schools (Selection)

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many secondary schools have approached him about introducing selective admissions procedures based on ability.

Sir Wyn Roberts: None.

Higher Education (Drop-out Rates)

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish figures showing the numbers of students that have dropped out of courses within (a) each university college and (b) each higher education institution in Wales within each of the last five years; and if he will express the figure also as a percentage of the total number of students in each institution in each year.

Sir Wyn Roberts [holding answer 23 February 1993]: The information requested is as follows:

Data for the individual colleges of the University of Wales are not available centrally. The figures for the university of Wales as a whole, shown in table 1, exclude students who were seconded, took a year out or transferred between colleges or to other universities.

Information on students who withdraw from courses in the former LEA maintained higher education sector was recorded for the first time in the continuous student record survey in 1990. As a result only one year's data are currently available. Table 2 gives counts of those students enrolled on full-time and sandwich first degree courses in 1989-90 who had withdrawn by the following academic year—1990-91. Students who transferred to other courses, either internally or externally, or whose course was interrupted for medical reasons have been excluded.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Regulations

12. Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received from the farming unions in England and Wales on the number of regulations introduced by his Department which require individual farmers to complete records or forms.

Mr. Gummer: The Government and the farming unions have a common interest in reducing the burden of administration to a minimum and I have kept in close touch with the unions on this subject.

Patulin

13. Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received from organisations representing consumers about the level of patulin in fruit juices.

Mr. Soames: I have received no representations from consumer organisations about the level of patulin.

The National Consumer Council had a useful meeting with my right hon. Friend the Minister at which there was a discussion of publication of food surveillance data so as to give helpful information to consumers and avoid the possibility of the public being misled by unwarranted scare stories.

Bio-energy

14. Mr. Flynn: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what new plans he has to increase the acreage of set aside land that is used for experimental bio-energy projects.

Mr. Curry: Crops for use as biofuels can already be grown on any land set-aside under the arable area payments scheme.

Environmentally Sensitive Areas

15. Mr. Barnes: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many farmers have applied to join the six new ESA schemes launched in January 1993.

Mr. Gummer: By Monday 22 March about 500 farmers had applied and we expect more by the application deadline of 31 March.

French Fishermen (Attacks)

17. Mr. Nigel Evans: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received concerning compensation for United Kingdom citizens who have lost stock due to attacks by French fishermen in French ports.

Mr. Curry: We are assisting those who have suffered to claim for compensation against the French authorities.

Common Agricultural Policy

16. Lady Olga Maitland: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps he is taking to minimise the administrative burden on farmers within the reformed CAP.

Mr. Gummer: At my request, the Commission is examining ways of simplifying for the future the rules for the CAP reform schemes.

18. Mr. Hunter: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what recent representations he has made to the European Commission and to Governments of other member states to ensure that the requirements of the common agricultural policy are practised and enforced in all member states.

Mr. Gummer: I take every opportunity to insist that the rules of the CAP are enforced throughout the Community.

At last week's meeting of the Agriculture Council, I pressed the Commission to ensure that the integrated administration and control regulation is properly implemented in all member states.

19. Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he expects to publish guidance and application forms for aid under the reformed CAP.

Mr. Gummer: Guidance on the individual schemes introduced as the result of CAP reform has been sent to producers. Application forms for aid are being distributed in line with the timing of the introduction of each scheme.

20. Mr. Oppenheim: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the recent level of CAP frauds and measures taken to reduce the incidence of such frauds.

Mr. Curry: Fraud, by definition, cannot be quantified. Nevertheless, it is a serious matter and it remains a Government priority to continue to build on the recent progress made in the campaign against fraud. During the United Kingdom presidency, the rules for the integrated administration and control system were agreed by the Council. This system is designed to clamp down on fraud under the reformed CAP schemes and is to be applied equally in all member states. Additionally, following CAP reform, expenditure on export refunds, which has always provided scope for fraud, will be reduced. The Government will continue to take every opportunity to ensure action is taken by the Commission and our Community partners to improve fraud prevention and awareness.

Dairy Farming

21. Mr. Knox: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he will next meet the chairman of the milk marketing boards to discuss the dairy sector.

Mr. Gummer: I met the chairman of the milk marketing board on 18 March.

Fishing

22. Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what recent representations he has received from national and local associations representing the fishing industry about the state of the fishing industry.

Mr. Curry: I and my right hon. and hon. Friends at the Scottish Office have had numerous meetings and other discussions with associations representing fishermen throughout the country.

General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade

23. Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the effect on United Kingdom agriculture policy of progress of the GATT negotiations.

Mr. Gummer: The agreement reached between the EC and the United States on agriculture last November provides the basis for a balanced, multilateral agreement which is consistent with the reforms of the CAP agreed in May 1992.

Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy

24. Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what recent estimate he has made as to when BSE will be eradicated.

Mr. Soames: There is growing evidence to support the view that measures taken by the Government should be sufficient to bring about the disappearance of BSE, but it is impossible to predict how long this process will take.

Food (Cost)

25. Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the relative cost to the consumer of food in Britain and France.

Mr. Soames: None.

Milk Marketing Boards

26. Mr. Burden: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what discussions he has had with milk producers on the question of the milk marketing boards' future.

Mr. Gummer: Discussions with representatives of all sectors of the industry have been held frequently since the milk marketing board began to consider the options for future marketing arrangements open to it.

Animal Welfare

28. Mr. Burns: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on changes in animal welfare since 1987.

Mr. Soames: Since 1987, regulations have come into force which ban the veal crate, phase out close confinement systems for pigs, set standards for battery hens and general welfare standards for all farm livestock.

Two new welfare codes for goats and farmed deer have been made.

Orders have been made to give further protection to all animals during transport and to farm animals and horses at markets.

Regulations have been made to give further protection to the welfare of livestock and poultry at slaughter and on the licensing of poultry slaughtermen. The Welfare of Animals at Slaughter Act 1991 provides powers to implement further welfare measures recommended by the Farm Animal Welfare Council, and statutory codes of practice have been introduced on the welfare of poultry and red meat animals at slaughter.

We are pressing for the high standards of animal welfare in this country to be extended throughout the European Community.

Potatoes

27. Mr. Madden: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what discussions he has had with the Potato Marketing Board about the ending of the potato marketing scheme.

Mr. Curry: My right hon. Friend the Minister and I have met both the past and present chairmen of the Potato Marketing Board to discuss the EC proposals for a regime in potatoes which, as drafted, would mean the end of the potato marketing scheme.

29. Mr. Kynoch: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received from potato producers about the proposed EC potato regime.

Mr. Curry: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given on 22 March 1993 to my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, North (Mr. Gale), at column 503.

Herbicides

Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will review the guidelines on the use of herbicides in particular Glyphosate on cover crops for set-aside purposes.

Mr. Curry: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given on 17 March to my hon. Friend the Member for New Forest (Sir P. McNair-Wilson), at column 284.

Meat Inspectors

Mr. Gill: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many meat inspectors are employed in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Soames: There are about 1,200 full-time equivalent meat inspectors employed in the United Kingdom.

Horses

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received about the welfare of horses on farms and elsewhere; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Soames: The Department receives a small number of letters on the welfare of horses on farms and elsewhere. The welfare of horses used for agriculture is protected by the Agriculture (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1968, compliance with which is monitored by the state veterinary service. Further safeguards are laid down in orders under the Animal Health Act 1981 on the welfare of horses during transport and at markets. Controls on the export of horses, on which many representations are received, remain in place as provided for in directive 91/628/EEC.

Other aspects of the welfare of horses are the responsibility of my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary.

Badgers

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many applications have been received under the Protection of Badgers Act 1992 to enter dogs into badger setts; and how many have been granted, by region.

Mr. Soames: The Ministry has received 13 applications to permit the entry of dogs into badger setts. No licences have been issued.

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what conditions are applied to licences granted for the purpose of entering dogs into badger setts.

Mr. Soames: No such licences have been issued.

Fisheries Protection

Mr. Patrick Thompson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he intends to use the Royal Navy to undertake fisheries protection duties in 1993-94; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Curry: The provision of surface surveillance is one of a number of services being market tested by my Department as part of its contribution to the "Competing for Quality" White Paper published in November 1991, Cm 1730.

Following detailed negotiations, I can confirm that my Department will continue to use the Royal Navy for fisheries protection duties in 1993-94. The operating arrangements for the Royal Naval vessels are being improved so as to increase their effectiveness.

Genetic Diversity

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to his answer of 5 March, Official Report, column 313, on genetic diversity in plants, if he will make it his policy to reduce the initial registration fee for a plant variety from £800 to £100, and the annual fee from £400 to £25.

Mr. Curry: National Listing fees vary depending on the species and function concerned, and the cost of the work involved. Fees are reviewed annually in consultation with the industry and every effort is made to keep fees as low as possible.

Mr Hanley: Information in the form requested is not readily available and could be compiled only at disproportionate cost. I will, however, arrange to have placed in the Library copies of each education and library board's budget statements for 1991-92 and 1992-93 which contain detailed information on individual schools' delegated budget allocations.

Mr. Peter Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the average cost per pupil in each of the voluntary grammar schools in each education and library board area in Northern Ireland for the last five years.

Mr. Hanley: The information is as follows:

3. Prior to 1 April 1991 voluntary grammar schools were funded on an academic year basis (from 1 August to 31 July). With the introduction of Local Management of Schools at 1 April 1991, funding was based on the Financial year (1 April to 31 March). In order to effect the transition, funding in 1990-91 was restricted to an 8 month period (1 August to 31 March). The information relating to this 8 month period has been omitted due to its distorting effect.

Electricity Supply

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement about tariffs for industrial users of electricity in Northern Ireland in the light of the coal review White Paper.

Sir Patrick Mayhew: I welcome the fact that the coal review White Paper deals fully with Northern Ireland energy matters. Following consultation with the Director General of Electricity Supply for Northern Ireland, I have agreed to extend existing transitional support for large users of electricity in Northern Ireland to cover all monthly billed industrial consumers and to lengthen the period during which this support is available to four years.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Insolvency

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will detail measures taken by the Government to comply with European Council directive —EEC 80/987; and if he will make a statement.

Miss Widdecombe: Most of the provisions of this directive concern employment protection measures on employer insolvency which is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment.

In so far as social security contributions to the state scheme are concerned, the national insurance system guarantees benefits from the national insurance fund according to the type and level of contributions paid into it. If, for any reason, including the insolvency of the employer, an employer fails to make a class 1 contribution, or pays it late, that contribution will be deemed paid under the Social Security (Contributions) Regulations 1979 unless the employee has been negligent or in some way connived with the employer in the failure to pay.

In so far as occupational pensions are concerned, United Kingdom law satifies the requirements of the directive by a range of measures.

The Employment Protection (Consolidation) Act 1978 makes the Secretary of State liable to pay contributions due from an insolvent employer to an occupational pension scheme. The relevant contributions include, subject to certain limits, both employees' contributions deducted by the employer from the employees' pay and arrears of contributions due from the employer.

In addition, funds are protected from the creditors of the employer in the events of his insolvency by virtue of being set up as irrevocable trusts independent of the employer. The funds set aside for paying pensions are transferred out of the ownership of the employer and into the ownership of the trustees of the pension scheme. The law places the trustees under a strict obligation to act prudently and in the interest of the beneficiaries.

Pensioners (Fuel Prices)

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when pensioners will receive the benefit uprating reflecting the April 1994 rise in fuel prices.

Mr. Burt: Pensions and other benefits will increase automatically to reflect the impact of any increase in fuel bills on the indices used to uprate benefits. Moreover, extra help will be given from April 1994 to poorer pensioners and other people on low incomes to assist with higher fuel bills as soon as they arise.

Means-tested Benefits

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will update the answer of 3 March, Official Report, column 203, on the number of taxpaying households in receipt of means-tested benefits, giving estimates for 1993-94

Mr. Burt: My reply to the hon. Member on 3 March 1993 shows the position at May 1990 which is the latest date for which the information requested is available.

Forecasting methods currently used by the Department for housing benefit and council tax benefit do not produce forecasts for specific types of taxpaying household. Forecasting methods are being developed which will enable forecasts of some broad grouping of households. It is anticipated that these developments will be available later this year.

National Insurance

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how much extra an employee on £13,000 per annum will pay in national insurance contributions according to his Budget proposals.

Miss Widdecombe: An employee earning £13,000 per annum would pay an extra £1·94 per week in national insurance contributions in 1994-95 compared with 1993-94.

Note: The calculation assumes that the Lower Earnings Limit of £56 per week for 1993-94 applies in 1994-95. However, if the Lower Earnings Limit for 1994-95 is raised as usual in line with an increase in the rate of the basic Retirement Pension, the additional contributions payable will be slightly less.

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the number of people in 1993-94 who pay national insurance contributions but are not liable to income tax.

Miss Widdecombe [pursuant to her reply, 25 February 1993, columns 681-82]: It is estimated that in 1993-94 there will continue to be in the region of 0·5 million contributors whose earnings fall below the PAYE threshold.

Self-employment

Mr. Sproat: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list (a) the number of occasions, in each of the last 10 years, when an inquiry has been set up under section 17 of the Social Security Administration Act 1992 and its predecessor section and Act to consider cases where persons claiming to be self-employed were considered by his Department to be employed and (b) the number of occasions when, on receipt of the inquirer's report, the original decision of his Department that the person was not self-employed but employed was overturned.

Miss Widdecombe: Information is not held in the precise form requested. Such information as is available is in the table.

(1) Financial year	(2) Number of Decisions on Employment Status	(3) Number of Inquiries on Employment Status	(4) Number of Decisions where Department's "Employed" View Overturned after Inquiry
1982-83	40	40	1
1983-84	42	40	2
1984-85	65	64	3
1985-86	43	40	5
1986-87	45	39	3
1987-88	67	36	8
1988-89	61	50	8
1989-90	54	36	6
1990-91	67	45	15
1991-92	58	34	11
TOTAL	542	424	62 (14·6 per cent.)

Note: Column (3)—it is not possible to indentify separately those inquiries set up to consider cases where persons claiming to be self-employed were considered by the Department to be employed.

Pensioners

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many pensioners (a) in the United Kingdom and (b) in the Chelmsford consituency have a private pension or state earnings-related pension (i) in total, (ii) of up to £5 per week, (iii) of £6 to £10 per week, (iv) of £11 to £15 per week, (v) of £16 to £20 per week and (vi) in excess of £21 per week.

Miss Widdecombe: The information is not available in the form requested. Information relating to the numbers in receipt of private pensions in the Chelmsford constituency is not available. Information relating to the numbers in receipt of SERPS in the Chelmsford contsituency could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. Information regarding those in receipt of SERPS in Great Britain is given in the tables (a) and (b).

Table (a) by net amount of SERPS (after contracted out deduction) at 31 March 1992

Weekly amount (£)	Number
0·01 to 4·99	1,932,990
5·00 to 9·99	819,460
10·00 to 14·99	307,360
15·00 to 19·99	153,680
20·00+	214,830
All	3,428,320

Table (b) by notional gross amount of SERPS (before contracted out deduction) at 31 March 1992

Weekly amount (£)	Number

5·00 to 9·99	695,530
10·00 to 14·99	494,260
15·00 to 19·99	351,140
20·00+	703,420
All	3,443,890

It is not possible to give estimates regarding receipt of "private pension". Table (c) gives estimates for receipt of occupational pension based on the 1989 family expenditure survey.

Table (c) receipt of occupational pension by individuals in pensioner units

Weekly amount (£)	Number (000's)
0·01 to 4·99	400
5·00 to 9·99	600
10·00 to 14·99	500
15·00 to 19·99	400
20·00+	2,400
All	4,300

Notes:
1. "Contracted-out deduction" is the amount by which additional pension is reduced where a person has been a member of pension scheme which is contracted-out of SERPS or a personal pension scheme used in place of additional pension.
2. A pensioner unit is a single person aged over state pensionable age (SPA) or a couple where the husband is aged over SPA.
3. It is not possible to draw a correlation between the information regarding SERPS at Tables (a) and (b) and the estimates on receipt of occupational pensions at Table (c).

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) for how many pensioners in (a) the Chelmsford constituency and (b) the United Kingdom their only source of income is the state retirement pensions;

(2) how many pensioners there are living in (a) the Chelmsford parliamentary constituency and (b) the United Kingdom.

Miss Widdecombe: The information is not available in the form requested. Information relating to the Chelmsford constituency is not available.

It is estimated that, in 1989, there were 7 million pensioner units in the UK of which 1 million had no income other than from state benefits. Income support is available to pensioners whose only source of income is basic state retirement pension at either the single or married couple rate and who do not have savings or capital in excess of £3,000.

Notes:
1. A pensioner unit is a single person aged over state pensionable age (SPA) or a couple where the husband is aged over SPA.
2. State benefit is any social security benefit or pension (including housing benefit) payable by the State.
3. Estimates are based on the 1989 Family Expenditure Survey.

Unemployment Benefit

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate he has made of the approximate proportion of those previously on unemployment benefit who after one year are still available for work, but who nevertheless make no subsequent claim to which they are entitled, and who do not form a component of the published statistics; and if he will state the approximate numbers of persons in this category who first became eligible for unemployment benefit in January, February and March 1992, respectively.

Mr. Burt: The information requested is not available. At November 1992, 368,000 people were registered unemployed for the purpose of claiming national insurance credits only and were included in the published statistics. Of these, 86,000 had exhausted their entitlement to unemployment benefit.

Source: Half yearly Analysis of Unemployed Claimants November 1992.

Executive Operations

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what performance targets he is setting for his Department's executive operations for 1993-94; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lilley: The targets for 1993-94 which I have set for DSS executive operations are set out in the table. The targets support the continued success of the Government's next steps agencies and the citizens charter initiative.

A number of changes have been made to the format and range of the targets to improve the measures of performance. The targets I have set represent a challenging level of performance, and an improvement in the service the customers receive.

As well as the following performance targets, agencies have been set resource management targets requiring them to deliver their plans within their agreed financial allocation and, where appropriate, to make efficiency savings. They also have a number of milestone targets to achieve. These and the resource management targets are set out in 1993-94 business plans, which also contain further information on performance targets.

The business plan of the Benefits Agency will be published today; those of the Information Technology Services Agency, the Child Support Agency and the Resettlement Agency on 31 March; and that of the Contributions Agency on 2 April. I will arrange for copies of the plans to be placed in the Library.

Child Support Agency

The Child Support Agency is a new business which has no historical data on which to base a full set of performance targets. I have therefore set a limited range of targets for 1993-94 which will be expanded in 1994-95. The targets for 1993-94 are:

60 per cent. of people with the care of children making eligible applications to the Agency to have maintenance arranged[3].

Annual Benefit Savings—£530 million.

65 per cent. of clients to regard the service as satisfactory.

Notes:

[1] Clearance times normally cover the period from date of receipt of a written claim in the Agency to the date of decision/payment. All days refer to working days. All targets, apart from that for Social fund Crisis Loans are expressed in the formula X per cent. of claims cleared in Y days. The calculated average clearance time equivalent of the X in Y targets is:

Income Support 4·0 days; Social Fund Community Care Grants 6·7 days;
Sickness/Invalidity Benefit 7·5 days; Family Credit 13 days.

[2] Incapacity benefits is an overall term used to cover Sickness Benefit, Invalidity Benefit, Severe Disablement Allowance and Maternity Allowance.

[3] Eligible applications are those where there is a liability to pay maintenance—excluding, for example, applications from those with over age children or absent parents living abroad.

Scottish Development Agency

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how much of the finance for the work of the Scottish Development Agency came from European Community sources in each year since 1985-86; and how much is expected to come to Scottish Enterprise in each year until 1995-96.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 15 March 1993]: Receipts from the European Community in respect of projects and programmes delivered by the Scottish Development Agency, until 1990-91, and by Scottish Enterprise, from 1991-92, are as follows:

The figures for the European regional development fund for the years 1985-86 to 1990-91 include receipts from the European social fund, as these were not separately attributed for these years.

The figures for 1992-93 are estimated outturns; those for 1993-94 relate to forecast receipts. Receipts in future years will depend upon the success of Scottish Enterprise in securing European funding. The sums exclude direct receipts to the local enterprise companies, which have since 1992 been eligible to apply for financial assistance from the European regional development fund and the European social fund.

The outturn figures represent grants paid by the Scottish Office at the rate of 75 per cent. of approved costs incurred by local authorities on urban programme projects. Grants are paid on the basis of claims submitted by local authorities in respect of expenditure incurred in the previous financial year.

The urban programme in Scotland was introduced in 1969.

Water and Sewerage

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland, pursuant to his answer of 18 March, Official Report, column 390, about a meeting between a water and sewerage company and officials of the Scottish Office, what was the company; when and where the meeting was held; who were the participants; and what was discussed.

Sir Hector Monro [holding answer 23 March 1993]: The meeting was held in February this year in the offices of the Scottish Office in Edinburgh. Senior officials from both sides attended and discussed matters arising out of the company's response to the consultation paper "Investing For Our Future". The company requested that their response to the consultation paper should be treated as confidential. Discussions have been held, and continue to be held, with a wide range of bodies who wish to offer views on the future structure of Scottish water services or to amplify their responses to the consultation paper.

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland, pursuant to his answer of 18 March, Official Report, column 390, which three water and sewerage companies submitted formal responses to the consultation paper; and when each submission was received.

Sir Hector Monro [holding answer 23 March 1993]: North West Water's response was dated 28 January 1993. Responses from two other companies were dated 28 January and 26 January. These companies asked that their responses should be treated as confidential.

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland, pursuant to his answer of 18 March, Official Report, column 390, if he will publish in full or in summary the formal responses received to the consultation paper from the three water and sewerage companies, together with ancillary correspondence.

Sir Hector Monro [holding answer 23 March 1993]: Responses to the consultation paper "Investing For Our Future", apart from those from respondents who requested confidentiality, are available in the Scottish Office library in Edinburgh. Copies of particular responses can be obtained through the Library of the House. Other correspondence received by the Scottish Office is treated in confidence in the normal way.

European Community

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many persons, and of what grade or level, have been seconded to (a) the European Commission and (b) UKREP.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 23 March 1993]: Six Scottish Office officials are currently seconded to the European Commission. Five are at unified grade 7 level; one is a senior agricultural officer. One Scottish Office official at unified grade 5 level has been seconded to the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and is posted to the office of the United Kingdom Permanent Representative to the European Communities.

Concessionary Rail Fares

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the local authorities in Scotland which operate concessionary fare schemes for travel on the railways, indicating which of them operate schemes for (a) the elderly, (b) the disabled, (c) the blind and (d) young people.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 24 March 1993]: The following Scottish local authorities operate concessionary fare schemes for travel on the railways for the following categories of person:

Region	Category of person
Central	elderly, disabled and blind people
Fife	elderly, disabled, blind and students[1]
Grampian	elderly, disabled and blind people
Highland	elderly, disabled and blind people
Lothian	elderly, disabled and blind people
Strathclyde	elderly, disabled and blind people
Tayside	elderly, disabled and blind people

[1] Students aged 16-18.

British Rail operates a commercial concessionary fares scheme for juveniles.

Red Deer Commission

Mr. Norman Hogg: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what key points he has asked the Red Deer Commission to consider following the consultation exercise on deer legislation 1991-92.

Sir Hector Monro [holding answer 24 March 1993]: The consultation exercise on deer legislation produced differing views on such matters as how best to respond to damage by deer to the natural habitat, control schemes to reduce deer stocks and the status and powers of deer management groups. I have asked the Red Deer Commission to examine these questions as well as other points of detail which require further consideration.

Road Bridges

Mr. Norman Hogg: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what progress has been made on road bridge strengthening by his Department and local authorities; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 24 March 1993]: The current year is the fourth year of a bridge assessment and strengthening programme to upgrade by 1999 when the UK's derogation on the 40 tonne lorry ends. The assessment of 420 trunk road bridges in stage 1 is already complete and assessment of the final 38 is well under way. Of these trunk road bridges, some 50 have been identified as needing some remedial treatment. Of these 50, 10 have already been treated and all will be capable of handling the required loads by 1999. Similarly, the early objective of the local authority programmes is to assess and upgrade bridges on Scotland's other major arteries and other routes of local importance.

Energy Study

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish the Scottish energy study which was submitted to the European Commission in 1992; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stewart: [holding answer 24 March 1993]: The Scottish energy study is funded primarily by the European Commission and Scottish Enterprise. It is for those bodies to decide about publication of the study report.

Crafts

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what consideraton was given to the funding of craft in Scotland by way of the Scottish Arts Council.

Sir Hector Monro: [holding answer 24 March 1993]: My right hon. Friend announced in answer to a question from the right hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Sir D. Steel) on 1 February 1993 Official Report, col. 37, his intention to provide financial support to Scottish craftmakers. My right hon. Friend concluded that both the Scottish Arts Council and the Crafts Council should participate in the provision of support for craftmakers and he is currently considering the role each organisation will play in the new arrangements. He will announce his decisions in due course.

Opencast Mining

Mr. Dover: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what effect opencast coal mining has had on restoration of derelict land, extension of wildlife areas, extension of woodlands and hedgerows and development of recreation facilities over the past (a) five and (b) 10 years.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 24 March 1993]: We do not hold any such statistics centrally. However, Scottish Development Department circular 4/1984 on opencast coal mining requires development plans to include policies and proposals on the restoration and aftercare of such sites, in order to facilitate their beneficial reuse. It also requires planning authorities to consider the extent to which development proposals can contribute to longer term environmental improvements through such site restoration.

According to national statistics compiled by the County Planning Officers Society, including returns from Scottish local authorities, 2,525 hectares of land in Scotland received planning permission for opencast mining between 1988 and 1992; of this, 563 hectares was derelict land. In addition, some 1,708 hectares have already been restored and are now in aftercare.

Crime Statistics

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what proportion of convicted individuals who (a) are sent to prison and (b) have a fine imposed upon them, reoffend within (i) 12 months, (ii) two years or (iii) five years.

Social Workers

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many (a) men and (b) women have undertaken approved social work training courses in each of the past 10 years; and how many are currently taking such courses.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 15 March 1993]: The number of individuals entering approved qualifying courses in social work in Scotland is detailed in the table. No breakdown is available by gender.

Year	Intake
1982	533
1983	444
1984	487
1985	489
1986	513

1990	500
1991	434
1992	[1]397

[1] This figure does not include spring intakes for the 1992-93 academic year.

There are currently 831 individuals taking qualifying courses in social work over two and in some cases three, years.

Information of the numbers completing approved social work training in Scotland over the last 10 years is not available separately from United Kingdom figures until 1991 when 417 persons completed such training.

Dental Services

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many dentists and dental surgeons are in practice in (a) Inverclyde, (b) Strathclyde and (c) Scotland as a whole who (i) treat NHS patients, (ii) treat private patients only and (iii) until 1991 treated NHS patients but have ceased to do so.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 15 March 1993]: In order to be accepted onto a health board dental list dentists must undertake to provide general dental services under national health service arrangements. No information is available about dentists who treat private patients only. The number of dentists registered at 31 December 1992 in each of the health board areas within Strathclyde region and the total number of dentists registered in Scotland is contained in the table. Information for individual local government district and regional areas is not available. According to information held by health boards—February 1993—since 1991 one general dental practitioner in Fife health board area and one in Tayside health board area have left their dental lists because they no longer wish to provide national health service dental services.

Number of Dentists on Health Board Dental Lists in Scotland at 31 December 1992

Health Board	Number of Dentists
Argyll and Clyde	160
Ayrshire and Arran	120
Greater Glasgow	348
Lanarkshire	141
Scotland (Total)	1,680

HEALTH

West Midlands RHA

Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the annual cost of wages and salaries paid to the employees of West Midlands regional health authority.

Mr. Sackville: In 1991-92 the West Midlands regional health authority incurred gross expenditure on salaries and wages, including national insurance and superannuation contributions, of £29·88 million. This figure covers staff of many disciplines employed by the authority both at headquarters level and on the provision of certain operational services within the region. In addition the authority met the gross salaries and wages costs of medical staff—mainly senior registrars, £15·22 million—and ambulance staff—£12·78 million.

For more detailed information, I refer my hon. Friend to the chairman of the West Midlands regional health authority.

Life Expectancy

Mr. Spellar: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what were the estimates of life expectancy in each of the last 10 years.

Mr. Sackville: This information is shown in the table.

Life expectancy at birth United Kingdom (1979 to 1991, Male and Female)

Year	Life expectancy at birth Male	Female
1979	70·2	76·2

Abortions

Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many fee-paying, private wing abortions were performed in NHS hospitals, in each regional health authority in England and Wales in the latest available year.

Mr. Sackville: Information relating to private abortions carried out in national health service hospitals are derived from the hospital episodes statistics—HES—system. There are problems with the data derived from this system which are being investigated by the Department. It is not possible to provide figures for each regional health authority, but analyses suggest about 1,700 private abortions were recorded on HES as being carried out in NHS hospitals in England in 1990-91.

Oral Contraceptives

Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health in what way the formulae of the more expensive brands of oral contraceptive differ from the formulae of the cheaper brands; what is the difference in the degree of health risk between more expensive brands and cheaper brands; and what are the relative clinical benefits of the more expensive brands.

Dr. Mawhinney: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave the hon. Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mrs. Fyfe) on 11 February at columns 757-59 which details hormonal composition and cost of each brand of oral contraceptive currently marketed. Before any medicinal product may be marketed in the United Kingdom the licensing authority must be satisfied as to its safety, quality and efficacy. Neither the licensing authority nor its advisory committee, the Committee on Safety of Medicines, has the remit to take into consideration the cost of a medicine.

Oral contraceptives containing high doses of hormones are more likely than low dose preparations to cause side effects. Doctors should use their training, knowledge and experience to weigh carefully the likely benefits against the anticipated risk before choosing the most appropriate treatment for the individual patient.

Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the British Medical Association's response has been to the Government's proposals to restrict oral contraceptive prescriptions.

Dr. Mawhinney: We have received no such response from the British Medical Association.

Cancer

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are the five most common cancers among NHS patients.

Mr. Sackville: In 1987, the latest year for which information is available, cancer registration statistics for England and Wales show that the most common malignant neoplasms registered were:

	Total number of registrations	Percentages
Male
Lung	25,440	23
Skin	14,796	14
Large intestine and rectum	12,268	11
Prostrate	10,837	10
Bladder	7,153	7
Female
Breast	23,742	22
Skin	14,593	14
Large intestine and rectum	12,779	12
Lung	10,838	10
Leukaemias and lymphomas	6,223	6

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is her estimate of the annual number of preventable cases of primary liver cancer; and what are the chief causes of those cases.

Mr. Sackville: This information is not available centrally. In 1991, 510 men and 242 women died from primary liver cancer. Excessive consumption of alcohol and the hepatitis B virus are among the main contributing factors.

Child Minders

Miss Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what action she is taking to ensure that registered child minders are properly recompensed and given appropriate training and support to ensure that the service they provide is of the highest possible standard;

(2) what action she is taking to encourage the local authority registration of child minders and to ensure that registration leads to a good quality child care service; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Yeo: Parents and child minders should be free to negotiate charges and other aspects of child care arrangements.

The registration system introduced in the Children Act, 1989, which came into force in October 1991, provides a framework for regulating childminding and other forms of day care used by children under eight. The system includes a mandatory inspection at least once a year to ensure acceptable and consistent standards of care, and this can be used to encourage improvements if necessary. Further guidance was issued in January to ensure that local authorities apply the system sensibly and flexibly. The Act also empowers local authorities to provide training, advice, guidance and counselling for those providing day care for young children.

In addition the Department has grant aided the National Childminding Association since it was set up in 1977 to support its work of encouraging child minders to raise their standards.

London Initiative Zone

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much of the £170 million to be spent on capital improvement in the London initiative zone is new money, financed directly from the Department of Health; and how much is money already put aside by the regional health authorities for this purpose.

Dr. Mawhinney: The Department is committed to the investment of £170 million additional expenditure on primary care capital development in the London initiative zone over the next six years. This will include a shift in the balance of investment in London towards primary care, in line with the proposals for change set out in "Making London Better". We will be looking at the pattern of funding required year by year in consultation with the four Thames regional health authorities.

NHS Services (Purchasing)

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are the guidelines covering the buying in of services from private hospitals and clinics by the NHS; which NHS hospitals in London currently make use of such arrangements; and if she will list those services.

Mr. Sackville: The Department encourages the cost-effective co-operation and contracting between the national health service and independent sector. This increases the range of options available to patients, their general practitioners and health service managers.

Details of such arrangements are not held centrally; the extent to which NHS hospitals contract with private hospitals and clinics is for local decision.

London Ambulance Service

Mr. Thomason: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she has yet received the report from the South West Thames regional health authority on its proposals to strengthen accountability of the London ambulance service following the publication of the inquiry report on 25 February.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I have today received a report from the South West Thames regional health authority on its proposals to strengthen the accountability of the London ambulance service. The report contains a number of detailed proposals. I will be considering these proposals and will inform the House of the new arrangements as soon as possible.

Medicines Evaluation Agency

Mr. Thomason: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will make a statement on the proposed siting of the European Medicines Evaluation Agency in the United Kingdom.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Discussions have been held with the pharmaceutical industry which has made it clear that it believes the London area offers the most promising site for the European Medicines Evaluation Agency, if the agency is sited in the United Kingdom. The Government support this preference on the part of an industry which does 8 per cent. of the world's pharmaceutical research and development in the United Kingdom, provides us with an export surplus of £1.2 billion, and offers high quality jobs for 89,000 people.

Ambulance Service

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will list for each ambulance service and ambulance trust in England and Wales, the charges that are levied on national health service patients.

Mr. Sackville: There is no charge for the emergency ambulance service. Non-emergency patient transport is provided free of charge to all national health service patients considered by their doctor to be medically unfit to travel by other means.

Breast Cancer

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to her answer of 15 March, Official Report, column 11, what was the number of (a) NHS consultant oncologist posts in England and Wales and (b) women diagnosed to be suffering from breast cancer in 1981; what is the current oncologist ratio for women suffering from breast cancer in England and Wales; and what is the current five-year survival rate for women treated for breast cancer.

Mr. Sackville: At 30 September 1981 there were 18 whole-time equivalent—wte—posts in England and Wales in medical oncology. In 1986 the ratio of wte consultants to patients treated for breast cancer was 1:869.

The number of cancer registrations for female breast cancer in 1981 for England and Wales was 21,164. Survival rates relating to 1981 registrations of breast cancer are shown in the table:

Age group	5-year percentage survival rates
25-34	60·98
35-44	69·09
45-54	64·68
55-64	57·13
65-74	52·74
75-84	37·48
85 and over	15·06

Royal Marsden Hospital

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will investigate the refurbishment of the office of the chief executive of the Royal Marsden hospital; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Sackville: No.

Dentists

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health by how much payments to dentists have exceeded Government estimates for each year since 1987; how much was paid by Government; and how much by patients.

Dr. Mawhinney: The detailed information is given in the table. On average over these years, for every £100 of gross expenditure on the general dental services about £67 is net Government expenditure and about £33 is charge income collected from patients.

High Security Care

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if she will make a statement on the future of Rampton hospital;

(2) when she expects to publish the Reed committee's report on the future of high security care;

(3) what plans she has to place services for mentally disordered offenders into the internal market; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Yeo: The working group on high security psychiatric services chaired by Dr. John Reed expects to submit its report next month. We shall be taking decisions on the future provision of these services in the light of the working group's recommendations. There are no current plans to close Rampton hospital or the other special hospitals.

Prescription Charges

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) whether she will consider including chronic asthma sufferers in the list of those exempt from prescription charges;

(2) which chronic illnesses exempt sufferers from prescription charges.

Dr. Mawhinney: This information is listed in regulation 6.(1)(e) of the National Health Service (Charges for Drugs and Appliances) Regulations 1989—SI 1989 No. 419—a copy of which is available in the Library. We have no plans to extend the list.

Mental Illness Hospitals

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to her answer of 16 July 1992, Official Report, columns 904-5, if she will provide an updated version of the list of specialist mental illness hospitals planned for closure by 1997.

Mr. Yeo [holding answer 11 March 1993]: The information requested is not routinely collected centrally. The information published in my reply to the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) on 16 July 1992 at col. 904-05 was collected in the course of a special survey for other purposes. In order to carry forward its work the mental health task force led by Mr. David King will, in future, need to collect information of this type. I will place a copy in the Library as soon as it is available.

Consultants

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many finished consultant episodes in acute specialties were undertaken (a) within and (b) outside the patient's district of residence, in each district health authority and regional health authority for each year since 1989-90.

Mr. Sackville: [holding answer 11 March 1993]: Information for the years 1989-90 and 1990-91, the latest available, has now been placed in the Library.

EMPLOYMENT

Electricity at Work Regulations 1989

Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if she will consider amending the Electricity at Work Regulations 1989, in order to reduce expense caused to the United Kingdom hotel industry.

Mr. McLoughlin: We are always ready to consider amending any regulations for which this Department is responsible if we become convinced that their enforcement is imposing unintended and unreasonable burdens on industry. In this case, however, the evidence which we have does not indicate that these regulations or their enforcers are imposing such burdens, but rather that the regulations are being systematically misrepresented by some parties so as to promote their own business interests at the expense of others. We are having further inquiries made into this. Meanwhile, we are asking the chairman of the Health and Safety Commission to arrange for the Health and Safety Executive to continue clarifying, expanding and publicising its guidance to employers on this subject so that such misrepresentations, even if continued, will become less likely to be effective.

Child Minding

Miss Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what action she is taking to ensure that a good quality child minding service is available nationwide for working parents who require it.

Mr. McLoughlin: On 16 December 1992 my right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State, announced an out-of-school child care grant with £45 million of Government funding over the next three years, to help create 50,000 after-school and holiday childcare places for the over-fives. Training and enterprise councils in England and Wales, and local enterprise companies in Scotland, will develop their own local plans which may include child minding on domestic premises.

"Age Barriers at Work"

Ms Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what response she has made to the report, "Age Barriers at Work", produced by the Metropolitan Authorities Recruitment Agency, a copy of which has been sent to her Department.

Mr. McLoughlin: The Metropolitan Authorities Recruitment Agency is to be congratulated on this very thorough, well-presented report. I agree with its conclusion that age discrimination is detrimental to the interests of employers as well as employees. I hope that the examples of good practice in the report will be widely adopted.

Training

Mr. Boateng: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment (1) what plans she has to visit the Kilburn skills training centre;

(2) what representations she has received on the allocation of funding for training in the London borough of Brent;

(3) for whether she will review the funding of training in London borough of Brent.

Mr. McLoughlin: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has no plans at present to visit the Kilburn skills training centre which is jointly funded by Brent council and North West London training and enterprise council. The planning and provision of Government funded training programmes for the boroughs of Brent and Harrow is the responsibility of North West London training and enterprise council. My right hon. Friend has received no representations on the allocation of funding for training in the London borough of Brent. North West London training and enterprise council is currently negotiating with training providers in its area over the provision of youth and adult training for 1993-94. No review of funding for training in the London borough of Brent is planned by the Department.

Business Start-up Programme

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many business start-up places there were in March 1989 and at the most recent available date; what was the level of unemployment at each of those dates; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. McLoughlin: In March 1989, approximately 89,000 people were receiving a business start-up allowance—then known as an enterprise allowance—compared with approximately 39,000 at the end of January 1993, the most recent date available.

The seasonally adjusted level of claimant unemployment in the United Kingdom stood at 1,896,600 in March 1989, and at 2,971,100 in February 1993.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many new jobs will be created following the additional places to be created on the business start-up programme in 1993-94; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. McLoughlin: The objective of the expansion of the business start-up programme is to enable 10,000 more unemployed people to set up their own business. Any further jobs created as those businesses become established and develop are a most welcome additional outcome but they cannot be forecast.

Mrs. Dunwoody To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what percentage of (a) the long-term unemployed and (b) all unemployed people will be affected by the 10,000 additional places created in the business start-up plan announced in the Budget.

Mr. McLoughlin: The information is not available.

Protection of Employment Regulations

Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what measures her Department is taking to ensure that the Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations 1981 are enforced when businesses or undertakings are transferred to another employer.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Individuals or recognised trade unions who wish to enforce rights given to them by the regulations are able to do so by complaining to an industrial tribunal.

Offshore Safety

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment, pursuant to her answer 15 March, Official Report, columns 62-63, if she will list those recommended prosecution actions for breaches of offshore safety legislation which went to court in (a) Scotland and (b) England; which were the firms involved; and what convictions and penalties were imposed by the courts where the prosecutions were successful.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The information requested by the hon. Member is as follows:

Company	Penalty on Conviction £
(a) Prosecutions in Scottish Courts
Allseas Marine	850
Smedvig Ltd.	20,000
Amoco (United Kingdom) Exploration	5,000
Atlantic Drilling	100,000
Atlantic Drilling	1,000
Stena Offshore Ltd.	30,000
Stena Offshore Ltd.—employee	1,000
Sedco Forex Drilling Services Ltd.	1,000
ETPM Serevices (United Kingdom)	5,000
BP Exploration	10,000
(b) Prosecutions in English Courts

Cases against two companies failed to gain convictions.

Workstart

Mrs. Jane Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what measures and monitoring procedures she intends to introduce to ensure job substitution does not occur under the proposed workstart schemes.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Participating organisations will be required to give an undertaking that workstart recruits will not displace existing employees. I will be receiving proposals on the design of the pilots, including appropriate monitoring procedures, from the training and enterprise councils and employment service area offices concerned.

Benefits (Disallowance)

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment when, and in what ways, the guidelines given to adjudication officers on possible disallowance for benefit cases have been changed since November 1990 in respect of the actively seeking work and availability for work test; what proposals she has for setting performance targets for benefit adjudication officers; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. McLoughlin: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service Agency under its chief executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from M E G Fugden to Mr. Rhodri Morgan, dated 25 March 1993:

As the Employment Service is an Executive Agency, the Secretary of State has asked me to write to you direct to repond to your Parliamentary Question about guidelines given to adjudication officers, and what proposals there are for setting performance targets for adjudication officers. This is something which falls within the responsibilities delegated to me as Chief Executive of the Agency.

All decisions on claims for unemployment benefit are made by independent adjudication authorities. Guidance for adjudication officers about deciding unemployment benefit claims is included in the Adjudication Officers Guide (AOG) which is issued by the Central Adjudication Service (CAS).

The AOG brings together statute law and caselaw and provides guidance on how to apply these provisions to determine entitlement to benefit. It is published by Her Majesty's Stationery Office and is available to member of the public through libraries and welfare rights groups such as Citizens Advice Bureaux.

I have contacted CAS who state there have been no changes in the guidance issued to adjudication officers concerning actively seeking work conditions and availability for work since November 1990.

There are currently no plans for setting performance targets for adjudication officers. Targets for the clearance of appeals to Social Security Appeal Tribunals (SSAT) will be introduced however, from 1 April 1993. These targets will relate to the time taken for clearance of appeals either to the SSAT, or in some other way, such as allowed on review or withdrawn.

I hope this is helpful.

As decided by the Administrative Committee of the House of Commons, Chief Executive replies to written parliamentary Questions will now be published in the Official Report. I will also place a copy of this letter in the Library of the House.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what estimate she has made of the approximate proportion of those previously on unemployment benefit who after one year are still available for work, but who nevertheless make no subsequent claim to which they are entitled, and who do not form a component of the published statistics; and if she will state the approximate numbers of persons in this category who first became eligible for unemployment benefit in January, February and March 1992 respectively.

Mr. McLoughlin: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to the hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Ms Ruddock) on 23 March, Official Report, column 567.

Health and Safety

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many prosecutions have taken place in each year since 1980 in Crown courts for breaches of health and safety legislation; what were the punishements in each case; and what are the figures for 1993 to the most recent practicable date.

Mr. McLoughlin: [holding answer 24 March 1993]: The Health and Safety Executive's database did not differentiate between types of court prior to 1 April 1988, when a new computer system was introduced. However, some figures for prosecutions by HSE's factory and agricultural inspectorate in Crown courts for the period 1 April 1986 to 31 March 1988 were collated manually and these are included in the table, although they have not been validated. Data for the period 1 April 1988 to 31 March 1992 are shown in the table. Data for 1992-93 are still being collected and will be provided when available.

Annual prosecution data are subject to validation checks, the last of which takes place about 15 months after the year in question. This enables, for instance, account to be taken of the results of appeals. For that reason, both the 1991-92 figures and the data still to be provided are provisional.

Prosecution action taken in the Crown Court[2] by HSE's Factory and Agricultural inspectorate 1986-1991/92[1]

Date of hearing[3]	Number of informations laid	Convictions	Total fines	Average fines £ per conviction

1988-89	69	62	121,850	1,965

[3] Years commencing 1 April.
[4] Unvalidated data.
[5] Includes action taken by HSE's Quarries Inspectorate.
[6] Includes a fine of £100,000 imposed against Shell UK Ltd. The average fine without this conviction would be £9,514.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Deregulation

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Harwich (Mr. Sproat) of 16 March, Official Report, column 208, if he will make a statement on the proposed method of operation of each of the deregulation task forces.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: The deregulation task forces will each be looking afresh at the regulations that bear on their sectors. Together, they will cover the whole field of regulation. They will identify priorities for repeal or simplification and develop proposals for reform.

London Exhibition Halls

Mr. Rowe: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what action is to be taken to implement the Monopolies and Mergers Commission's report on electrical contracting services at London exhibition halls.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: The report on electrical contracting services at London exhibition halls was published in April 1990 and found that there was a complex monopoly situation in favour of the following five electrical contractors:

Ecando Systems Ltd.
Business Design Centre Ltd.
Lightpower Exhibitions Ltd.
S. Seymour (Electrics) Ltd.
Johnson Smith & Company Ltd.

The five contractors benefit from preferential arrangements with certain of the large exhibition halls, whereby exhibition organisers are required to use or give preference to an electrical contractor nominated by the hall owner. The Monopolies and Mergers Commission—MMC—concluded that:

"this situation operates against the public interest. In particular such arrangements restrict competitions discourage new entry into the market and inhibit the growth of competition."

Action to implement the report has been delayed while Earls Court and Olympia Ltd., the owner of Ecando Systems Ltd., sought judicial review of the MMC's findings taking their case to appeal. Both judgments upheld the MMC's findings and ECO has indicated that its subsidiary Ecando Systems Ltd. will negotiate with the Director General of Fair Trading with a view to reaching appropriate undertakings.

I have therefore written today to Sir Bryan Carsberg, the Director General of Fair Trading—DGFT—requesting him, under section 88(1) of the Fair Trading Act, to consult with the five contractors with a view to obtaining undertakings in line with the remedies proposed by the MMC:

(i) The "tying arrangements" between exhibition hall owners and electrical contractors will be prohibited; but where an exhibition organiser has a long term exclusive agreement with an independent electrical contractor this may be allowed. In such circumstances the hall owner may require his nominated contractors as well as the organiser's to be allowed to tender for an exhibitors work.

(ii) The payment of commission by electrical contractors to hall owners will be prohibited.

(iii) Price transparency will be increased by requiring that a detailed schedule of prices for electrical contracting services is made available to exhibitors before an exhibition.

In the case of company groups including a hall owner, an exhibition organiser and an electrical contractor, the MMC recommended that the exhibition organiser should be prohibited from using the group electrical contractor at events held in the group halls. After the public consultation, that followed the publication of the report, an alternative remedy was suggested, which would promote fair competition at company group events but would not preclude the group contractor from carrying out electrical work at such events:

(a) the group's exhibition organiser will be permitted to nominate the group's electrical contractor for exhibitions staged at the halls owned by the group only on the condition that the stand holder is given the option of using at least one other alternative contractor;

(b) the hall owner will not be permitted to provide the electrical contracting services himself.

This finally remedy only applies to Earls Court and Olympia Ltd. the group exhibition organiser Philbeach Ltd. and the group electrical contractors Ecando Systems Ltd. I am asking the DGFT to negotiate an undertaking from Ecando Systems Ltd. that will allow fair competition at Philbeach organised events in ECO halls.

In view of the delay in implementing the report, I have asked the DGFT to convene negotiations with Ecando Systems Ltd. with a view to obtaining appropriate undertakings within two months. The DGFT will also commence negotiations with the remaining four electrical contractors named in the report to agree similar undertakings. In the event that undertakings are not secured promptly from the five contractors concerned, I will consider making an order.

The MMC's inquiry was confined to provision of electrical contracting services in London. When the report was published, the DGFT indicated that he would make enquiries to establish if similar tying arrangements existed between hall owners and electrical contractors outside London. I am therefore asking the DGFT to seek assurances from hall owners outside London that such practices are not being conducted in their halls.

Regional Development

Mr. Rowe: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what level of financial support he proposes to offer to the English regional development organisations for 1993-94.

Mr. Sainsbury: I have studied the current performance and future plans of the six English regional development organisations. I am pleased to say that they continue to make a significant contribution to the work of my Department's Invest in Britain Bureau, and to the overall success of the United Kingdom in attracting inward investment. In addition, I am also pleased to announce the setting up of a new regional development organisation for the east midlands, which will begin operation in 1993-94. In recognition of this, I have today offered £5·555 million of grant in aid for their inward investment promotion activities for 1993-94, £555,000 more than in 1992-93, including £250,000 for the new East Midlands regional development organisation. This increase in funding is to enable the United Kingdom to remain competitive in promoting its location advantages in the face of increasing competition from the rest of Europe for mobile inward investment in the single European market. I have allocated the grant aid as follows:

RDO	1993-94 grant £000	Percentage share of total grant
Northern Development Company (NDC)	1,493·5	26·9
INWARD Ltd. (in the North West)	1,199	21·6
Yorkshire and Humberside Development Association (YHDA)	1,112	20·0
West Midlands Development Agency (WMDA)	828·25	14·9
Devon and Cornwall Development Bureau (DCDB)	672·25	12·1
East Midlands	250	4·5

Grant is offered on an annual basis according to past performance, ability to absorb additional funding effectively, and for an agreed programme of future activities, with proper regard to value for money. It is Government policy to encourage direct inward investment to the United Kingdom because it contributes significantly to economic growth. Inward investment brings benefits both to the country as a whole and more specifically to the assisted areas.

Coffee

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what level of tariff has been imposed on (a) processed coffee and (b) coffee beans; and what is the reason for the disparity.

Mr. Curry: I have been asked to reply.

The full rate of duty applying to processed coffee is 18 per cent. For coffee beans, the full rates of duty are 4, 10, 12 and 15 per cent. respectively for green beans, decaffeinated green beans, roasted beans and decaffeinated roasted beans. Preferential rates apply to imports of both processed coffee and coffee beans from certain sources; the African, Caribbean and Pacific—ACP—states and the least developed developing countries—LDDC—enjoy duty-free access. The European Community's common customs tariff in general imposes higher tariffs on processed and semi-processed goods than on raw materials. Preferential arrangements similarly apply to a wide range of ACP and LDDC processed and semi-processed goods.

Marine Oil Spills

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to investigate marine spill contingency and response planning geographic information systems following the MV Braer disaster.

Mr. Norris: My Department's marine pollution control unit commissioned and part-funded preparation and printing of the Nature Conservancy Council's "Atlas of Nature Conservation Sites in Great Britain Sensitive to Coastal Oil Pollution" published in 1991 and is now considering incorporating this data on to a geographic information system.

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will consider introducing a levy on oil shipped through United Kingdom ports to fund measures to prevent future oil spillages.

Mr. Norris: Ships using United Kingdom ports already pay port charges and light dues. In addition oil carried into United Kingdom ports may face a levy set by the international oil pollution compensation fund to meet the compensation needed following oil pollution incidents such as the Braer. There are no proposals at present to impose a further levy on oil cargoes to finance measures to prevent future oil pollution incidents.

Railways

Mr. Dunn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will announce the award of a major section 8 grant in the north of England to which he referred during the Standing Committee on the Railways Bill of 11 March, column 749.

Mr. Freeman: I am pleased to announce today that a £3·1 million freight facilities grant, under section 8 of the Railways Act 1974, has been accepted by the quarrying and construction company, Tilcon Ltd., which is a wholly owned subsidiary for the BTR Group. The grant, which represents 50 per cent. of the cost of rail facilities, including new rail wagons, will enable limestone from Tilcon's Swinden quarry in the Yorkshire Dales national park to be moved to Leeds and Hull by rail rather than by road.

Aircraft Noise

Mr. Deva: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what conclusions he has reached following consultation on the proposals in the paper issued in August 1991, "Control of Aircraft Noise"; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Norris: I am publishing today the Government's conclusions following extensive consultation on the proposals contained in the paper issued in August 1991 "Control of Aircraft Noise". Five hundred and seventy-five responses to the consultation paper were received from a variety of individuals and organisations representing aviation and local community and environmental interests.

The responses generally supported the principle that aerodromes should be responsible and locally accountable for taking all reasonable measures to minimise nuisance to local communities from their activities and for bearing the costs of doing so.

I will be taking various steps to reinforce this approach, building on the existing, mainly voluntary, system of control at most airports. However, it is still appropriate for me to retain a reserve power to take responsibility myself for noise control. This power is most likely to apply to major international airports.

I propose to develop national guidance about the sorts of measure that might reasonably be taken by the different types of aerodromes and will consult widely on it when a draft has been prepared. In the meantime, views from interested parties on points that might be included are welcomed. Virtually all the responses to consultation welcomed the proposals for guidance.

In line with the principle of local responsibility and accountability, I will write to BAA to explore the scope for their taking on more direct responsibility for ensuring that noise mitigation measures at Heathrow, Gatwick and Stanstead are properly observed, for following up breaches and for responding to complaints. I will also invite the consultative committees to give their views on how such a changeover of responsibility can be smoothly and effectively achieved.

I will also be considering with other aerodromes how they might review their existing arrangements to ensure that they are as effective as possible.

When parliamentary time permits, I will introduce primary legislation to amend the existing power for the control of aircraft noise. The changes will reflect the proposals in the consultation paper that aerodromes should have explicit powers to devise and enforce measures to minimise noise including ground noise. I will also introduce a power to require an aerodrome to develop a noise mitigation scheme, to consult locally and to secure agreement to it with a lead local authority, with disputed points to be settled by my Department. Where an aerodrome is required to produce such a scheme, the lead local authority will be responsible for ensuring that the noise control measures are properly enforced. I will reserve the right to approve schemes myself where I judge it appropriate.

These powers will apply to all aerodromes, including sites used temporariliy by light aircraft or helicopters.

I would not expect these powers to be used widely. It is far better for aerodromes to adopt and enforce effective noise measures themselves and to be accountable voluntarily to local people about what they are doing. Generally this approach works well, and I want to build on it.

Bus Deregulation

Mr. Brandreth: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish a consultation document on the operation of bus deregulation outside London; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: We do not intend to alter the basic deregulatory regime set up by the Transport Act 1985. There may, however, be aspects of its working that could be improved, and we have issued a consultation paper on them. Copies have been placed in the Library.

Thameslink

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what cost benefit analysis was made in respect of Thameslink 2000; and to what extent the benefit to cost ratio would be changed by a decision not to proceed with a low level station at King's Cross;

(2) when the plans and all planning applications for Thameslink 2000 were finalised; and when an application for a ministerial order under the new Transport and Works Act 1992 procedures was ready to be lodged;

(3) if he will make funds available to allow work on Thameslink 2000 to proceed.

Mr. Freeman: It is for British Rail to appraise the project and to consider the implications of alternative options for a new Thameslink station at King's Cross. The decision that, subject to the results of further work, the channel tunnel rail link should terminate at St. Pancras does not preclude construction of a low-level station at King's Cross.

The preparation and submission of an application under the Transport and Works Act procedures is a matter for BR. No application in respect of any element of Thameslink 2000 has been received.

As announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on 22 March, British Rail will be undertaking further work, within its existing resources, on options for developing Thameslink services.

Channel Tunnel Rail Link

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what environmental standards will apply, and what benefits will be available to people living near, to the new sections of the proposed channel tunnel rail link.

Mr. Freeman: The route for the rail link announced for consultation has been designed in accordance with a range of environmental design aims as explained in a departmental paper entitled "Paper for the Channel Tunnel Rail Link High Level Forum: Environmental Appraisal", which is in the Library. Mitigation measures also contribute towards achieving these aims; the measures that might be provided will be discussed over the next few months with those people affected. Any loss of value of homes resulting from any remaining environmental impacts may qualify for statutory compensation once the railway is in operation.

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what are the latest estimates for channel tunnel-borne rail freight loads expected to be carried on existing south London railway lines; how many train movements are expected; at what times of the day; and when he will announce what new estimates have been made in the light of changed passenger commuter services on those lines, resulting from the building of the channel tunnel passenger rail link.

Mr. Freeman: British Rail expects to run up to 27 international freight trains daily in each direction from the opening of the channel tunnel. Approximately half of the trains are expected to run at night. Some of these trains will access the tunnel via the Tonbridge-Redhill route and others by the Nunhead-Maidstone route. British Rail plans to increase the number of services on existing lines to meet the growth in demand; demand patterns will become clear only following the start of services. The channel tunnel rail link is designed primarily as a passenger line, but with the option of taking some freight being kept open.

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what environmental standards apply, and what benefits are available to people living near, to existing railway track which will carry additional freight loads as a result of (a) the channel tunnel opening and (b) the building of the channel tunnel rail link.

Mr. Freeman: There is no statutory requirement for environmental protection measures to be taken where traffic on an existing railway line increases or changes in nature; nor are compensation or sound insulation required to be provided. However, on the existing lines which will carry channel tunnel freight services—both before and after the building of the channel tunnel rail link—British Rail is taking measures to limit the effects of railway noise. Sections of jointed rail on these lines are being replaced by continuously welded rail and the new international rolling stock has been designed to be quieter than other rolling stock currently in use. In addition, BR has agreed with Kent and Surrey county councils jointly funded schemes for the erection of acoustic barriers at certain locations alongside these railway lines. BR is willing to discuss the possibility of such schemes with any other local authority whose area is likely to be similarly affected.

Bus Drivers

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what statutory provisions govern rest periods after continuous hours of work, the availability of rest facilities, refreshment and lavatories for bus drivers in London.

Mr. Norris: Drivers of vehicles used for the carriage of passengers on a regular service of not more than 50 km are subject to the domestic drivers' hours rules contained in the Transport Act 1968.

The Act limits a continuous driving period to five and a half hours, after which a break of at least 30 minutes must be taken. During the break, a driver must be able to obtain rest and refreshment, but there are no statutory provisions governing the availability of rest and other facilities for bus drivers.

Marine Accidents

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the interim results of the investigation by the marine accident investigation branch into the incident on 23 January, involving the MV Havkong in Braefoot bay.

Mr. Norris: It would be inappropriate to provide results before the investigation has been completed.

PRIME MINISTER

Social Security Offices (London)

Q7. Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Prime Minister what plans he has to visit a London DSS office.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

Hepatitis B

Dr. Marek: To ask the Prime Minister how many patients were recalled for screening for hepatitis B by the Staffordshire, Wrexham, Argyll and Ayr and North Middlesex hospitals following two surgeons having transmitted hepatitis B to one or more of their patients.

The Prime Minister: Approximately 1,780 patients have been contacted for screening by the hospitals concerned. The two hospitals in Scotland are in the Ayrshire and Arran health board's area.

Cabinet Meetings

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Prime Minister who presides at meetings of the Cabinet in the event of an incidental absence of the Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister: Cabinet meetings are not normally held in the absence of the Prime Minister. In the event of such a meeting being necessary, I would make arrangements in the light of the circumstances at the time.

Acting Prime Minister

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Prime Minister what arrangements are laid down as to who should act as Prime Minister in the period immediately following his being suddenly incapacitated; and if he will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: There are no standing arrangements for this eventuality. The arrangements would depend on the circumstances.

Engagements

Sir Peter Tapsell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 25 March.

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 25 March.

The Prime Minister: This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

ENVIRONMENT

Toxic Waste

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his policy in relation to the proposed European Community ban on the export of toxic waste to non-OECD countries.

Mr. Maclean: At the Environment Council on 23 March, it was agreed to invite the Commission to examine all the circumstances that have given rise to the call for a ban on exports of hazardous waste to developing countries and to submit appropriate proposals to the Council at the earliest possible date. The Government supported this decision and suggested the examination of the circumstances.

Oil Pollution

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what timetable has been agreed between the United Nations International Maritime Organisation and the EC Council of Ministers to consider the submissions for tanker exclusion zones around areas of ecological interest.

Mr. Maclean: I know of no such agreement between the International Maritime Organisation and the European Community Council of Ministers: nor would I expect to see one. However, the IMO maritime safety committee will be considering various proposals from the United Kingdom and other EC member states at its next meeting in May. The European Commission, as part of the follow-up to the EC joint environment/Transport Council of Ministers is organising a meeting on 21 April to discuss the definition of environmentally sensitive maritime areas.

Emissions

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what assessment he has made of the reductions in carbon dioxide, sulphur dioxide and nitrogen oxide emissions that are likely to arise in each year to 1996 as a result of new taxation measures announced by the Chancellor in the Budget statement.

Mr. Maclean: It will take a number of years for consumers to adjust their consumption patterns fully to any change in energy prices. The imposition of VAT on domestic fuels and power and the increases in road fuel duties announced by my right hon. Friend are expected to reduce carbon dioxide emissions in 2000 by around three million tonnes carbon, emissions of sulphur dioxide by about 32,000 tonnes and emissions of oxides of nitrogen by around 57,000 tonnes.

Council Tax

Mr. Boyes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what arrangements have been made to translate the leaflet on the council tax into British sign language on video for profoundly deaf people.

Mr. Robin Squire: My Department does not have any plans at present to produce a council tax video.

Housing Market Package

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the local authority areas within which the 78 purchases and approvals under the housing market package are located.

Sir George Young: Of the 78 purchases and approvals of properties owned by the Ministry of Defence, 66 were in Gillingham, the remaining 12 in Bristol.

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretry of State for the Environment how many approvals were given under the housing market package in rural areas.

Sir George Young: Precise figures are not yet available. The latest estimate from the Housing Corporation is that some 600 purchases will be made in settlements with populations of 3,000 or fewer under the housing market package.

Cryptosporidiosis

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects the report of the drinking water inspectorate into the outbreak of cryptosporidiosis in north Humberside to be published; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maclean: I am pleased to annouce that the report to Mr. R. J. Vincent MSc CChem, FRSC, MIWEM, of the drinking water inspectorate, into the outbreak of cyptosporidiosis in north Humberside in December 1989 to January 1990, has been published today. The report draws conclusions and makes comments about the operation of the Barmby water treatment works, and identifies five main lessons for the water industry in general which will help to protect water supplies in future. Copies of the report have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

Conservation Areas

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment which areas the Government proposes for designation as special areas of conservation under directive 92/43/EEC.

Mr. Maclean: The Government have not yet proposed any sites for designation as special areas of conservation under directive 92/43/EEC. The country nature conservation agencies and the Joint Nature Conservation Committee are at present undertaking the preliminary scientific analysis necessary before the identification of areas for inclusion in the United Kingdom's national list from which areas to be designated as special areas of conservation will be selected.

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress the Government have made towards putting in place the legal and administrative provisions necessary for implementing directive 92/43/EEC and for safeguarding United Kingdom terrestrial and marine habitats covered by the directive.

Mr. Maclean: The Government's proposals for implementing the directive will be published in due course.

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether any areas in Cardigan bay, the Bristol channel or St. George's channel are being considered for designation as special areas of conservation under directive 92/43/EEC.

Mr. Maclean: No specific areas have so far been identified.

Sites of Community Importance

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment which United Kingdom sites have been placed on a Community draft list of sites of Community importance under directive 92/43/EEC.

Mr. Maclean: None.

Area Cost Adjustment

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for environment what plans he has to freeze the area cost adjustment factor for future years' local Government funding.

Mr. Robin Squire: We have no such plans. The method of calculating area cost adjustment factors is being reviewed, as part of a general review of standard spending assessments, in consultation with local authority representatives. Proposals for 1994-95 will be announced later in the year.

Air Pollution

Mr. Ian Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement about the 1993-94 charging scheme for local authority air pollution control under part I of the Environmental Protection Act 1990.

Mr. Maclean: Charges to cover the local enforcing authorities costs of regulating processes subject to part I of the Environmental Protection Act 1990 were introduced in April 1991. With the agreement of the Treasury, and the following consultation with local authority associations, industry and other bodies, the Secretary of State for the Environment and the Secretary of State for Wales have been made a revised scheme specifying the scales of fees and charges to take effect from 1 April 1993.

The application fee is increased by £35 to £935, and the annual subsistence charge and the substantial change fee £20 to £570 and £600 respectively. A new, much reduced, substantial change fee of £100 has been introduced for cases where the substantial change is being made for the purpose of implementing a programme for upgrading of an existing process. The application fee and subsistence fee for small waste oil burners, which reflect a simplified authorisation procedure, remain unchanged at £100. The application fee for processes registered under the Alkali Act also remains at £580. The scheme will be laid before the House and a copy placed in the Library.

Pollution Inspectorate

Mr. Milligan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement about the 1993-94 charging schemes for Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution.

Mr. Maclean: Charges to cover the costs of regulating processes under integrated pollution control—IPC—and premises subject to Radioactive Substances Act 1960—RSA60—regulation were introduced in 1991 under the Environmental Protection Act 1990. The Act requires Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution—HMIP—to balance costs and income, taking one financial year with another.

With the agreement of the Treasury, and following consultation with industry and other bodies, my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment has now made revised IPC and RSA60 charging schemes, specifying the revised scales of fees and charges which will take effect from 1 April 1993. I have placed copies of the revised schemes in the Library.

In 1991-92, the time and cost involved in the assessment of applications was under-estimated in setting the fees and charges, and costs were substantially under-recovered. For 1992-93, therefore, rates were significantly increased. At the same time, HMIP set itself tough targets for reducing application handling times. These targets are being achieved and there is no need for a real-terms increase in the 1993-94 fees and charges over those set for 1992-93. The increase for 1993-94 in the rate per component for each aspect of HMIP's work averaging 2·5 per cent. allows only for the effect of inflation on HMIP's costs.

The form of the schemes remains the same as in earlier years. For IPC, the scheme comprises an application fee to cover the cost of assessment of the operator's proposals and preparation of the authorisation; an annual subsistence charge for holders of authorisations, to cover the costs of inspection and oversight of the plant; and a variation fee to cover the costs of assessment of any proposals for substantial variation to a process.

The application fee for 1993-94 is £2,500 per component for processes which have previously been subject to air pollution control and £3,750 per component for processes coming under regulation by HMIP for the first time. The variation fee is £1,250 per component, and the annual subsistence charge is £1,540 per component.

Under the RSA60 charging scheme, nuclear licensed premises are billed individually on the basis of regulatory time spent and costs incurred at each site. The charging rate for 1993-94 will be £965 per inspector day.

Non-nuclear premises are charged on the basis of first-rate fees on a similar basis to the IPC scheme, covering applications, substantial variations and subsistence. For premises authorised to accumulate and dispose of radioactive waste—"band 3 premises", for example, research establishments and major universities—the application and variation fee will be £1,385 and the subsistence fee £820. For those premises authorised to accumulate and dispose of small quantities of substances, or substances with a lesser risk, a lower subsistence charge of £80 has been introduced. For premises registered to keep and use radioactive material—"band 4 premises", for example, industrial users of radioactive sources—the application and variation fee will be £500. The subsistence fee for band 4 premises will be £80, but the majority of such premises will be exempt from this payment because they handle small sources and do not require routine inspection.

Because of the under-recovery of costs in 1991-92, the 1992-93 schemes included a supplementary subsistence charge in respect of authorisations and registrations arising from applications made in 1991-92. These supplementary charges will continue in 1993-94 at the same rate as in 1992-93: under IPC, £610 per component for 1991-92 applications charged at the full rate, £410 for those charged at the reduced rate; under RSA60, £210 and £80 for band 3 and band 4 premises respectively. There will be no supplementary charge following from applications made in 1992-93.

Opencast Mining

Mrs. Angela Knight: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he intends to revise the planning guidelines for opencast coal in minerals planning guidance note 3; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: My hon. Friend, the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, announced on 15 July 1992 the Government's intention to revise the planning guidelines on opencast coal in MPG3. Revision of the guidelines has had to await the outcome of the Government's coal review. With the publication of today's White Paper, I intend to proceed as quickly as possible to consultation on revised draft planning guidelines. These will deal with both deep mine and opencast coal. The Welsh Office will undertake separate consultation in Wales.

It is clear that the revised guidelines will need to take into account the Government's energy policy and the policies for the coal industry set out in the White Paper. They must also reflect the Government's commitment to the protection of the environment. Within that broad national policy framework, the guidelines must be based on the development plan led approach introduced by the Planning and Compensation Act 1991. This approach will provide more certainty for the industry and for the communities in those areas where coal reserves exist.

Subject to any further considerations arising out of the debate on the White Paper, I intend therefore that the draft guidelines should be based on the following broad principles:

1. It is not the function of the planning system to seek to set national limits on or targets for any particular source or level of energy supply. Nevertheless coal which can be produced economically is an important indigenous energy resource and it would be against the national interest to prevent its extraction where that can be done in an environmentally acceptable way and consistently with wider environmental objectives, including the principles of sustainable development.

2. It is also relevant to consider whether a particular proposal for coal extraction would itself provide national, regional or local benefits to offset the disturbance occasioned during development restoration—e.g., through contributing to UK employment, the clearance of dereliction or other improvements to the quality of land, the creation of nature reserves or the provision of other benefits.

3. Mineral planning authorities should prepare Mineral Local Plans based on policies which reflect that approach and which indicate in detail those areas where provision is made for coal extraction and the disposal of colliery spoil, as well as those areas where working or disposal is not likely to be acceptable and where coal resources are to be safeguarded for future working. The preparation of these plans is now an urgent requirement.

The national policy guidelines in MPG3 published in 1988 remain relevant to the consideration of individual opencast proposals until full revised guidelines are published. In the light of the coal review White Paper, however, further advice is necessary on the national policy considerations to be taken into account in the handling of planning applications in England and Wales to ensure a consistent approach between the White Paper and the guidelines. These are as follows:

It remains the case that there is no Government target for United Kingdom coal production in general or for opencast coal output in particular. Opencast coal mining can be environmentally intrusive, but can also produce benefits, such as landscape improvements and the provision of job opportunities. The Government are firmly committed to the protection of the environment and wish to ensure that the right balance is struck between development of opencast coal resources and proper protection of the environment and local amenity. There is no cause in land use planning terms for placing more restrictions on economic coal production than are required to secure full and proper protection of the environment; and, in accordance with the longer-term principles set out in this answer, it would be against the national interest to refuse planning permission for the extraction of economic indigenous coal resources where the development can be carried out in an environmentally acceptable way.

Individual proposals for opencast development should therefore be considered against the broad principles set out above and must be determined in accordance with the development plan unless material considerations indicate otherwise, as required by section 54A of the Town and Country Planning Act 1990. The existence of national policy guidance more recent than the development plan, including the advice set out in this answer, would normally constitute one such consideration to be taken into account.

This advice replaces paragraphs 5 and 6 of MPG3 which are hereby withdrawn.

Mr. Dover: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what changes he proposes to make in the planning procedures relating to opencast coal mining to improve the rate of approvals.

Mr. Baldry: [holding answer 24 March 1993]: None. The Government remain concerned to remove unnecessary delays in the issue of planning decisions generally and to encourage efficiency and effectiveness in development control. We have already taken action in the Planning and Compensation Act 1991 to provide greater certainty for the industry and local communities through the introduction of the new development plan led system, and we have removed one element of delay in the consideration of minerals applications by providing for such applications to be made direct to the mineral planning authority. Nevertheless, local planning authorities should make every effort to enhance their performance and improve on the length of time taken over planning cases.

We are also proposing to make available a standard planning application form for mineral development which will be of benefit to the industry and mineral planning authorities.

Mr. Dover: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the progress made on restoration of derelict land, extension of wildlife areas, extension of woodlands and hedgerows, and development of recreation facilities due to opencast coal mining over the last (a) five and (b) 10 years.

Mr. Baldry: [holding answer 24 March 1993]: This information is not held centrally. According to statistics compiled by the County Planning Officers Society's committee No. 3, however, during the last four years 6,490 hectares of land received planning permission for opencasting in England, of which 1,309 hectares was derelict. All permissions for opencasting carry a requirement fully to restore the land.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Cohort Studies

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster which EC countries have long-term birth cohort studies; if a framework for cohort studies will be discussed at the EC research CREST meeting this week; and if he will make a statement on the options for a common EC framework for comparative cohort studies.

Mr. Robert Jackson: I understand that the United Kingdom is the only EC country which has national long-term birth cohort studies. This matter was not discussed at last week's EC research CREST meeting. The European Commission, together with member states, are considering the inclusion of a separate social science programme within the fourth EC R and D framework programme, but it is too early to say how social sciences will be covered. We are not aware of any EC-wide initiatives outside the framework programme.

Freedom of Information

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will place in the Library a copy of the report into the operation of freedom of information laws in Australia, Canada and New Zealand submitted to the Cabinet Office by Mr Robert Hazell at the conclusion of his civil service Nuffield and Leverhulme travelling fellowship in 1986-87.

Mr. Waldegrave [pursuant to his reply, Official Report, 17 February, column 218]: The last of the three Governments concerned have now agreed that the report can be made generally available. I have placed a copy in the Libraries of the House today.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Legal Aid

Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how much was spent on legal aid in net terms in each year since 1988.

Mr. John M. Taylor: Net expenditure on legal aid in each year since 1988 was as follows:

	£ million
1988-89	475
1989-90	564
1990-91	682
1991-92	906

Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how much value added tax was collected as a result of charges on the properties of litigants who were legally aided in 1985, 1990, 1991 and 1992.

Mr. John M. Taylor: No additional VAT liability arises from placing a charge on property. The charge will relate to costs incurred which themselves will in the vast majority of cases bear VAT—this will have been reported as part of the total legal aid expenditure.

Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how much interest was accrued on charges on the property of litigants receiving legal aid in 1985, 1990, 1991 and 1992.

Mr. John M. Taylor: The scheme for accrual of interest was introduced with effect from 1 December 1988, so no interest accrued on charges on property before that date. A small amount of interest accrued on such charges during 1989-90, but no detailed figures are available. At the end of the financial year 1990-91, interest accrued to date on quantified charges was £824,311 less £26,174 received to date, leaving a balance of £798,137 outstanding. At the end of the financial year 1991-92, interest accrued to date on quantified charges was £4,018,132 less £313,900 received to date, leaving a balance of £3,704,232 outstanding.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT ADMINISTRATION

Uganda

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with the Ugandan authorities in respect of the state commission on the activities of Idi Amin when president; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We are not aware of a commission specifically to look into the activities of former President Amin. The Ugandan Government have, however, set up a human rights commission to investigate human rights abuses which occurred prior to President Museveni coming to power in 1986. We welcome this in the context of Uganda's commitment to upholding better human rights standards; its record in this respect is recently much improved.

Tanzania

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assistance he is currently giving to the Tanzanian authorities to reduce elephant poaching and illegal ivory trading in that country: and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We are currently supporting the following conservation projects in Tanzania, which contribute directly or indirectly to elephant conservation:

- Elephant conservation in the Rungwa-Kizigo research complex (£80,000).
- Integrated conservation programme for the Lake Manyara catchment basin (£42,000)
- Conservation and management of the Selous game reserve (£100,000)
- Community-based conservation programme in the Serengeti national park (£33,800)
- Ruaha ecosystem wildlife management project (£800,000)

Wages Councils

Mr. Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many representations she has received since 5 November 1992 concerning abolition of wages councils; and how many of these (a) favoured abolition and (b) opposed abolition.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: We have received 1,213 representations concerning abolition of wages councils, of which 144 are in favour of abolition and 1,069 are against, including prepared postcards.

Dock Labour

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many dock workers have been found to have been unfairly dismissed since 1989; how many have been reinstated; how many dock workers are currently claiming unfair dismissal; and in which ports they are employed.

Mr. McLoughlin: I regret that the information is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Health and Safety

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what assessment she has made of the implementation of the EC directive on health and safety in the workplace since 1 January.

Mr. McLoughlin: The directive was implemented in Great Britain by the Workplace (Health, Safety and Welfare) Regulations 1992. Although these came into force on 1 January 1993, they do not take effect in existing workplaces, until 1 January 1996 except where any modification is made to the workplace.

In the meantime the Health and Safety Executive will be assessing the implementation of the directive on an informal basis through its day-to-day contacts with industry.

Noise at Work

Mr. Terry Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many improvement notices were issued against employers in 1990-91 and 1991-92 relating to the control of noise at work for each of the geographical areas of (a) the factory inspectorate, (b) the agricultural inspectorate and (c) the quarries inspectorate; and what were the penalties in each case.

Mr. McLoughlin: Improvement notices do not impose explicit penalties. They require action to be taken to comply with the relevant statutory provisions within a specified period of time.

The following requirements were made on improvement notices issued during the period 1990-91 and 1991-92.

Requirements made under the Noise at Work Regulations on Improvement Notices issued against employers by the Health and Safety Executive's (HSE) Factory, Agricultural and Quarries Inspectorates during 1990-91 and 1991-92[1]

Unemployment Benefit Disqualification

Ms Eagle: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if she will list for each standard region and for the United Kingdom as a whole, for each month from January 1990, the number of claimants subject to unemployment benefit disqualification broken down on the same basis as in the answer to the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) on 28 January, Official Report, columns 849-51.

Mr. McLoughlin: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service Agency under its chief executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from M. E. G. Fogden to Ms Angela Eagle, dated March 1993:

As the Employment Service is an Executive Agency, the Secretary of State has asked me to write to you direct to respond to your Parliamentary Question about the number of claimants subject to unemployment benefit disqualifications listed monthly for each standard region and for the United Kingdom as a whole. This is something which falls within the responsibilities delegated to me as Chief Executive of the Agency.

Unfortunately, the information is not available in the form you have requested. Information on disqualifications is compiled on a quarterly and annual basis only. The statistical tables attached give the number of disqualifications imposed quarterly for each region and for Great Britain. Information for Northern Ireland is not collected.

I hope this is helpful.

As decided by the Administration Committee of the House of Commons, Chief Executive replies to written Parliamentary Questions will now be published in the Official Report. I will also place a copy of this letter in the Library of the House.

PRIME MINISTER

Public Appointments

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Prime Minister what steps he is taking to ensure that more posts on public bodies are advertised; and if he will make it his policy to secure that the post of chairperson of each public body is advertised.

The Prime Minister: Responsibility for deciding how to fill the 40,000 ministerial appointments to public bodies rests with the individual Ministers and Departments concerned. Central guidance encourages the use of advertisement where appropriate, but it would not be cost-effective for all the 3,500 people chairing public bodies.

Security

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Prime Minister when he will reply to the letter of 3 February from the hon. Member for Darlington on security matters.

The Prime Minister: My office can find no trace of any such letter.

Pit Closures

Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Prime Minister whether he will list the membership of the ministerial and Cabinet committees which have considered the future of the coal industry and the pit closures.

The Prime Minister: The terms of reference of all ministerial committees of the Cabinet were given in my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Harlow (Mr. Hayes) on 19 May 1992 at columns 110-18 and my subsequent reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Windsor and Maidenhead (Mr. Trend) on 1 February 1993 at columns 46-47. I do not propose to give details of the topics discussed by individual committees or their procedures.

NATIONAL HERITAGE

Hospital Radio

Mr. Hutton: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if he will make a statement on his policy towards assigning an FM frequency for hospital radio broadcasts.

Mr. Brooke: The Radio Authority is responsible for determining its own procedures and priorities for licensing services on the frequencies which have been assigned to it.

National Music Library

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage, pursuant to his oral answer of 22 March, Official Report, column 597, if he will consider the creation of a national music library to take on the work and collection of Westminster city council.

Mr. Key: I shall certainly consider how national co-operation to meet users' needs can best be enhanced.

My Department is already jointly funding a study for a library and information plan for music. This study is investigating the provision of music scores and music information across the country and is expected to be completed this June. It will produce an action plan for improvements in services.

One of the current applications for funding from the Department's public library development incentive scheme is for the establishment of a national music lending service, based on the present collections of the Yorkshire Humberside joint library service and the British library. A final decision on this application will be taken in September.

Although Westminster city council plans to reduce the opening hours of the central music library and make commensurate staff savings, its service will remain exceptional. The library will still be open six days of the week, for a total of 37 hours; the new opening hours will be tailored to match user demand and there are no plans to reduce the existing, extremely extensive, stock.

Items in Lieu of Tax

Sir Gerard Vaughan: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if there have been any items accepted in lieu of tax or allocated since his last announcement on 16 February, Official Report, column 145.

Mr. Brooke: Since my last announcement on 16 February, Official Report, column 145, I am pleased to inform the House of the acceptance of two items offered in lieu of taxation. The items consist of the Corbridge Lanx Roman silver dish which will satisfy £1,832,000 tax, and a painting "Joseph and Potiphar's Wife" by Guido Reni which will satisfy £2,492,875 tax. The acceptance of both these items has been made possible by a call on the Reserve. The Corbridge Lanx will be allocated to the British museum in accordance with the condition on which the offer was made. As with previous "hybrid" offers, the recipient institution, in this case the British museum has agreed to pay the estate concerned the difference between the tax liability and the special price. The Reni painting will be allocated to the Fitzwilliam museum and will remain in situ at Holkham hall, in accordance with the condition on which the offer was made.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

EC Agri-environmental Regulation

Mr. Moss: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what are his plans for implementing the EC agri-environment regulation 2078/92; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: I am today issuing for public consultation a major package of six new proposals for implementing the agri-environment regulation in England. My right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland are carrying out parallel consultations on their proposals.

The agri-environment regulation was agreed as part of last year's reform of the common agricultural policy (CAP) and commits all member states to offering incentives to farmers to farm in environmentally beneficial ways going beyond normal good argicultural practice. This develops and extends the principle of environmentally sensitive areas (ESAs) which we pioneered in the United Kingdom. It is an important step in bringing environmental considerations to the heart of the CAP.

ESAs help farmers to conserve and enhance special habitats, landscapes and features of historic interest. They have been widely acclaimed by both farmers and environmentalists. The package being issued today includes proposals for a new incentive to build on the success of the ESA scheme by opening particularly suitable ESA farmland for new public access to create greater opportunities for public enjoyment of some of our most beautiful countryside.

Secondly, I am now issuing proposals on the boundaries, aims and operation of six new environmentally sensitive areas in the Blackdown hills, the Cotswold hills, Dartmoor, the Essex coast, the Shropshire hills and the upper Thames tributaries. The areas proposed will add some 319,000 hectares to the 832,000 hectares already covered by ESAs in England and annual expenditure on the scheme is now set to rise to £43 million by 1995-96.

Thirdly, I am proposing a new moorland scheme to encourage a targeted reduction in the number of livestock grazing moorland outside ESAs where this can result in improvements in heather, other semi-natural vegetation and associated wildlife habitats of moorland.

Fourthly, I am proposing a new meadowland scheme to encourage the creation of new public access opportunities on particularly suitable set-aside land. At the same time, I am issuing comprehensive proposals for the management of rotational and non-rotational set-aside land from the 1993-94 crop year, in ways which would exploit the considerable potential for environmental gains from set-aside. The options proposed, subject to EC rules, include wildlife corridors along field margins and watersides, woodland planting and wild bird cover, as well as more specialist options aimed at particular species such as migratory geese, otters and rare ground nesting birds.

Fifthly, I am proposing a new habitat improvement scheme to encourage the creation or improvement of a range of valuable wildlife habitats such as coastal saltmarsh and water-fringes along particularly vulnerable watercourses, through the removal of carefully selected areas of land from agricultural production for 20 years.

Sixthly, I am making proposals for a new organic aid scheme to encourage organic farming, both to benefit the environment and to encourage a type of food production for which there is a clear consumer demand.

Proposals for new measures to help protect groundwater catchments affected by high nitrate levels will also be issued for public consultation shortly.

In addition to the increased expenditure on ESAs, a further £19 million per annum will be spent on the other measures by 1995-96. The proposals complement the range of environmental incentives already available to farmers and reflect the Government's continuing commitment to caring for the countryside and to integrating environmental objectives into agricultural policy. I am making copies of the consultation documents available in the Library of the House.

Detailed arrangements for the new schemes will be finalised this summer after the results of the consultation have been analysed, and individual schemes will open for applications towards the end of this year or in 1994.

TRANSPORT

MV Derbyshire

Mr. Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will consider holding a further formal inquiry into the case of the loss at sea of the MV Derbyshire in 1980.

Mr. Norris: I have no plans to order a further formal investigation into the loss of the MV Derbyshire.

Rail Passengers (Electrical Appliances)

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the electrical appliances that passengers on British Rail trains are forbidden to use on safety grounds.

Mr. Freeman: Most modern InterCity passenger vehicles are fitted with a 13 amp socket outlet, for the use of cleaning staff only. The sockets are not designed for use while vehicles are in passenger service. Each socket has a sign warning "This plug socket is not for public use".

There are no restrictions, on safety grounds, for portable devices driven by batteries.

Crewe-Holyhead Rail Line

Mr. Richards: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the investment made in each of the last 10 years on maintaining and improving passenger services on the Crewe to Holyhead rail line.

Mr. Freeman: My Department does not hold this information. Investment and maintenance programmes for individual stretches of line are a matter for the British Railways Board.

Lyme Bay (Inquiry)

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will set up a marine accident investigation branch inquiry to determine what lessons can be learnt following the canoeing disaster off Lyme bay on 22 March.

Mr. Norris: In light of the investigation into the whole incident by the police authorities, the marine accident investigation branch will not be starting its own investigation. However, the matter is being kept under review.

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will give the shortest times for trains to travel between London and the channel tunnel for the present proposals for a high-speed rail link and for all previous proposals.

Mr. Freeman: The information available is as follows:

March 1989 outline proposals

Southerly approach route terminating at King's Cross —around 40 minutes.

1990-91 comparison of route options

Southerly approach route terminating at King's Cross —35·5 minutes.

Southerly approach route terminating at Stratford—35 minutes.

Ove Arup route to an intermediate stop at Stratford —33 minutes.

Ove Arup route terminating at King's Cross—40.5 minutes, including a stop at Stratford.

Rail Europe route terminating at Stratford—35.5 minutes.

1993 route for consultation

Easterly approach route terminating at St. Pancras or King's Cross—37 minutes.

Handsworth Driving Test Centre

Mr. Betts: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he will make a statement about the future of the Handsworth driving test centre in Sheffield.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle [holding answer 23 March 1993]: Following discussions with the relevant landlords, the Driving Standards Agency's preferred option for reducing its capacity in the Sheffield area is to retain the driving test centre at Handsworth and to close the centre at Manor Top. The agency will now consult the Members of Parliament for the constituencies affected and representatives of approved driving instructors.

WALES

Youth Training

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will give the key evaluation targets for youth training in Wales for the financial year 1993-94.

Mr. David Hunt: The key evaluation targets are:

The provision of sufficient places to meet the guarantee of a YT place for all 16 and 17-year-olds who are not in employment or full-time education.

That no young person should wait more than eight weeks for an offer of a suitable training place.

That each trainee should have an individual training plan leading to an approved vocational qualification at generally national vocational qualification level II or higher.

GP Fund Holders

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how much has been paid out of health service funds to general practitioners' fund-holding practices and how much to non-fund-holding practitioners on a per capita basis within Clwyd family health services authority district.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: In 1992-93 allocations to the 10 Clwyd general practice fund holders amount to an average of some £138 per patient.

There are no comparable figures for non-fund-holding practices whose hospital services are purchased by the health authority.

Breast Screening

Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he received the bid from the mammography screening service for an additional post for Mid Glamorgan; and when he will decide on the bid.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: A request for a contribution from central funds towards the cost of two consultant posts, in general surgey and radiology, was made in November for the financial year 1993-94. An announcement is due to be made shortly.

European Regional Development Fund

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many applications were received from local authorities in Wales for European regional development fund funding in the years 1992-93 and 1991-92; what percentage of their applications were successful; and how many of the successful applications reached completion.

Mr. David Hunt: The structural funds programmes in Wales do not operate on a financial year basis. Four programmes are currently in progress in Wales, all of which include expenditure incurred in 1991-92 and 1992-93.

Of the 374 applications submitted by local authorities to date, 88 have been approved. Applications in respect of the remaining eligible projects are expected to be approved by the programme monitoring committees by the end of 1993.

Projects approved under these programmes do not have to be completed until 1995 and it is therefore too early to comment on the successful completion of these applications.

Homelessness

Mr. Hain: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list figures by district for (a) the number of people who presented as homeless and (b) the number of people accepted as homeless for 1991 and 1992.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Information on the number of people who apply as homeless to local authorities is not available centrally. The numbers of persons in households accepted as homeless by local authorities under part III of the Housing Act 1985 are shown in the table:

SCOTLAND

Organ Donor Cards

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will institute a freephone number for callers to request organ donor card registration forms; and if he will make it his policy to run the advertisements on television channels in Scotland for the same number of weeks as in England.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 10 March 1993]: For the first time in Scotland, a television advertisement will shortly be shown to promote organ donation. The advertisement will encourage would-be donors both to carry a card and to discuss their wishes with relatives, since in many cases family objections have prevented the use of suitable organs. A freephone number will be available so that callers can request donor cards.

The advertisement will appear for two consecutive weeks. We shall be assessing its impact to determine whether arrangements should be made for further screenings.

Community Care

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what proportion of total funding for health and social care during the years 1993-94 and 1994-95 is to be spent on community care; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 15 March 1993]: Information in the form requested is not available. Information on planned expenditure by the NHS is not attributed to particular services but health boards contribute significantly to the provision of community care through their community health services, bridging finance, support finance and other means.

A large part of local authority social work departments' expenditure is devoted to community care. Precise figures are not available: expenditure in the current year is likely to be of the order of £350 million to £400 million. For 1993-94 and 1994-95 we are providing, additionally, £64 million and £113 million respectively under our community care reforms. This is made up of a transfer of funds from the Department of Social Security and additional funds to enable local authorities to develop services.

Secure Units

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to place a secure unit at Woodilee hospital; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 25 March 1993]: None. The management of the state hospital, Carstairs has been in touch with health boards, including Greater Glasgow, as part of a feasibility study on the merits or otherwise of establishing local in-patient forensic psychiatry facilities in Scotland. Consideration of that study continues.

Nurses

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many nurses are currently employed by each health board in Scotland; and what this number represents as a percentage total of qualified nurses employed in the NHS in each board.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 25 March 1993]: The information requested is set out in the table.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many nurses currently are employed in Scotland on short-term contracts in the NHS by each health board.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 25 March 1993]: The information requested is not available centrally. The table shows the average whole time equivalents for agency nurses, the only non-permanent nursing staff for whom data are available.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Senior Citizens (Free Transport)

Mr. Peter Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the estimated cost to his Department of subsidising (a) Citybus, (b) Ulsterbus and (c) Northern Ireland Railways to extend free transport to senior citizens within Northern Ireland.

Mr. Atkins: This information is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

ENVIRONMENT

Climate Change Convention

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on his policy on the adoption of 30 June as an appropriate deadline for the ratification of the framework convention on climate change by the member states of the European Community.

Mr. Maclean: At this week's Environment Council all member states agreed to take the measures necessary to enable them to ratify the convention not later than the end of 1993. This matches the United Kingdom's earlier commitment, along with our Group of Seven partners, to ratify the convention by the end of 1993.

Education Spending

Mr. Nicholls: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment which 10 education authorities have the highest standard spending assessment per pupil; and which 10 education authorities have the lowest standard spending assessment per pupil.

Mr. Robin Squire The table shows the education standard spending assessment for primary, secondary and post-16 education expressed in pounds per pupil for primary, secondary and pupils aged over 16. Equal Opportunities

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he has taken to recruit women, members of ethnic minorities and disabled people, respectively, in top grades of employment at his Department.

Mr. Howard: Recruitment to my Department at grade 8 and above is always by means of public open competition. Applicants are considered entirely on their suitability for the post in question under the supervision of the Office of the Civil Service Commissioners irrespective of gender, ethnic origin or disablement.

Environment Council

Sir Anthony Durant: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the outcome of the Environment Council on 22 and 23 March.

Mr. Howard: I and my hon. Friend the Minister for the Environment and Countryside represented the United Kingdom at this Council.

The Council agreed a decision which establishes a monitoring mechanism for emissions of carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gas emissions within the Community as a whole. This will require all member states to prepare and regularly update national programmes to limit these emissions. The programmes are needed to contribute to fulfilment by the Community as a whole of the requirement, in the UN framework convention on climate change, to aim to return emissions of carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gas emissions to their 1990 levels by the year 2000, and of related Community commitments. Secondly, the Council reached political agreement on a measure which will enable the Community to ratify the climate change convention. There was also a general discussion of progress on the Community's strategy during which we described the significant announcements that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer made in his Budget speech last week.

The Council reached full agreement on the Community eco-management and audit regulation. This proposal was a priority of the United Kingdom's presidency, but a few matters remained to be resolved following the broad political agreement reached last December. The regulation will establish a voluntary scheme to encourage the effective environmental management of industrial operations and public disclosure of information on environmental impacts.

The Council noted the good progress which had been made on the Commission's proposal for a revision of controls on the wildlife trade—the "Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species Regulation"—and invited the Committee of Permanent Representatives (COREPER) to take the discussion forward.

Further to its agreement on the text of the relevant decision last December, the Council agreed that the Community and its member states would ratify no later than 6 February 1994 the United Nations Environment Programme Basel convention on the control of transboundary movements of hazardous wastes and their disposal. The Council also invited the Commission to examine the circumstances that have given rise to a call for a ban on exports of hazardous recoverable waste to developing countries and to submit appropriate proposals to the Council.

The Council noted the Commission's intention of making a proposal by the end of April for further Community measures to implement the updated provisions of the Montreal protocol on ozone-depleting substances, including in particular those which relate to hydrochlorofluorocarbons and methyl bromide.

The Council examined for the first time a proposal from the Commission for a directive on the control of volatile organic compound (VOC) emissions resulting from the storage of petrol and its distribution from terminals to service stations—the so-called "Stage I" directive. This directive will control evaporative emissions of petrol and so help to reduce the formation of ozone at ground level. Due to the large number of remaining technical issues needing resolution, the proposal was remitted to COREPER for further discussion.

The Council held a brief discussion on the state of the Community's follow-up to the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development, and invited COREPER to report to the next Council in June.

The Council also held an exchange of views on the state of preparations for the pan-European ministerial conference on the environment to be held in Lucerne from 28 to 30 April.

The Council welcomed the Commission's communication on "A Common Policy for Safe Seas", on measures to improve maritime safety and guard against marine pollution. It agreed on the need for early decisions after careful study of the Commission's proposals.

The Council took note of a progress report on a proposed directive on the incineration of hazardous waste, designed to prevent or minimise the negative effects of such incineration, and invited COREPER to pursue work on the proposal.

The Commission introduced its proposal for a directive on further measures on air pollution by emissions from motor vehicles, to take account of the best technology which will be available for relevant vehicles after 1996, and invited the Council to reach a decision on the proposal as soon as possible.

The Council took note of the adoption by the Commission of a Green Paper on civil liability for environmental damage and agreed to discuss it in due course.

The United Kingdom, with support from other delegations, urged the presidency to press ahead with negotiations on the draft directive on packaging and packaging waste.

Private Housing (Renovation Grants)

Mr. Carrington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will make available results from the 1991 English house condition survey to inform the planned consultation paper on the future of the private house renovation grant system.

Sir George Young: We plan to publish a preliminary report on unfit dwellings at the same time as the consultation paper is issued. The main report of the survey will be published in two parts, the first in July and the second before the end of the year.

EC Directives

Mr. Sumberg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he intends to issue the second consultation paper on the implementation of the urban waste water treatment directive and the nitrates directive.

Mr. Maclean: We have today issued a consultation paper on the methodology for identifying sensitive areas —urban waste water treatment directive—and designating vulnerable zones—nitrates directive. This is the second in a series of such papers, the first of which covered the criteria and procedures for identifying sensitive areas and less sensitive areas—urban waste water treatment directive —and "polluted waters"—nitrates directive. The Government response to comments received on the first consultation paper has been included as an annex to the second.

Council Tax

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the estimate of the number of disabled people who live in band A homes under the council tax in each region.

Mr. Robin Squire [holding answer 25 March 1993]: This information is not available centrally.

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to introduce a band A-minus under the council tax.

Mr. Robin Squire [holding answer 25 March 1993]: We have no such plans. The scheme of council tax reductions for people with disabilities will ensure that no one pays more council tax in respect of additional accommodation which he or she needs because of a disability. If a dwelling is allocated to band A, any additional accommodation cannot have resulted in an increase in council tax liability, and no reduction is therefore appropriate.

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what is his estimate for the value of the average disabled person's reduction under the council tax; (2) what is his estimate of the number of people who qualify for the disabled person's reduction under the council tax.

Mr. Robin Squire [holding answer 25 March 1993]: We do not know how many dwellings will qualify for disabled persons' reductions, or the council tax bands and local authority areas in which they will fall. It is therefore not possible to make a precise estimate of the average value of such reductions. But on the assumption that such dwellings are distributed among bands and areas in the same way as other dwellings, the average reduction might be about £60, before discounts, transitional reductions and benefits are taken into account.

Mr. Henderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the current estimate of each authority's entitlement to transitional reduction grant in 1993-94, showing for each authority the necessary assumptions about numbers of single people in each council tax band and the present entitlements to community charge transitional relief.

Mr. Robin Squire [holding answer 25 March 1993]: Authorities have been invited to submit claims for council tax transitional reduction scheme grant for 1993-94. Details of discounts are not required by the Department, but will be examined by auditors when claims are certified. We have no estimates of the amount of each authority's grant entitlement. A list of the amounts of community charge reduction scheme grant for 1992-93 claimed by each authority has been placed in the Library of the House.

Seal Culling

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has made to the Government of Namibia concerning the practice of seal culling.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: I have been asked to reply.

The British high commission in Windhoek has periodic discussions with the Namibian authorities about seal culling and has passed on the public concern in the United Kingdom about it.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Isobutyl Nitrate

Ms Walley: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will issue a prohibition order in respect of isobutyl nitrate party poppers.

Mr. Leigh: The Government are keeping this matter under close review, in order to assess whether measures in the future to control isobutyl nitrate party poppers might be appropriate.

Loan Guarantee Scheme

Mr. Madden: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what representations he has received calling for the loan guarantee scheme to be made more attractive to small and medium-sized companies; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Leigh: The President of the Board of Trade receives many representations on the loan guarantee scheme and other measures to assist small firms. I refer to the Chancellor of the Exchequer's Budget statement of 16 March in which he announced changes to the loan guarantee scheme which will offer real additional benefits to small firms.

Metrication

Mr. Conway: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what representations he has had on standardising metric measurement in the manufacturing and retail sectors; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Leigh: Although there have been many representations aobut metrication, only a small number have been about standardising metric measurements. The Government consider that manufacturers and retailers should normally be allowed to choose which metric units to use.

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what action he intends to take to allow retailers to go metric prior to 1995 and to show prices in metric units without also having to show prices in imperial units; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Leigh [holding answer 25 March 1993]: Retailers are allowed to show prices for all goods and services in metric units. However, if they show food prices in metric units, they are required to show the price in imperial units. Following representations from retail interests, the Government are reassessing the costs and benefits of this requirement.

Eco-labelling

Mr. Dafis: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what steps are being taken to amend section 8 of the Trade Descriptions Act 1968 to take account of the European Community's eco-labelling scheme.

Mr. Leigh: There are no plans to amend this section of the Act.

Carpet Manufacturers

Mr. Butcher: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what assistance he is giving British carpet manufacturers in obtaining evidence of illegal subsidies to the Belgian carpet manufacturing industry; and if he will request the European Commission to institute an official investigation into subsidies applied by national and regional authorities for Belgium.

Mr. Sainsbury: I have received allegations from British carpet and textile organisations of financial assistance to textile companies in Wallonia recently and am seeking to clarify the factual position. If the allegations are verified, I will ask the Commission to take action.

Directors (Disqualification)

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many directors have been disqualified in each year since the passing of the Insolvency Act 1986.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: The number of disqualification orders notified to the Secretary of State since 1986, on a financial year basis—April to March—are as follows:

	Number
1986-87	108
1987-88	224
1988-89	408
1989-90	445
1990-91	419
1991-92	459

Maritime Disputes

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will estimate the foreign earnings associated with the use of English courts and arbitrators for international maritime dispute resolution.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: The Central Statistical Office balance of payments year book estimates that total foreign legal earnings for commercial legal advice and advocacy are £425 million per year. There is no detailed breakdown of the different types of commercial matters available. It is not therefore possible to estimate the percentage of this figure which relates to maritime disputes.

Leyland DAF

Mr. Nigel Evans: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what recent contact he and his Department have had with the Dutch Government on Leyland DAF.

Mr. Heseltine: My right hon. Friend the Minister for Industry has had a number of further discussions with Mr. Koos Andriessen, the Dutch Minister for Economic Affairs. There have also been continuing contacts at official level.

Merseyside (EC Funds)

Mrs. Jane Kennedy: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list for each year since 1987 (a) total European regional development fund receipts allocated to Merseyside and (b) total United Kingdom public expenditure cover for those receipts.

Mr. Sainsbury [holding answer 25 March 1993]: European regional development fund receipts allocated to Merseyside for each year since 1987 are shown below. Public expenditure cover has been made available for all these receipts.

Current Prices

£ million

Year	Allocations
1987	5·58
1988	1·91
1989	8·70
1990	22·47
1991	21·76
1992	13·12
1993	44·54

One-stop Shops

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, pursuant to his answer of 16 March to the hon. Member for Southampton, Test (Mr. Hill), Official Report, column 203, if he will list the organisations that have bid to establish one-stop shops; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Leigh [holding answer 23 March 1993]: In the one-stop shop prospectus my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade asked training and enterprise councils to co-ordinate bids on behalf of local partnerships and organisations. These included chambers of commerce, enterprise agencies and local authorities. Fifty-seven training and enterprise councils submitted bids on behalf of local partnerships. A list of those training and enterprise councils is attached:

Cable Television

Mr. Betts: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many cabling franchises have been awarded to date; how many properties these franchises cover; how many properties have been cabled to date; and how many properties he expects will be cabled in each of the next three years.

Mr. Leigh [holding answer 23 March 1993]: The answer is:

(a) 135 cable franchises have been awarded, of which eight have been subsequently handed back of revoked;

(b) The franchises awarded covered around 14·5 million properties; excluding the eight lapsed franchises this figure falls to around 14·2 million;

(c) Approximately 2,213,000 properties have been cabled passed to date and of these, around 454,000 properties have been connected to cable services;

(d) The Department does not itself issue forecasts in this area. Independent forecasts suggest that some 700,000 additional properties will be cabled passed in 1993, 1,200,000 in 1994 and 1,500,000 in 1995. Clearly, only a proportion of these properties will subscribe to cable services.

Mr. Betts: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what action he intends to take against those companies awarded cabling franchises which have made no significant progress in cabling properties to date.

Mr. Leigh [holding answer 23 March 1993]: Responsibility for monitoring and, if appropriate, enforcing compliance with build obligations contained in cable operators' licences issued under the Telecommunications Act 1984 is a matter for the Director General of Telecommunications.

999 Calls

Ms Estelle Morris: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will require telephone companies to publish the waiting time for 999 calls from the point the telephone call is made until the point where it is answered by an emergency service.

Mr. Leigh [holding answer 22 March 1993]: It would fall to the Director General of Telecommunications to require the production by telephone companies of such data and to provide for their publication. He has no plans to do so at present. The provision of 999 call handling services is, however, kept under active review by the relevant parties.

Animal Experimentation

Mr. David Porter: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what recent representations he has had about British and EC regulations to cut the testing of cosmetics on animals; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Leigh [holding answer 22 March 1993]: Since adoption of a common position to ban the testing of ingredients in cosmetics on animals by 1998—subject to a viable alternative—proposed in the sixth Council amendment to directive 76/768/EEC, some 250 letters have been received about ending such testing.

Free Flights Offers

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what powers he has to investigate complaints about sales promotions which offer free flights to accompany the sale of goods or services; and what recent complaints he has received.

Mr. Leigh [holding answer 16 March 1993]: I have no such powers. I have recently received four complaints.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Tax Relief (Dividends)

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what would be the effect of restricting tax relief on dividends to 25 per cent. in 1993-94, 1994-95 and 1995-96.

Mr. Dorrell: When a United Kingdom resident company pays a dividend to a United Kingdom resident shareholder, the shareholder receives a tax credit from the Exchequer. Under the Chancellor's Budget proposals, the value of the tax credit is being reduced, for dividends paid after 5 April 1993, from 25 per cent. of the value of the dividend and credit to 20 per cent. The effect of this proposal is described in the "Financial Statement and Budget Report" and the Inland Revenue Budget day press release.

Dividends are not deductible in calculating profits liable to corporation tax, but the advance corporation tax a company pays when it pays a dividend can be set off against the corporation tax on its profits. Under the Chancellor's Budget proposals, that set off will be reduced to 22·5 per cent. in 1993-94 of taxable profits, and to 20 per cent. for 1994-95 and subsequent years.

Domestic Fuel

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish figures showing the revenue yield in (a) 1994-95 and (b) 1995-96 from value added tax on domestic fuel and power, giving figures separately for value added tax on (i) oil, (ii) piped gas, (iii) cylinder gas, (iv) electricity and (v) coal.

Sir John Cope: Table 4.1 of the 1993-94 FSBR provides an estimate of the total yield in 1994-95 and 1995-96 from introducing VAT on domestic fuel and power. No separate figures are available for the VAT yield from particular types of fuel and power.

Women (Unpaid Work)

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps are being taken by his Department to develop means of measuring the economic value of unpaid work undertaken by women.

Mr. Portillo: The Government recognise the contribution of women—and men—who undertake work caring for others in the home. For example, home responsibilities protection (HRP) is designed to protect the state pension position of both women and men who are unable to work regularly because they are required to stay at home to look after a child or sick or disabled person. Home responsibilities protection reduces the number of qualifying years a person needs to qualify for a full basic pension.

Mileage Allowance

Mr. Allen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to review the Inland Revenue guidelines on tax-free mileage rates paid by employers; and what is the formula now used to arrive at those rates.

Mr. Dorrell: The tax-free rates for 1993-94 were announced on 23 March 1993 in an Inland Revenue press release and are set out below, with the 1992-93 rates in brackets. The formula used to arrive at the tax-free mileage rates ensures that, for drivers who do typical private mileages, the rates reflect tax-allowable business costs as closely as possible whatever the level of business mileage.

	Up to 4,000 miles		Over 4,000 miles
Cars up to 1,000 cc	26p	(25p)	15p	(14p)
Cars 1,001 to 1,500 cc	32p	(30p)	18p	(17p)
Cars 1,501 to 2,000 cc	40p	(38p)	22p	(21p)
Cars over 2,000 cc	54p	(51p)	30p	(27p)

Cycle Helmets

Miss Lestor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what progress has been made in attempts to zero-rate child cycle helmets for value added tax.

Sir John Cope: Customs and Excise have recently completed a review of the zero-rating currently available for children's cycle helmets. A decision on the outcome will be announced shortly.

Miss Lestor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer on what grounds value added tax is applied to cycle helmets and not to motor cycle helmets; and if he will make a statement.

Sir John Cope: Zero rating of cycle helmets is limited to those which qualify under the provisions available for young children's clothing and footwear. Legislation was introduced in 1974 to provide zero rating specifically for protective boots and helmets for industrial use and helmets meeting state safety standards for use by persons driving or riding a motor bicycle. There are no VAT reliefs for safety items generally.

Domestic Fuel

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the proposed new VAT charges on domestic fuel will apply to the standing charges.

Sir John Cope: Standing charges are regarded as part of the payment for the supply of fuel and power and will therefore be subject to the VAT changes announced in the Budget statement.

Tax Liability

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate (a) the average and (b) the total tax liability of taxpayers in each region of the United Kingdom in 1993-94 compared with the indexed 1987-88 income tax regime.

Mr. Dorrell: I regret that this information is not available on a regional basis.

Tax Liability

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has of the United Kingdom tax burden, in percentage averge terms in (a) 1993-94 and (b) 1995-96; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: An estimate of the tax burden in 1993-94, and a projection for 1995-96, is provided in table 2B.2 of the 1993-94 "Financial Statement and Budget Report".

Mortgage Interest Tax Relief

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the cost of mortgage interest tax relief in 1993-94 and the number of borrowers who will benefit from it.

Mr. Dorrell: The cost of mortgage interest tax relief is provisionally estimated to be £4·3 billion in 1993-94 based on the conventional assumption that interest rates remain at their current levels.

The estimated number of single people or married couples benefiting from mortgage interest relief in 1993-94 is 9·9 million.

Pensioners (Income Tax)

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the (a) number and (b) percentage of people in receipt of the state retirement pension who will be liable to pay income tax in 1993-94.

Mr. Dorrell: The latest estimate is that 3·4 million of those receiving state retirement pension—about one third of the total—will be liable to income tax in 1993-94.

Investment

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer by what percentage rate (a) investment and (b) business investment is expected to grow as a result of the measures in his Budget, and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Portillo: The "Financial Statement and Budget Report" 1993-94, published along with the Budget, set out the forecast for total and business investment.

Petroleum Revenue Tax

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment his Department has made of the likely effect of Budget changes to petroleum revenue tax on exploration activity in the North sea; and what assessment his Department has made of the likely effect on offshore investment of the changes announced in both petroleum revenue tax and advance corporation tax.

Mr. Dorrell [holding answer 25 March 1993]: Doubling the marginal rate of return should encourage investment in, and extend the life of, existing PRT-paying fields. For the future, finding and producing oil will be taken completely out of PRT. As with any tax cut, that will both increase after-tax costs and increase after-tax profits that would have been subject to PRT. Commercially viable exploration should continue unaffected, except by the greater scope for companies to benefit from success.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Yugoslavia

Mr. Hutton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what resources are being made available by Her Majesty's Government to the Commission established by Security Council resolution 780 investigating alleged war crimes in the former Yugoslavia.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The Commission is currently being funded from the UN regular budget to which we contribute. It has plans to set up a trust fund to provide for its future requirements. We shall be considering how best we might contribute.

Sri Lanka

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when the British high commissioner to Sri Lanka last visited the Jaffna area of Sri Lanka; how long his visit lasted; who accompanied him; what areas of Jaffna he visited; and if he will list the people the high commissioner met on his visit.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The British high commissioner visited Jaffna on 18 February for one day. He was accompanied by General Ranatunga, the secretary of the Sri Lankan Ministry of Defence, and the Australian high commissioner. He saw Palali air base and the Navy base at Karainagar. He met General R. de S. Daluwatte and Brigadier Wijendra at Palali and Commodore Sandagri at Karainagar.

Nuclear and Chemical Weapons

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if Her Majesty's Government will make it their policy to deny places on science graduate and postgraduate courses to students from countries which fail to sign or ratify international protocols relating to nuclear or chemical weapons.

Mr. Boswell: I have been asked to reply.

The Government are determined to block potential avenues for the poliferation of nuclear, chemical or biological weapons. We are discussing with representatives of the universities and colleges, which are responsible for the admission of students to courses, the most effective means of ensuring that postgraduate students and researchers from countries where there is a proliferation concern cannot gain access to relevant technologies through study or research in United Kingdom higher education.

HEALTH

Health Authorities

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the cost of running, and the number of staff employed by each regional health authority and management executive outpost in each of the last five years.

Dr. Mawhinney: The cost of running regional health authorities is shown in table 1.

Information on the numbers of staff employed by regional health authorities given in table 2 are not directly comparable as they include centrally managed functions —see note 4 to table. Figures for 1991 are not available centrally. For information for 1992 I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow (Mr. Gill) on 4 March at column 221 which gives figures for staff employed on core regional services produced by a special exercise conducted in mid 1992. Similar figures are not available for earlier years.

The management executive outposts have been operational only since April 1992. Their running cost budget for 1992-93 is £3 million and they currently have 56 staff in post as shown in table 3.

Source: Annual accounts of regional health authorities (RHAs) 1987-88 to 1991-92.

Notes:

1. The figures cover the total revenue expenditure of the authorities including that incurred on headquarters administration and on the management and provision of services in the years concerned.
2. The extent to which RHAs are involved in directly managing and accounting for ambulance and other services varies from region to region. The expenditure of individual RHAs is also influenced by other factors including variations in the size of the total populations served and the number of district health authorities comprising each region.
3. The figures for 1991-92 are not comparable to those for the earlier years, which predate the NHS reforms. In particular, many RHAs are directly involved in the purchase of healthcare and related services for their region and their 1991-92 expenditure includes substantial costs for patient treatment incurred under contracts with health care providers.

Parliamentary Questions

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she treats information held by the NHS management executive as being information held centrally when answering parliamentary questions.

Dr. Mawhinney: All validated information held by the national health service management executive is regarded as information held centrally.

GP Fund Holding

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the cost of first and second wave general practitioner fund-holding in 1991-92, broken down into (a) general practitioner fund-holding management fee, (b) general practitioner fund-holding underspend, (c) general practitioner fund-holding computer costs, (d) administrative costs to the (i) family health services authority, (ii) district health authority, (iii) regional health authority and (iv) her Department and the management executive (e) administrative costs to trusts, (f) Audit Commission costs and (g) the cost of primary care team time.

Dr. Mawhinney: The information available centrally is as follows:

(a) £14 million in fund holders' management allowance costs was reimbursed in 1991-92.
(b) Fund holder underspends are not a cost but a saving from the fund-holding budget. These savings will be spent for the benefit of patients. They amounted to some £17 million in 1991-92, of which £3·5 million has been channelled into extra funds for district health authorities to spend on all patients.
(c) £11·6 million in computer costs was reimbursed to fund holders in 1991-92.
(d) (e) and (f) These costs are not separately available for fund holding.
(g) The cost of primary care team time is already allowed for in the management allowance.

Health Forums

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what consideration she has given to including a patients' representative on the London health service development forum, the Lodon implementation group executive or the primary health care forum.

Dr. Mawhinney: The London health service development forum, the London implementation group executive and the primary health care forum are small executive or advisory bodies charged with implementing our policy document "Making London Better". Patients' organisations are not represented on these bodies, but will, of course, be consulted whenever appropriate.

Representing the consumers of health care services continues to be the role of health authority purchasers, family health service authorities and community health councils. Their views will be taken fully into account.

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the estimated cost of servicing the London implementation group in the year 1993-94; and whether this cost is included in the £43·5 million additional money set aside for investment in primary care.

Dr. Mawhinney: The support costs of the London implementation group (LIG) will not be financed from the £43·5 million announced in "Making London Better", which is additional money for primary care in London. LIG is operating through, and being serviced by, the existing health agencies wherever possible. The cost of any additional support will be met by the Department and the four Thames regions.

Accident and Emergency Services

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what consideration has been given to the desirability of locating obstetric, gynaecology and children's services on site so that they are readily accessible by hospital accident and emergency services.

Mr. Sackville: Accident and emergency departments should only be located in major hospitals, supported by a range of specialties on site and have good communications with specialties which are not on site. It is for purchasers and provider units to determine the most effective configuration of local provision for paediatric, obstetric and gynaecology services, which take full account of the needs of the local population and ensures that timely support is available to the accident and emergency service where appropriate.

Prescription Charges

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans she has to phase out the exemption of prescription charges for the conditions that are currently listed as benefiting from free prescriptions.

Dr. Mawhinney: The Government's policy is that people who can afford to do so should contribute towards the cost of national health service pharmaceutical services by paying prescription charges. Help with such charges is directed towards those likely to have the greatest difficulty in paying. The way in which the extensive exemptions on grounds of health or status may best contribute to this policy is kept under review.

Drug Prescribing

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to her answer of 17 March, Official Report, column 303, when she expects the Advisory Committee on National Health Service Drugs to specify which existing products in the 10 new categories to be covered by the selected list regulations it will formally consider; and on what basis the selection will be made.

Dr. Mawhinney: The Advisory Committee on National Health Service Drugs has set up sub-groups to undertake preliminary consideration, in the light of the committee's terms of reference, of the range of drugs within each of the new therapeutic categories. These sub-groups will report to the full committee, which will decide which drugs should be formally considered. The committee has not set dates for the reviews of particular categories, but relevant manufacturers will be informed in advance.

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will place in the Library a list of the names of each product in each of the 10 therapeutic categories to be considered for inclusion in the selected list by the Advisory Committee on NHS Drugs.

Dr. Mawhinney: I cannot add to my reply to the hon. Member on 17 March at column 303.

Dentists

Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many dentists are now being employed directly by family health service authorities.

Dr. Mawhinney: At 31 December 1992 there were 71 salaried dentists employed by family health service authorities.

Bowel Cancer

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans she has made for the establishment and funding of a national sigmoidoscopy screening programme for bowel cancer.

Mr. Sackville: There are no current plans to establish and fund a screening programme for bowel cancer.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what evidence has been received by her Department of the effect on public health and economic benefits of a national sigmoidoscopy screening programme for bowel cancer.

Mr. Sackville: The value of screening for colorectal or bowel cancer is uncertain. The Department is considering initiatives, including progress of a trial being undertaken at Nottingham on faecal occult blood testing; the potential for flexible sigmoidoscopy as compared to faecal occult blood testing; and other possible screening options.

Counterfeit Drugs

Mr. Chisholm: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps are taken to reassure patients that dispensed drugs are authentic rather than counterfeit drugs.

Dr. Mawhinney: All dispensed medicines are strictly controlled by the Medicines Act 1968. Compliance with the requirements of this Act by those who manufacture, import, wholesale and dispense medicines in the United Kingdom is continuously monitored and enforced by the Medicines Control Agency and the Royal Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain.

The Medicines Control Agency also operates a round-the-clock service by which any suspected defective medicinal product, including counterfeits, can be reported to the agency. The report is investigated with the licence holder and any other parties involved. Any necessary action can be implemented quickly. The agency is supported by laboratories equipped to investigate any suspected counterfeit products.

Mr. Chisholm: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps she is taking to prevent counterfeiting and reimportation of drugs.

Dr. Mawhinney: The Medicines Control Agency fully investigates all alleged reports of counterfeiting and illegal re-importation of drugs and takes prompt action, including prosecution where appropriate to stop illegal activity. The United Kingdom licensing system covering the import—sale and production—of medicinal products is continually kept under review to ensure that appropriate safeguards against counterfeit products are maintained.

Ambulance Service

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will list for each ambulance service (a) the proportion of ambulance service responses which are a result of doctors' urgent calls, (b) the average response time for such calls and (c) the targets she has set for response times; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Sackville: Urgent calls for an ambulance may be made by people other than doctors—for example, expectant mothers. Information on urgent patient journeys does not distinguish between types of caller. The proportion of patient journeys classified as urgent is set out in the table for each ambulance authority in England. Information on average response times for urgent calls is not available centrally. Ninety-five per cent. of urgent responses should arrive at the hospital within 15 minutes of the time agreed between the doctor and the ambulance authority.

NHS Administration

Sir Michael Grylls: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are the total numbers of staff employed in each of the various management/administrator grades of the national health service; and what were the comparable numbers and grades of administrators employed in each year since 1975.

Dr. Mawhinney [holding answer 10 March 1993]: The information is not available centrally in the form requested. The total numbers of staff employed in administrative and clerical grades and the total numbers of general and senior managers are given in the table. Management still accounts for less than 1·7 per cent. of the national health service work force.

DEFENCE

Redundant Personnel (Rents)

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the average level of rents payable in England by redundant service personnel remaining in married quarters.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Redundant service personnel pay the appropriate quartering charge for the type and grade of quarter occupied until they leave the service. After leaving the service they pay a market rent appropriate to the size of the property and the locality. Calculating the average amount payable could be done only at disproportionate cost.

Departmental Properties

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many of his Department's former properties have been leased by local authorities for each year from 1979 to 1993.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Details of married quarters leased to other organisations have only been collected centrally since 1986. As at 31 March of each year the following properties were on lease to local authorities.

	Number
1986	497
1987	405
1988	378
1989	508
1990	595
1991	616
1992	848
1993	832

In addition to the properties on lease to local authorities, a further 112 are on lease at present to other organisations or individuals and additional leases are under negotiation.

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 8 March, Official Report, column 452, how many of his Department's properties sold under the discount scheme in 1990, 1991, 1992 and 1993 were purchased (a) by housing associations, (b) under do-it-yourself shared ownership schemes, (c) under shared ownership schemes and (d) by private developers.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: None. Only service personnel are eligible to purchase property under the discount scheme.

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many applications have been received from service personnel for do-it-yourself shared ownership schemes in the current financial year.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: As of 24 March, 408 applications from service personnel had been submitted through the joint service housing advice office in the current financial year.

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will give the number of his Department's residential properties which have been sold as a proportion of (a) those which are unoccupied and (b) those which are occupied by redundant service personnel remaining in married quarters.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The information is not available in the form requested. My Department has a rolling programme to dispose of all properties that are surplus to its long-term requirements.

Maternity Units

Mrs. Wise: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list his Department's hospitals (a) in the United Kingdom and (b) abroad which have maternity units; and how many maternity beds and special and intensive care baby cots were available in each of those hospitals in the most recent available year.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: My noble Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Defence will write to the hon. Member.

Mrs. Wise: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) how many women delivered in maternity units in his Department's hospitals in the most recent available year (a) in the United Kingdom and (b) elsewhere; and what was the percentage in each case of women whose deliveries were (i) spontaneous, including abnormal presentation of head and breech spontaneous, (ii) instrumental including forceps, vacuum and breech extractions and (iii) by Caesarean section;

(2) what percentage of women delivering in maternity units in his Department's hospitals in the most recent available year (a) in the United Kingdom and (b) elsewhere has episiotomies;

(3) what was the percentage of women delivering in maternity units in his Department's hospitals in the most recent available year (a) in the United Kingdom and (b) elsewhere (i) whose labours were induced, (ii) whose labours were of spontaneous onset and (iii) who had elective Caesarean sections;

(4) how many babies were born in his Department's hospitals (a) in the United Kingdom and (b) elsewhere in the most recent available year; and what were the numbers of live births, still births, deaths at 0 to six days after live birth and deaths at seven to 27 days after live birth of babies weighing (i) under 1,500g, (ii) 1,500g to 2,499g, (iii) 2,500g and over and (iv) babies whose birthweight was unstated (y) in the United Kingdom and (z) abroad.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: This information is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Advance of Pay Scheme

Mr. Ancram: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what estimate he has made of the cost of extending the Royal Navy's long service advance of pay scheme to the Army and RAF.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: An estimate was prepared in 1991-92. Although the figures were never fully refined, the cost over a 10-year period was held to be of the order of £6.6 million for the Army and £12.8 million for the RAF.

Yugoslavia

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what consideration he has given to increasing the size of the British contribution to UNPROFOR II; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The size and composition of the British contribution to the Bosnia-Herzegovina command is determined by its role and tasks within the overall UNPROFOR deployment and by conditions in-country. The overall size of the battalion group and its supporting elements was reviewed as part of our roulement planning process.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what consideration he has given to changing the rules of engagement for British forces deployed with UNPROFOR II; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Rules of engagement under which British troops and other UN troops operate in the former Yugoslavia enable them to defend themselves and to carry out their mission. Rules of engagement would be reviewed if there was any significant change in the circumstances of the deployment.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what decisions he has made about the length of tours of duty for British service personnel deployed with UNPROFOR Bosnia-Herzegovina command; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The length of tour for British personnel deployed with the UN protection force in the former Yugoslavia is six months. This length of tour is consistent with the practice of other UNPROFOR troop contributors.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answers of 26 February, Official Report, column 739, what are the reasons for the reduction in the number of British service personnel deployed with UNPROFOR Bosnia-Herzegovina command after the current units are replaced; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The reduction in numbers between the strength currently deployed and the planned strength after roulement is due mainly to the withdrawal of the Royal Engineer surge capability required to establish the United Kingdom forces in the region. That task will have been compelted by the time of the roulement.

Trucks

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to order trucks or truck spare parts over the next three years.

Mr. Aitken: Our existing contracts for trucks and truck spare parts, worth approximately £165 million, will continue until well into 1995. Thereafter, my Department's long-term costing contains further provision for additional orders for truck spares and replacement vehicles. It is not our practice to disclose specific details of future programmes.

Ex-RAF Pilots

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 20 January, Official Report, column 307, what steps he is taking to increase the current numbers of ex-RAF pilots participating in the Royal Auxiliary Air Force and the Royal Air Force Volunteer Reserve.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I have nothing to add to the answer I gave to the hon. Member on 20 January, Official Report, column 307.

NATO Defence Force

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many and what type of RAF assets will be assigned to the NATO main defence force.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: All front-line aircraft are assigned to NATO or could be made available in support of NATO operations. Our contribution to the NATO main defence force will comprise most of the RAF assets not assigned to the reaction force (air). It will thus include strike/attack and reconnaisance assets, a comprehensive air defence capability and, to reflect the increased emphasis on flexibility of deployment, comprehensive transport, air-to-air refuelling and support helicopter forces. RAF regiment assets will also be assigned.

Matrix Churchill

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what information he had, at the time of signing public interest certificates on the Matrix Churchill case on (a) work undertaken on behalf of Her Majesty's Government by defendants in the case, (b) previous work carried out by his officials relating to export licence applications by Matrix Churchill and (c) policies relating to the export of military equipment to Iraq prior to 2 August 1990; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Aitken: These are matters for Lord Justice Scott's inquiry to consider.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether any of the official documents relating to the Scott inquiry have been lost or destroyed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Aitken: It is my Department's policy routinely to review and, where appropriate, destroy documents, usually after five years. Following the announcement of Lord Justice Scott's inquiry, instructions were issued prohibiting the destruction of any relevant papers. I am advised there are very few documents requested by the inquiry which my Department has been unable to provide.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what documents his Department has been asked to provide to Lord Justice Scott; what documents his Department has supplied; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Aitken: Lord Justice Scott has asked for a wide range of documents, held by my Department and relevant to this inquiry. The papers supplied to the inquiry to date amount to more than 18,000 pages.

Naval Bases

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 8 February, Official Report, column 498, if he will list each of the reasons for not publishing the details of the various proposals which could have implications for naval bases.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: It is not our practice to publish details of the many proposals examined as part of MOD's internal planning process. To announce at the outset details of every proposal which might affect one or more naval bases would create uncertainty for civilian MOD employees and their families, others working at the base, local communities and service personnel. Such uncertainty could also affect the efficiency of the establishment. In addition, there may be security or commercial sensitivities attached to particular proposals.

Nuclear Submarines

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 8 February, Official Report, column 498, what estimates have been made of the cost of final disposal for nuclear submarines.

Mr. Aitken: The policy for the final disposal of decommissioned nuclear submarines remains under consideration; the cost of disposal is one of the factors which will be taken into account.

NATO Rapid Reaction Corps

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what progress has been made in the development of the NATO rapid reaction corps; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The headquarters of the Allied Command Europe rapid reaction corps was established on 3 October 1992 and full operational capability will be achieved by 1995.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 20 January, Official Report, column 306, what is the minimum number of aircraft that the RAF will be contributing to the reaction force (air).

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The RAF will be making a contribution of up to 80 aircraft to the reaction force (air). There is no minimum as such; the number of aircraft deployed in any given situation will depend on the operational requirements at the time.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what information he has received from his German, Dutch and Belgian counterparts relating to their contributions to the rapid reaction corps; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The German, Dutch and Belgian MODs have provisionally agreed to assign forces to the ACE rapid reaction corps and these are most welcome. Details of national contributions have yet to be finalised.

Defence Expenditure

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what discussions he has had with his NATO counterparts regarding their plans for defence expenditure; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: NATO Defence Ministers last considered the spending plans of alliance nations at the defence planning committee meeting on 11 December 1992, as part of the annual review of national defence planning.

Leyland DAF

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will provide details of all of the current orders he has with Leyland DAF.

Mr. Aitken: The Department has 36 current contracts with Leyland DAF. Thesee are as follows:

(1) Five vehicle contracts comprising DROPS MMLC, four tonne 4×4 truck cargo, 4 tonne 4×2 truck cargo, eight-tonne 4×2 truck cargo, and 21-tonne truck cargo;
(2) 24 spares contracts;
(3) Two post-design services contracts for DROPS and four tonne;
(4) Five general contracts e.g. running contracts and testing.

It is not our policy to disclose prices as these are commercially confidential.

Surplus Married Quarters

Mr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the amount and value of surplus married quarters that have been bought by housing associations in the last three years.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Six hundred and twenty-five surplus married quarters have been sold direct to housing associations over the last three years at a total value of £24·171 million. Two further sales involving 150 properties are expected to be completed before the end of this month and sales of a further 561 properties to housing associations are under negotiation.

Iraq

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what changes he has made to his policy relating to the release of information concerning the export of military equipment to Iraq in the last three years; if he will now change his policy relating to the release of such information; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Aitken: It has been the policy of successive Administrations to treat information about the export of specific equipments as commercially confidential. There are no plans to change this policy. In the special circumstances of Iraq, information which is not commercially sensitive has exceptionally been made public since the Gulf conflict. Since the conflict our policy has been to support the United Nations embargo on exports to Iraq.

Redundancies

Dr. Reid: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many officers on short service commissions have been isssued with compulsory redundancy notices since the start of 1993.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: A total of 109 Army officers serving on short service (late entry) commissions were notified on 25 February 1993 that they had been selected for compulsory redundancy under phase 2 of the Army's redundancy programme. No short service officers in either the Royal Navy or the Royal Air Force have been issued with compulsory redundancy notices since the start of 1993.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Fire Officers

Sir John Wheeler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will update the information provided in his answer of 13 March, Official Report, columns 507-9; and if he will rank the annual pay rates of all grades of fire officer and retained fire officer and the arrangements and value of pensions and London weighting allowances; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jack: The National Joint Council for Local Authorities' Fire Brigades has provided the following information relating to pay scales for all ranks of whole-time and retained firefighter, which updates the information contained in the reply given on 13 March 1991.

The annual pay rates of chief fire officers are determined at the discretion of the employing authority, but are normally determined in relation to the population within the brigade area. The table gives details of population ranges and corresponding salary ranges:

London	59,388	79,431	83,046

[1] At the discretion of the employing authority.

The annual pay rates for assistant chief officers except those appointed as deputy chief fire officers, are determined in the same way as those for chief fire officers. The salary ranges are set at 75 per cent. of those for chief fire officers for the equivalent population ranges, subject to an underpinning minimum of £38,139. Salary ranges for those appointed as deputy chief fire officers are set at 80 per cent. of those for chief fire officers for the equivalent population ranges, subject to an underpinning minimum of £38,997.

The annual rates of whole-time ranks from firefighter up to senior divisional officer are set out in the table:

Annual pay rates of whole-time ranks: Firefighter up to and including Senior Divisional Officer

Rank	Minimum £	Maximum £
Senior Divisional Officer	28,896	[1]31,173
Divisional Officer I	26,844	[1]28,776

[1] Ranks at station officer and above may attract a flexible duty supplement of 20 per cent.
[2] Subject to being fully qualified.

The annual retainers for retained firefighters are set out in the table:

Annual retainers for retained firefighters

Rank	One to three years' service £	More than three years' service £

Sub-officer	[1]1,563	[1]1,683
Leading firefighter	1,521	1,563
Firefighter	1,392	1,521

[1] Enhanced payments are made to Sub-officers in charge of fire stations. In addition, retained firefighters are paid fees for attendance at incidents, attendance at drill nights and extra duties. Retained firefighters are also eligible for payments under the long service bounty scheme.

All staff employed by the London Fire and Civil Defence Authority receive a London weighting allowance of £2,511 per annum.

The arrangements for the payment of pensions are as set out in the reply given on 13 March 1991, with the exception that the pension contribution rate has increased to 11 per cent. following the introduction of a lump sum death grant in respect of firefighters who die in service.

Child Abduction

Mr. Olner: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement about the grant for Reunite, the National Council for Abducted Children.

Mr. Jack [holding answer 25 March 1993]: Reunite has been funded by the Home Office voluntary services unit since November 1989 at an annual rate of around £23,000. This arrangement was due to end on 31 March 1993 as indicated, but I am pleased to say that agreement has now been reached with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs on a joint funding scheme to apply beyond that date. We will maintain Reunite's grant at its existing level in 1993-94 and we are prepared to consider the possibility of continued funding, subject to satisfactory discussions but on a tapering basis, for the two following years.

Metropolitan Police

Mr. Keith Hill: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the divisions of the Metropolitan police service by borough, together with the number of police officers working in each division and the population served by each division.

Gambling

Mr. Riddick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will outline the statutory or licensing restrictions which apply to gambling in pubs or other licensed premises; and what consideration is being given to amending them.

Mr. Peter Lloyd [pursuant to his reply, 18 March 1993, c. 319]: Section 6 of the Gaming Act 1968 permits, in public houses and hotels licensed for the sale of liquor, the playing of dominoes, cribbage and any other form of equal chance game authorised by the appropriate liquor licensing authorities. To prevent abuse, the justices are empowered as a safeguard to impose conditions that forbid play for high stakes or stop the gaming from becoming a primary inducement to custom; and people under 18 are debarred from play.

Under section 34 of the 1968 Act, the holder of a justices' on-licence may also apply to the justices for a permit to provide one or more amusements-with-prizes machines offering prizes up to £3 in cash or £6 in tokens against a maximum stake of 20p.

There are at present no plans to amend these restrictions.

Weapons Advertising

Mr. McFall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department pursuant to his answer of 22 March, Official Report, column 450, whether he is willing to receive a deputation led by the hon. Member for Dumbarton on the publication and distribution of the magazine referred to in relation to public safety.

Mr. Charles Wardle: My right hon. and learned Friend will consider this if the hon. Member for Dumbarton writes to him with details of the purpose of the proposed deputation.

University Students

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Education how many students have taken part in the Erasmus scheme to study at EC universities; which students are eligible; and what is the total number of places in the scheme.

Mr. Boswell: Approximately 120,000 students, including 19,000 from the United Kingdom, have taken part in the Erasmus programme during the first five years of its existence—1987-88 to 1991-92. Eligibility extends to students at higher education institutions which, together with partner institutions in other participating countries, have made a successful application to the European Commission to form an inter-university co-operation programme (ICP). Selection of individual students to take part in a student exchange is a matter for the home institution. The level of student mobility within an ICP is decided by the institutions involved.

London Education Bodies

Mr. Dowd: To ask the Secretary of State for Education how many bodies, elected or appointed organisations or groups currently deal with responsibilities previously discharged by the Inner London education authority; and if he will list each with its area of activity.

Mr. Forth: The Department does not maintain a central record of the detailed information requested.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Domestic Violence

Ms Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many women requested social fund loans, community care grants and crisis loans, as a result of escaping a violent partner, for the last two years for which figures are available; what was the average amount granted for each of the above; and what was the number of domestic violence victims whose applications were refused.

Mr. Scott: The information requested is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Pensioners

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many pensioners in (a) the Chelmsford constituency and (b) the United Kingdom are in receipt of income support.

Mr. Burt: The administration of income support is a matter for Mr. Michael Bichard, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to my hon. Friend with such information as is available and a copy will be placed in the Library.

Letter from Michael Bichard to Mr. Simon Burns, dated 25 March 1993:

As Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency it is my responsibility to answer questions about relevant operational matters. I am therefore replying to your recent Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Social Security asking how many pensioners in (a) the Chelmsford constituency and (b) the United Kingdom are in receipt of Income Support.

The constituency of Chelmsford is covered by the Benefits Agency's Essex and South East District, which consists of Southend-on-Sea and Chelmsford offices. The information is not available in the format requested because the boundaries of the district do not correspond exactly with those of the constituency. Additionally, for Income Support purposes all customers are classified as pensioners at age 60.

However, as at 28 February 1993, the latest date for which information is available, 11,144 customers aged 60 or over in the Benefits Agency's Essex South East District office were claiming Income Support. The equivalent figure for the United Kingdom as a whole is 1,630,511.

I hope you find this reply helpful. A copy of this letter will appear in the Official Report and a copy will be placed in the Library.

Chronic Bronchitis and Emphysema

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he will respond to the report by the Industrial Injuries Advisory Council on chronic bronchitis and emphysema.

Mr. Scott: We hope to announce our response shortly.

Benefits (Overpayment)

Mr. O'Hara: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the maximum length of time in arrears after which overpayment of state benefits may be recovered.

Miss Widdecombe: The law prescribes no time limit for the calculation or recovery of overpaid benefits.

Income Support

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what income support rates were in each year since 1988-89.

Mr. Burt: The information is in table A2.36 on page 41 of "Social Security Statistics 1992", published by HMSO. A copy of which is in the Library.

Retirement Pension

Mr. O'Hara: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the maximum length of time in arrears after which the state retirement pension may be claimed.

Miss Widdecombe: Arrears of state retirement pension may be paid for a maximum period of 12 months before the date of the claim.

Automated Credit Transfer

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what representations he has received about advice being given to those about to retire about pensions being paid through automated credit transfer; and if he will make a statement.

Miss Widdecombe: We have received a number of representations on this subject both from hon. Members and outside interests. All representations are being given full and due consideration.

INDEX TO THE

PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES

OFFICIAL REPORT

SIXTH SERIES VOLUME 221

SESSION 1992–93

15th March, 1993—26th March, 1993

SCOPE OF THE INDEX, ARRANGEMENT AND ABBREVIATIONS

This index is derived from the House of Commons Library's Parliamentary On-Line Information System (POLIS), and the subject terms used are based on those used in POLIS. There are often changes in column numbering, etc, between the daily part or weekly Hansard (which simply collects together the daily parts without revision) and the bound volume. The index for the bound volume is revised to take account of these changes and cannot therefore, be used in connection with the daily part or weekly Hansard. For these versions use the Fortnightly Index.

Scope and arrangement of the Index

Oral and Written Parliamentary Questions are indexed under subject headings and the names of Members asking and Ministers replying to them. Questions are not listed under the names of Departments replying. Departmental listings can be arrived at indirectly by looking under the names of the Minister(s) of that Department. There are, however, the headings 'Northern Ireland', 'Scotland', and 'Wales' under which one can find not only most Questions answered by the Northern Ireland Office, Scottish Office, Welsh Office but also Questions about these areas of the United Kingdom which are answered by other Departments. Ministerial statements are indexed under subject headings, under 'Ministerial statements' and the names of Ministers making them and Members speaking on them. General debates are indexed under broad subject headings and under the names of all Members and Ministers taking part. Debates on legislation (Bills, Orders, Regulations etc.) are indexed under the name of the Bill, Statutory Instrument etc, under subject headings and under the names of those taking part.

Rulings and Statements by Speaker and deputies are brought together under the heading Speaker's rulings and statements.

Other contributions by Speaker and deputies appear under the heading Speaker.

Opposition Day Debates, Estimates Day Debates and Standing Order No. 10 applications are listed under those respective headings and under subject headings too.

The date of each item except Parliamentary Questions is inserted immediately before the reference.

Members' names are given in the form by which they prefer to be known and are printed in bold italics. Under their names, entries are arranged under one of the two headings Debates etc (to include interventions on statements, points of order and so on) or Questions.

Abbreviations

Bills 1R = first reading, 2R = second reading, Money res = money resolution, Com = Committee stage, Rep = Report stage, 3R = third reading, amendt/amendts = amendment/amendments, * = matter taken formally, without debate.

Column numbers followed by the letter W refer to Written Questions. These appear at the end of each daily part or volume with their own sequence of column numbers printed in italics.
